

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

BSR

VOLUME FIVE

1911

FROM APRIL 15 TO OCTOBER 7, 1911, INCLUSIVE

COPYRIGHT, 1911.

NEW YORK THE AMERICA PRESS

INDEX

VOLUME V—APRIL 15 TO OCTOBER 7, 1911, INCLUSIVE

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
A CADIANs in Philadelphia.....	599	British Colonial Navies. (Ed.).....	567	Christ Child Society.....	430
Advertisements, Offensive.....	394	British Honduras, Caribs of.....	89	Christian Socialists in Austria. (Ed.).....	351
Africa: South Africa Federation, 37; Missions on Great Lakes, 102; War in Morocco, 419; Erythra Vicariate Apostolic, 166; Portuguese Missions, 418; Seizure of Tripoli (Ed.).....	614	Brosnahan, T., S.J.: Popular Education.....	403	Cicero's Poems! (Ed.).....	256
Aguirre y Garcia, Cardinal, Pontifical Legate. Alaska: Railroads, 47; Hawaiian and Filipino Laborers, 141; Coal Claims.....	214	Bruchési, Archbishop.....	214	City of Confusion, The (Episcopalians). (Ed.).....	112
Albania: Chronicle, 172; Conditions, 84; 325; (Ed.) 376; (Ed.) 399; 406; 439.....	467	Buccaneers, Last of the.....	209	Civil Service Pensions in England. (Ed.).....	137
Alcalá, Most Rev. Mariano.....	599	Bull Run, Battle Field, Reunion.....	362	Clotilde, Princess.....	341
Alfonso, King, Eucharistic Congress (Ed.).....	378	Butler, Sir William: Autobiography.....	369	Clubhouse for a Whole Parish.....	527
Almsgiving, Duty of. (Ed.).....	256	C AHILL, Very Rev. Charles, O.M.I.....	288	Coatesville Lynching. (Ed.).....	470
Aloysius Truth Society.....	336	Caillaux, Prime Minister of France.....	440	Coler, Mr. Bird S. Socialism in Public Schools, 333; Residuary Sect, 405.....	429
Alsace-Lorraine (Ed.), 183; (Ed.).....	280	Canada: Chronicle, 2; 26; 50; 74; 98; 122; 147; 170; 194; 218; 242; 266; 290; 314; 338; 362; 386; 410; 434; 458; 482; 506; 530; 554; 578; 602; Polyglot Congregations in Toronto, 47; Reciprocity, 49; 169; 218; Quebec Marriage Case, 101; Letter of Pius X.....	503	Coll, Hon. Anthony M.....	47
Alsop Claim Award.....	352	Canalejas.....	8; 127; 205; 276	Colonization, Catholic.....	238
AMERICA by Fast Freight. (Ed. Notice).....	230	Carbonari in Portugal.....	80	Columbus Day.....	530
American Federation of Labor Decision.....	146	Caribs of British Honduras.....	89	Columbus, Catholic Convention at.....	485
Anglican Church: Marriage Laws. (Ed.).....	160	Carlisle Program Modified.....	152	Comic Supplement, Sunday. (Ed.).....	88
Anglicans in Trouble. (Ed.).....	544	Carnegie, Andrew, Gold Medal.....	93	Communism Cup, Anglican. (Ed.).....	544
Antichrist: Reign of Unbelief.....	536	Carnegie Foundation.....	332	Communism Guild, Frequent, 391; Communism in Our Schools, Frequent, 344; Communism for Children, Holy, 309; Communism, Obstacles to Frequent, 461; The Child and Frequent Communism, 608; Age for First Communism.....	582
Antonio, Sister Mary ("Mercedes").....	191	Carnegie Library Catalogue.....	280	Confession, Violating the Seal of. (Ed.).....	134
Apostleship of the Press.....	31	Carter, Senator, Death.....	578	Congress. See United States.
Arbitration Treaty: Great Britain and France. 145; 409; 433.....	118	Cathedral of St. John the Divine. (Ed.).....	63	Constantinople, Saint Sophia.....	528
Archbishops of the United States, Meeting.....	118	Catholic Benevolent Legion.....	143	Convent, Crimes of a, 60; A Correction.....	107
Argentina: Chronicle, 579; Father Fidelis (Kent Stone).....	181	Catholic Books (Ed.), 112; (Ed.) 232; Circulation (Ed.), 135; Hundred Best (Ed.), 159; For the Blind (Ed.), 158; Pittsburgh Library.....	280	Conventions: German of Pennsylvania, 359; American Federation, 359. (See Catholic Societies.)
Arizona and New Mexico.....	169; 433; 457	Catholic Books in State Libraries.....	240	Converts to Rome. (Ed.).....	255
Army and Navy, Social Evil in (Ed.), 398; (Ed.).....	495	Catholic Charities, National Conference of.....	54	Coronation of George V. (Ed.).....	246
Assassination of a People (Albanians). (Ed.).....	376	Catholic Child, Decision on Custody of.....	431	Covadonga.....	535
Associated Press Canards from Portugal.....	575	Catholic Colleges. (Ed.).....	616	Crane, Mr. R. T.: Attack on Colleges.....	571
Austin, Penn.: Flood.....	601	Catholic Colleges and Catholic Writers.....	174	Creighton University Fire.....	166
Australia: School Question, 45; Navy, 133; The Referendum.....	141	Catholic Colonization.....	238	Crimes of a Convent, 60; A Correction.....	107
Austria-Hungary: Chronicle, 4; 28; 52; 76; 100; 148; 172; 196; 220; 244; 268; 292; 311; 316; 340; 364; 388; 412; 436; 460; 484; 508; 532; 556; 580; 604; Catholic Protest, 15; University, 35; International Telegraph Agency, 36; Christian Socialists (Ed.), 351; 412	146	Catholic Congresses: Mainz (Mayence), Germany, 157; 311; 478; Limburg, Holland, 287; England, 479; Belgium, 527; Eucharistic, Spain, 71.....	300	Cuban Politics, 253; Schools.....	256
Aviation: Disasters.....	146	Catholic Conventions: 384; At Columbus, Ohio, 485; Central Verein.....	563	Curie, Madame.....	623
Aviation and Pius X. (Ed.).....	399	Catholic Daily, A. (Ed.).....	256	D ALHIA Show, At the.....	617
B ABYLON and Christianity.....	46	Catholic Directory.....	120	Dallam, Chaplain.....	26
Baltimore, Lord, Commemoration in Maryland.....	22	Catholic High School in Brooklyn.....	599	Daly, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Thomas J.: Golden Jubilee.....	335
Bavaria: School Conflict.....	328	Catholic High Schools, Plan for. (Ed.).....	616	Day, Father Henry, S.J.: Remedy for Industrial Strife.....	599
Belford, Rev. J. L., on Paternalism in Schools	117	Catholic High Schools, Plan for. (Ed.).....	329	Deaf Mutes: Celebration in New York.....	503
Belgium: Chronicle, 3; 28; 76; 196; 219; 244; 291; 316; 339; 436; 507; 531; 555; School Question, 22; 188; Catholic University, 153; College of St. Michel, Brussels, 185; Socialists, 304; Turbulent Law Makers (Ed.), 329; Schollaert Ministry, 270; De Broqueville (Ed.), 519; Socialists and August Fifteenth (Ed.), 447; Schollaert Demonstration (Ed.), 543; Catholic Congress.....	527	Catholic Press: Apostleship, 31; International News Agency, 36; 165; 223; Daily (Ed.), 255; Association of America, 497; Extension (Ed.), 568; History, 415.....	437	De Broqueville, Prime Minister of Belgium. (Ed.).....	519
Bequests: Almiral, Joseph I., 479; Burguières, Joseph E., 576; Butler, Mary A., 142; Curley, John, 456; Doyle, Mrs. Annie F., 575; Engert, Charles, 119; Fargis, Amadée C., 166; Haggerty, Miss Ellen, 47; McKeaney, Rev. B.....	23	Catholic Societies: Charities, 54; Knights of Columbus, 71; 143; St. Vincent de Paul, 71; 142; 239; 262; Propagation of the Faith, 191; Laymen's League, 359; Catholic Benevolent Legion, 143; German American Union of New York, 214; St. Vincent de Paul of Germany, 214; Educational Association, 332; Pennsylvania German, 359; American Federation, 259; World Federation, 407; Christ Child Society, 430; Foresters, 431; Educational Association, Annual Meeting, 164; Meetings During August, 384; Holy Name, 600.....	624	Decent Propriety. Victims of Auto Races. (Ed.).....	208
Berteaux, M., Killed. (Ed.).....	233	Catholic University of Louvain, 153; Catholic University of America, Liturgical Music.....	286	Decision on Custody of Catholic Child.....	431
Betting and Speculating.....	454	Catholic University Summer School.....	552	Decrees: Removal of Parish Priests, 62; National Flag in Churches.....	62
Bible, for Naval Cadets, 47; Gutenberg Bible. (Ed.).....	86	Catholic and Protestant Hymns. (Ed.).....	233	Des Moines, New Diocese of.....	565
Bible Centenary and Catholic Church.....	70	Catholicism and the Local Press. (Ed.).....	447	Devil's Baptism.....	425
Bible, The Unopened. (Ed.).....	422	Catholicism at Non-Catholic Colleges. (Ed.).....	378	Diaz, President. (Ed.).....	65
Bill-Board Advertising, 480; Bill Posters Censor Bill-Boards. (Ed.).....	352	Catholicism Favored in America. (Ed.).....	424	Dickinson, War Secretary, Resignation.....	121
Bishops, Justices and Marriages. (Ed.).....	160	Catholicism: Services to the Country. (Ed.).....	16	Digby, Madame.....	167
Blessed Virgin, Devotion to the.....	125	Central Verein Convention.....	563	Diplomatic Corps Changes.....	434
Blenk, Archbishop, on Liberty. (Ed.).....	496	Ceylon, Population.....	157	Divorce Case, Du Breuil. (Ed.).....	566
Blind, Literature for the. (Ed.).....	153	Chemical Dispute. (Ed.).....	184	Divorce Laws, Uniform.....	553
Blunt's Dictionary of Sects. (Ed.).....	448	Chapels on Wheels.....	593	Dominican Foundation in Providence.....	191
Bohemia, Education in.....	477	Chaplains, Catholic Army, at San Antonio, Tex.....	22	Dongan, Governor.....	584
Book Lists, Catholic (Ed.), 112; (Ed.).....	159	Chartreuse. (Ed.).....	279	Dooley, Mr. Michael F.....	263
Books, Children's.....	523	Chevallier, Rev. Stanislas, S.J.....	456	Douglas, Lord Alfred.....	214
Books by Catholic Authors (Ed.), 232; Pittsburgh Library (Ed.), 280; Books a Danger of the Day, 495; Books: Devotional, 19; For the Blind, 158; Prohibited.....	227	Child Training, Old and New.....	462	Duchesne, "History of Ancient Church" Forbidden.....	624
Boy Scout Fad.....	117	Children of Israel (in New York). (Ed.).....	278	Duchesne, Mgr. (Ed.).....	614
Boys in Their Teens, with Workers.....	514	Children's Books.....	523	Duez Called to Trial. (Ed.).....	254
Braga, Rise to Power.....	80	Children's Encyclopædia, The.....	441	Dwight, Dr. Thomas.....	586
Brandts, Franz.....	57	Chile: Submarines.....	310	Dynamiters of Los Angeles Times, Alleged.....	74
Brazil: Chronicle.....	532	China: Chronicle, 123; 148; 172; 268; 460; Condition of the Church, 57; Famine, 60; 103; Foreign Population of Shanghai, 118; Loan, 229; Militant Spirit, 349; New Navy, 492; Outbreak in Canton, 223; New Railway Policy, 374; New Cabinet, 445; Opium Suppression, 539; Missions, 490; Anti-Manchu Outbreak, 323; New Railway Policy.....	374	E AMES-GOGORZA Marriage. (Ed.).....	518
Briacelli, Father, S.J. (Ed.). See Verdesi.....	143	Chinese Catholics.....	264	Easter Greeting. (Ed.).....	16
Bright, John.....	199			Ebro Observatory: Monthly Bulletins.....	43
Brighton Seminary, Changes at the.....	191			Economic Conditions of German Catholics.....	342

Education and Religion: 424; 429; 550; Safe- guarding Children's Morals, 22; Hebrews' Favor, 45; Presbyterian Pastor Condemns Carnegie Foundation, 45; Balfour, 69; The Problem, 164; Boston Martyr to Conscience, 188; Criminal Statistics in France (Ed.), 206; In the United States, 212; Students' Eucharistic League, 237; Parochial School, 258; "Non-Sectarian" Argument, 261; Prus- sia, 262; Bavaria (Ed.), 328; American Public Schools, 404; France, 404; Bishop Westcott, 404; B. S. Coler's "Residuary Sect," 404; 429; Dangers to Religion in Public Schools, 452; Need of Catholic High Schools, 453; Lutherans Favor Religious Schools, 453; President Hall, 500; Cardinal Gibbons 573		F ABRICATING NEWS 327 Fall River Cotton Centennial 266 Fallières, M., the French Turk. (Ed.) 135 Famine in China 60 Federation and Knights of Columbus. (Ed.) 544 Federation of Labor Decision 146 Federation's Opportunity (Albanian Outrages) (Ed.), 399; Federation's Educational Value (Ed.), 494; Federation of Catholic Societies in America 502 Federation of Catholic Societies, 71; Louisi- ana, 95; England, 118; Bengal 527 Fez 149 Fidelis (Kent Stone), Father, in Argentina 181 Filipino Laborers in Alaska 141 First Communion, Age for 582 Flag in Churches, National 62 Fleur de Lis, The 19 Fogazzaro and His Novels 401 Food for Babies, The Children's Encyclopædia 441 Fooling the People. (Ed.) 39 Ford, Patrick, Irish World Anniversary 239 Fordham Social Study Course 430 Fourth of July Celebrations (Ed.), 254; 313; Report on Legislation. (Ed.) 520 France: Chronicle, 3; 28; 52; 75; 99; 124; 147; 171; 195; 220; 243; 267; 291; 316; 339; 364; 387; 436; 460; 483; 507; 531; 555; 580; 604; Organization Work Among Catholics, 14; The Eastern Missions, 34; Socialist Cabinet (Ed.), 39; American Revolu- tion Heroes Honored, 50; Families, 118; War in Morocco, 149; State of Religion (Ed.), 183; Criminal Statistics and Irre- ligious Schooling (Ed.), 206; Death of Min- ister Berteaux (Ed.), 233; Duez (Ed.), 254; Millenary of Normandy, 252; Despoil- ers. (Ed.), 278; Chartreuse (Ed.), 279; Joan of Arc Pageants, 302; Representation Proportionelle, 326; Sabotage (Ed.), 424; Devil's Baptism (Ed.), 425; Village Churches, 468; Commemoration at Annecy, 517; Morocco, 533; "Mona Lisa" 566 France and the American Alliance 428 Franciscans: In East Africa, 166; In Mexico, 486; In San Antonio 47 Freemasonry and French Revolution 588 Freemasons in Rome 520 Freethought Federation. (Ed.) 64 French Academy and Its Critics. (Ed.) 208 French Heroes Honored 50 French Patriotism. (Ed.) 567 French Poetry 452 French Turk, The (M. Fallières). (Ed.) 135 Frequent Communion in Our Schools 344 Frye, Senator W. P. 73; 434		Gringo, Meaning of the Word 225 Grosscup, Judge: Resignation 577 Gruscha, Cardinal: Address to Workingmen 214 Guatemala, Political Condition, 12; 61 109 Gubernatorial Pardons 442 Guerin, Mayor: Knight Commander 599 Guild, Curtis, Jr., Ambassador 26 Gunn, Rt. Rev. John E., S.M., D.D., Bishop- elect of Natchez, 312; Consecrated 503 Gutenberg Bible. (Ed.) 86		H AGGERTY, Miss Ellen 47 Hall, President, on Religious Education 500 Hawaii: Naval Base 338 Hawaiian Laborers in Alaska 141 Hitze, Dr. Franz 57 Hoe Library Sale 98 Holland: Chronicle, 556; Jansenists, 132; Bishop Arnold Mathew, 132; Queen, Diplo- matic (Ed.), 134; Catholic Emigrants to U. S., 165; Catholic Congress, 287; Catholic Organization, 324; Socialists, 396; The Holy See, 393; Holland's Papal Zouaves, 393; Socialists 396 Holy Cross College, Worcester 70 Holy Days of Obligation 431 Holy Name Organizations, 600; First National Congress 624 Homeric Criticism 561 Homer's Iliad, Unity of 371 Horticultural: Fleur de Lis 19 House of Lords. (Ed.) 448 Hungary: Chronicle, 604; Political and Public Life, 13; Socialists, 311. (See Austria.) Hymnals, Official Catholic 501 Hymns, Protestant (Ed.), 233; (Ed.) 351		I LIAID of Homer; Its Unity 371 Illegal Weddings. (Ed.) 232 Immigration from Holland, Catholic 165 Income Tax, Federal 49; 338 Independent, The, and "Spiritual Impudence." (Ed.) 254 Index, Congregation of the; Books Prohibited India: Chronicle, 459; The Church of Ki- dangur, 12; School Question, 22; Fishery Coast, 32; Ancient Shrine, 130; Population of Ceylon, 157; Franciscans in Madras, 239; Child Widows, 325; Educational Work, 406; Lay Apostolate, 443; Theosophy, 489; Catho- lic Federation 527 Indians: Agency Scandal 25 Insurance for Children's Benefit 238 Insurance of Workmen in Germany. (Ed.) 350 Intercollegiate Socialist Society. (Ed.) 304 International United Telegraphy Agency (Iuta) 36; 165; 223 Ireland: Chronicle, 3; 27; 51; 75; 99; 123; 171; 195; 219; 243; 267; 291; 315; 339; 363; 387; 411; 435; 507; 531; 554; 578; 603; Popu- lation (Ed.), 249; Bishop Morrisroe, 264; Ne Temere Agitation, 321; Gaelic Scholar- ship, 420; Classical Teaching, 453; Croagh- patrick 456 Irish Players, Irish Opinion On. (Ed.) 614 Irish Players and Playwrights 581 Italy: Chronicle, 3; 28; 51; 291; 340; 436; 460; 508; 555; 579; 603; Official Confusion, 13; Jubilee of United Italy, 35; 107; 131; 251; 311; Anti-Clericalism, 83; 226; Indus- trial Discord in Rome, 179; Public Schools, 188; Verdesi, 93; 196; 221; 275; 302; 319; 493; Strikes in Rome, 203; Parliament, 227; Anti-Clericals, 467; Freemasons, 520; Jubilee Failure (Ed.), 590; Nathan's Speech, 20 Sept. (Ed.), 592; Rome, 373; 445; Italian Unity Jubilee (Ed.), 17; Socialistic Free- dom, 207; Suffrage Question, 347; Holy Days of Obligation, 395; Attack on Catholic Schools, 444; Pope on Peace Conference, 322; Varia, 226; 251; 301; 322 347		J AMAICA, W. I.: Mission Work 156 Jansenists, Dutch 132 Japan: Chronicle, 172; And Mexico, 25; Ra- tionalism, 72; Catholics, 264; Universal Su- ffrage, 389; First Factory Law, 564 612 Japanese Parliament 296 Japanese and Universal Suffrage 389 Japanese in the Northwest 338 Jesuit Oath. (Ed.) 326 Jesuits, Disputation at Woodstock, Md. 118 Jesuits in Mexico in the 16th Century 559 Jewish Regiment and Armory 410 Jews in New York Schools. (Ed.) 278 Joan of Arc Pageants 302 Jogues Memorial 313; 623 Johnson, Mayor 26 Judges and the Law. (Ed.) 182 Juvenile Crime (Ed.), 110; (Ed.) 136		K ANE, Sir Henry 384 Keane, Archbishop, Resignation, 118; 311; 407 Keane, Rt. Rev. James J., D.D., Appointed Archbishop 455 Ketteler, Bishop Von. (Ed.) 158 Kipling: Fairy Tales of Mr. 185 Kipling Index 21 Knights of Columbus and Federation. (Ed.) 544 Knights of Columbus: Massachusetts, 71; 143; Illinois, 143; To Publish Catholic School
--	--	---	--	--	--	---	--	--	--	--	--	--

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Books, 285; Report on Education, 452; Progress.....	455	China, 57; The Fishery Coast, 82; Concerning Caribs, 89; Central Africa, 102; Ancient Shrine in India, 130; Jamaica, W. I., 156; East Africa, 166; Madura, 225; Franciscans in Madras, 239; American Seminary, 257; "An Old Almanack," S. Africa, 1854, 306; Portuguese in S. Africa, 418; India, 443; China, 490; Manual Training Schools in India.....	611	78; Health, 226; Letter to Dr. Grannau, 334; Letter to the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falcomio, on International Peace, 335; Madrid Eucharistic Congress, 358; And the Aviators, (Ed.).....	399
L A FARGE, John C. Grant.....	266	Modernism: Anti-Modernistic Oath in Germany, 30; 41; Pius X and Leo XIII.....	79	Poland: Crimes of a Convent, 60; A Correction, Reasonable. (Ed.).....	107
Y. La Farge, John.....	150	Modernists, Practice of Some. (Ed.).....	422	Pope and Europe, The, 78; And the Peace Movement.....	605
Langelier, Sir François.....	142	"Mona Lisa." (Ed.).....	566	Population, U. S., Moving Westward.....	361
Laval, Rt. Rev. Mgr. J. M.....	575	Monroe Doctrine.....	6	Portiuncula Indulgence.....	407
Lawlessness in England and the United States Compared.....	327	Moorey, Mgr. Joseph F.: Celebration.....	214	Portugal: Chronicle, 4; 52; 75; 100; 124; 148; 171; 243; 267; 291; 315; 363; 387; 411; 435; 459; 484; 507; 532; 555; 580; 604; Secular Press (Ed.), 40; Braga's Exaltation, 80; Carbonari, 80; Eve of the Elections, 155; 162; Separation Law, 173; Letter on Portugal, 213; Republicanism, 228; Recognition by the U. S., 265; Reign of Terror, 302; Sham Elections, 324; Politics, 348; Little Sisters of the Poor (Ed.), 378; Republic, 419; 468; Y. M. C. A., 467; Politics, 493; Marquis of Villalobar, 520; Arriaga, 540; 565; Associated Press Canards, 575; Bishops of Funchal Protest.....	599
Laymen's Retreat Movement. (See Retreats for Laymen.).....	371	Morality Without Religion.....	557	Portugal's Metamorphosis.....	464
Lender, Dr. Francis Xavier.....	214	Moran, Cardinal. (Ed.).....	472; 476; 575	Portuguese: Archbishop's Dignified Protest, 509; Missions in South Africa, 418; Republicanism.....	515
Leo XIII, Policy of.....	78	Moret y Prendergast.....	9	Post Office Department: Second Class Mail Matter.....	372; 409
Lerroux, Alejandro.....	9	Morocco: 533; 556; Vicariate Apostolic.....	623	Postage Stamps, New.....	434
Letters to the Editor: Official Facts About the Y. M. C. A., 48; Cincinnati's Sisters' Schools (S. M. A.), 96; 168; Date of Cardinal Newman's Ordination, 120; The Catholic Directory (T. F. M.), 120; The Senior Catholic Academy (Clorivière), 120; 192; Identifying Catholic Landmarks (T. F. M.), 144; Montreal Sailors' Club (A. T. Sadlier), 216; Catholic Books in State Library, 240; Objectionable Moving Pictures (J. A. Gray), 264; Catholic Books (T. F. Coakley), (J. T. Comes), 288; Work for the Federation (Senex), 312; Protestant Hymns in Catholic Churches (Gregorian), (James P. Dunn), 432; Bill-Board Advertising (J. P. Hynes), 480; Fogazzaro (Philip I. Barrow), 480; Catholic University Summer School (Sisters of Mercy), 552; Parish School Assemblies (M. S.), 556; Eames-De Gogorza Marriage, 600; Holy Name Organizations (J. J. McCarthy).....	600	Morrisroe, Rt. Rev. Patrick, D.D.....	264	Pothier, Governor, of Rhode Island.....	286
Let Us Hate Nobody. (Ed.).....	38	Mother Eutopia McMahon.....	406	Prendergast, Most Rev. E. T.....	190; 407
Library, New York Public.....	169	Mother M. Divine Heart Spillane.....	406	Prescribed Course and Literary Development. Press (Catholic), (Ed.) 329; Apostleship, 31; International News Agency, 36; 165; 223; Daily (Ed.), 255; History, 415;.....	437
Light House, The. Books for the Blind.....	158	Mother M. Florence.....	406	Press (Secular): Comic Supplement (Ed.), 39; Editing Under Difficulties (Ed.), 40; American Daily, 141; Congressional Record and Consular Reports, 259; And Catholics (Ed.), 447; Responsibility of the. (Ed.).....	518
Lincoln Memorial.....	421	Mother Mary of Loretto Grace.....	406	"Priest Ridden" Catholics.....	383
Literary Development, Prescribed Course and Loan Sharks.....	287; 334	Mother Mary Xavier Jubilee.....	142	Protestant: Hymns (Ed.), 233; (Ed.) 351; Churches in Summer (Ed.), 496; Vacation Schools. (Ed.).....	446
Longinotti Defends Catholic Labor Unions. (Ed.).....	207	"Motivation" the Latest School Fad. (Ed.).....	377	Protestantism of To-day.....	536
Loretto Academy, Niagara Falls.....	311	Moving Pictures: Objectionable, 264; Censorship in Penn. (Ed.), 305; Children.....	477	Q UEBEC Marriage Case.....	101
Lorimer Inquiry.....	169; 193	Moynihan, Very Rev. Michael, S.J.....	264	Queen of Holland and the Pope, The. (Ed.).....	134
Louvain, Catholic University.....	153	Mundelein, Bishop: His Generous Congregation.....	71	Quinn, Canon of Killeavy.....	264
Lucas, Dr. Frederic A.....	146	Museum of Natural History, American.....	146	Quinn, Rev. John J.....	552
Lynch, Rt. Rev. Joseph Patrick, D.D., Consecrated.....	360	Music: At Catholic University, Liturgical, 285; Non-Catholic Interest in Catholic, 356; Character of Its Emotional Appeal, 454; Official Catholic Hymnals.....	501	R AILROAD: Employees, Spiritual Needs of (Ed.), 400; Massacres. (Ed.).....	400
Lynching in the United States. (Ed.).....	470	Musiciens d'aujourd'hui.....	597	Railroads: Rate Decision.....	385
M ACHAO.....	291	N AMUR: Catholic Congress.....	527	Railway Suit, Reading.....	361
Machine, The. (Specialization in Labor).....	202	Nathan's Gentle Speech. (Ed.).....	592	Recall, The.....	198
MacGahan, J. A., Monument.....	314	National Charity Conference.....	54	Reciprocity: U. S. and Canada, 49; 169; 218; Root Amendment, 289; Bill Passed, 361; Democrats Praised by President.....	385
McKean, Rev. B.....	23	Naturalization Rules, New.....	290	Religion: Among Non-Catholics in America, 53; And Reforms in England. (Ed.).....	350
McMahon, Rev. Dr. William.....	408	Naundorffs, Mystery of the.....	129	Religious: And Personal Liberty (Ed.), 496; Movement in the U. S., New (Ed.), 591; Orders Before the Spanish Cortes, 320; Statistics of England, 273; Training and Literature, 272; Training in Schools, Plan for (Ed.), 424; vs. Lay Schools. (Ed.).....	376
McVeagh, Secretary, on Pensions.....	39	Negro Case at Arnaudville, La. (Ed.).....	496	Representation Proportionelle in France. (Ed.)	326
Madeira Islands: Protest of Bishops.....	599	Negro's Hope: President Taft's Address.....	605	Retreats for Laymen: 23; 95; 359; 477; In Sweden, 396; Staten Island, 503; 575; Grand Coteau, La., 551.....	588
Madero, Francisco L.....	351	"Ne Temere" Agitation, 213; 298; in Ireland, Neumann, Ven. John N.: Progress of the Cause.....	95	Revenue (U. S.) for 1911.....	542
Madura Mission.....	225	Newman, Cardinal: Ordination.....	120	Rhode Island: Catholic Population.....	314
Magazine Trust.....	337	New Mexico and Arizona.....	169; 457	Rios, Montero.....	9
Magazines by Fast Freight.....	577	Newspaper Hoaxes (Ed.), 161; Fabrications. (Ed.).....	327	Ripon's Biography, Marquis of.....	21
Maine, Wreck of the Battleship.....	386	Newspapers: Sunday Comic Supplements (Ed.), 88; "Moving Picture News." (Ed.).....	184	Robie, Rear Admiral.....	218
Mainz: Catholic Congress.....	478	New York: Literary Institution, 144; City Population.....	410	Roderick, Last of the Goths.....	535
Marriage Case, Quebec.....	101	Nicaragua: Chronicle, 2; 98; 122; Present Condition.....	613	"Roman Catholic" The Designation.....	119
Marriage Laws: Church of England (Ed.), 160; 298; Catholic Church, 79; 101; 126; 189; 213; (Ed.) 232; Methodists.....	256	Non-Catholic Americans and Religion.....	53	Ruano, Rev. Fabian.....	335
Marriage, The Ideal.....	543	Normandy's Thousand Years.....	252	Russell, Mgr. William T.....	239
Marriage Lotteries (Ed.), 400; Professor Polacco on Indissolubility, 449; Mixed Marriages. (Ed.).....	519	Norway: Dr. Karl Knud Krogh-Tønning.....	104	Russia: Chronicle, 460; Crimes of Schismatical Monks, 60; Converts, 375; Catholic Church in.....	465
Martin, Senator: Minority Leader.....	1	Norwich, Conn.: St. Patrick's Church Consecrated.....	624	Ruville, Dr. Albert Von.....	178; 200
Mass for Night Workers.....	23	Novels, Unfit. (Ed.).....	18	Ryan, Rev. Richard E., S.J.....	142
Mathew, Bishop Arnold.....	132	O 'CONNOR, Mr. John P.: Bequests.....	263	Ryan, Archbishop: First Memorial.....	551
Mathieu, Rt. Rev. Mgr., D.D.....	384	O'Doherty, Very Rev. Denis J.....	431	S ABOTAGE. (Ed.).....	424
Matrimonial Legislation of Church, 79; 101; 126; 213.....	591	O'Doherty, Very Rev. Michael, Bishop-elect of Zamboanga, P. I.....	312	Schleuter, Rev. J. P. M., S.J.: Jubilee.....	287
Matrimonial Puzzle. (Ed.).....	591	O'Dwyer, Bishop of Limerick: Jubilee.....	360	Schollaert: (Ed.) 543; Ministry, 270.....	316
Maura, Antonio.....	9	O'Gorman, Senator James A.....	97	Schrems, Rt. Rev. Joseph B.: At Lenox Mass., 383; First Bishop of Toledo.....	455
May Sermon, A.....	125	Oklahoma.....	194	Science: Wireless at Sea, Phosphate Beds in Montana, Coal Clinkers, Electrical Test for Feed Water, 24; Ebro Observatory, 43; Photographing Stars, Magnetic Storms, Official Time in France, Double Stars, 46; Burglar Alarms, Radium, 47; Weather Forecasts, Feed Water Purification, Radium Substitute, Starlight Night's Luminosity, Sterilizing Water, Aluminum Bronze Coinage, 94; Photographing the Moon, 119; Sun a Variable Star, Stellar Spectra, 143; Chemistry, Syn-
Mayence: Catholic Congress.....	478	Old Catholic Pastor Converted (?). (Karl Gross).....	479
Maynooth Union.....	71	Old Catholics of Bern Faculty.....	215
Maze-Sancier: State Schools in France.....	404	O'Rourke, Rev. John H., S.J.....	166
Meehan, Thos. F., Director of Brooklyn Public Library.....	527	P AINE, Tom.....	443
Memorial Mass: Brooklyn Navy Yard, 191; Washington.....	214	Panama: Canal Route for American Steamships, 602; Fair Site, 409; Islands.....	434
Methodism To-day.....	607	Paraguay: Chronicle.....	578
Mexican Catholics Astrir. (Ed.).....	182	Parish Priests, Removal of.....	62
Mexico: Chronicle, 3; 26; 50; 74; 98; 122; 146; 170; 194; 218; 242; 266; 290; 314; 338; 362; 386; 410; 434; 458; 482; 506; 530; 578; 602; Latin America and the United States, 6; Warning of President Taft, 25; And Japan, 25; Presidents, 137; Exciting Times, 228; Madero (Ed.), 35; Cathedral, 456; Why the Cabinet Resigned (Ed.), 17; Diaz (Ed.), 65; Don Prospero (Ed.), 88; Fortress of Ulloa, 206; What the Maderists Feared (Ed.), 231; Minister of Government (Ed.), 423; Political Situation (Ed.), 449; Sixteenth Century Education.....	486; 559	Parmentier Memorial Commercial School.....	117
Mexico, New: The Penitentes.....	10	Parochial School, The.....	258
Mickiewicz.....	21	Passionist Fathers in Brooklyn Diocese.....	23
Militia of Christ for Social Service.....	550	Peace: International Movement, 5; 294; Sir Robert Perks in America (Ed.), 62; Anti-German Sentiment in America, 111; Peace Among Nations (Ed.), 398; 602; Treaties, 433; Movement, The Pope and the, 605; Society, Another Word to the (Ed.), 160; Harbor, Hawaii.....	338
Mission Fields: Church of Kidangur, India, 12; France and the Eastern Missions, 34; China, 57; The Fishery Coast, 82; Concerning Caribs, 89; Central Africa, 102; Ancient Shrine in India, 130; Jamaica, W. I., 156; East Africa, 166; Madura, 225; Franciscans in Madras, 239; American Seminary, 257; "An Old Almanack," S. Africa, 1854, 306; Portuguese in S. Africa, 418; India, 443; China, 490; Manual Training Schools in India.....	611	Pelagic Sealing Prohibited.....	385
		Penitentes, The.....	10
		Pennsylvania German Catholic Societies.....	359
		Pensions, United States. (Ed.).....	39
		Perjury in the Courts.....	511
		Perks, Sir Robert, on Peace. (Ed.).....	62
		Perry, Commodore: Official Letter.....	425
		Persia: Chronicle.....	436
		Phenix, The (Religion in France). (Ed.).....	183
		Philadelphia Catholics Generous.....	23
		Philippine Islands: Chronicle, 74; 194; Independence, 74; Tobacco, 194; Teachers' Assembly at Manila, 382; Protestant Workers. (Ed.).....	590
		Pilgrimage to Croagh Patrick.....	456
		Pittsburgh Library Catalogue (Ed.), 232; (Ed.)	280
		Pius X: Encyclical on Portugal, 213; Illness (Ed.), 446; (Ed.) 470; Canadian Hierarchy, 503; Freethinker's Opinion, 527; Policy,

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

	PAGE		PAGE
delphia (Mr. M. I. J. Griffin), 599; Memorial to Father Jogues (Amsterdam Evening Recorder).....	623	Ercilla, R. P. Eustaquio Ugarte de, S.J.: España Eucaristica.....	476
AUTHORS		Feige, Abbé P.: La Piété, le Zèle.....	21
Addams, Jane: Twenty Years at Hull House..	20	Ferreres, Juan B., S.J.: La Frecuente Comu- nión y Diaria y la Primera Comunión segun las Enseñanzas y Prescripciones de Pío X.....	354
Almeyer, Rev. Henry B.: "Sermons Delivered Before Mixed Congregations".....	236	Fisher, Joseph R.: The End of the Irish Par- liament.....	428
Antoni, Canon: Why Not Receive Communion Every Day You Hear Mass?.....	20	Foerster, Dr. Fr. W.: The Art of Living.....	450
Ayscough, John: Hurdcott.....	618	Fogazzaro and His Novels.....	401
Bakewell, Paul: A Conspiracy and Its Agency	428	Poster, E. M.: A Room With a View.....	547
Baumgartner, Rev. Alexander, S.J.: Die Ge- schichte der Weltliteratur VI Band, Die Italienische Literatur.....	139	Fowler, W. Warde, M.A.: The Religious Ex- perience of the Roman People.....	330
Beissel, Stephen, S.J.: Geschichte der Verehr- ung Marias im XVI und XVII Jahrhundert.....	63	French, Allen: The Siege of Boston.....	91
Belloe, Hilaire: The French Revolution.....	426	Gabrini, Rev. Francis, S.J.: Meditations on the Blessed Virgin.....	162
Benson, Robert Hugh: Non-Catholic Denom- inations, 44; None Other Gods, 20; The Dawn of All.....	498	Gallerani, Rev. S.J.: Jesus All Great.....	19
Bowden, Henry Sebastian: Mementoes of the English Martyrs and Confessors for Every Day in the Year.....	450	Gerrard, Rev. Thomas J.: Marriage and Parent- hood.....	68
Bredier, Abbé: A Papal Envoy During the Reign of Terror.....	116	Gamble, F. W.: The Animal World.....	499
Brothers of Mary: Manual of Christian Peda- gogy.....	259	Garold, Rev. R. P., S.J.: Freddy Carr and His Friends; Freddy Carr's Adventures.....	186
Brummer, Sidney David, Ph.D.: Political His- tory of the State of New York During the Period of the Civil War.....	475	Gasquet, Abbot: Leaves From My Diary.....	401
Bruneau, Rev. Joseph, S.S., D.D.: (Ed.) Childhood of Christ According to the Ca- nonical Gospels.....	116	Gautherot, Gustave: L'Assemblée Constituante Gentilini, Bernard: Chistes y Verdades.....	426
Buckler, Reginald, O.P.: Spiritual Instruc- tions.....	427	Gerard, Helen: (Trans.) Little Cities of Italy.....	283
Buckrose, J. E.: Down Our Street.....	547	Gilmore, Florence: A Romance of Old Jeru- salem.....	67
Burnett, Frances Hodgson: The Secret Garden	570	Ginzberg, Louis: Legends of the Jews.....	44
Buseti, P. Antonio, S.J.: Vocabolario Italiano- Albanese.....	570	Goodman, Francis: The Reunion of Christen- dom.....	428
Butler, Sir William: An Autobiography.....	369	Graham, Rev. Father: Where We Got the Bible Green, Alice Stoford: The Irish Nationality.....	548
Byrne, Rev. Andrew: Short Catechism for Those About to Marry.....	236	Greene, Frances Nimmo: Heroes of Chivalry.....	235
Campbell, Rev. Thomas J., S.J.: Pioneer Priests of North America. Vol. III.....	285; 307; 333; 571	Griffith, W. L.: The Dominion of Canada.....	498
Canals, Salvador: Los Sucesos de España en 1900.....	475	Grisar, Rev. Hartmann, S.J.: History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages.....	260
Chater, Arthur G.: Love and Marriage.....	478	Hanly, T. Frank: My Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.....	595
Chatterton, Gilbert K.: Alarms and Discus- sions.....	138	Hastings, Rev. James, D.D.: The Great Texts of the Bible.....	380
Chianciano, Rev. Joseph, S.J.: The Mystery of the Most Holy Eucharist and Human Reason	60	Herbigny, Michael D.: Un Newman Russe, Vladimir Soloviev.....	284
Churchill, Abby P.: Birds in Literature.....	220	Hickey, J. S., O.Cist.: Summula Philosophiæ Scholasticæ. Vol. II. Cosmologia et Psy- chologia.....	236
Clarke, Frances: Her Journey's End.....	68	Hogan, Rev. John: A Compendium of Cate- chetical Instruction.....	499
Clary, Rt. Rev. Henry W., D.D.: God or No God in the Schools.....	548	Howe, Rev. George E.: Catechist.....	499
Coghlan, Philip, C.P.: Gemma Galgani.....	548	James, Grace: Joan of Arc.....	235
Coleman, P. J.: Little Rhymes for Little Folks	66	Jones, Arthur Edward, S.J.: Wendake Ehen, or, Old Huronia.....	619
Coler, Bird S.: The Residuary Sect.....	187	Jones, Rev. Edward: The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church.....	670
Coloma, Don Luis: A True Hidalgo.....	380	Keating, T. P.: Science of Education.....	259
Conway, Rev. Placid O.P.: Saint Thomas Aquinas.....	353	Kelly, M. T.: Paul of Tarsus; John the Be- loved.....	20
Coppens, Rev. Charles, S.J.: Who Are the Jesuits?.....	139	Kempis, Thomas: Imitation of Christ.....	234
Cortissoz, Royal: John La Farge.....	150	Keppeler, Dr. Paul W. Von: Más Alegria.....	284
Costelloe, Rev. Lawrence, O.F.M.: Saint Bona- venture, Minister General of the Franciscan Order.....	353	Key, Ellen: Love and Marriage.....	68
Crawford, F. Marion: Wandering Ghosts.....	114	Kipling, Rudyard: Reward and Fairies.....	185
Crawford, Virginia M.: Switzerland of To-day	379	Kirk, Dolly Williams: Heroes of Chivalry.....	235
Cullen, Joachim M.: The Biblical Book.....	500	Lacey, T. A.: A Roman Diary and Other Docu- ments Relating to the Papal Inquiry into English Ordinands, MDCCCXCXV.....	90
Cunningham, Rev. F. A.: The War Upon Re- ligion.....	187	Lago y Gonzales, Doctor Don Manuel: Manual de Estudios Biblicos Arreglado para los países de Lengua Castellana.....	524
Currier, Rev. Charles Warren: Lands of the Southern Cross.....	353	Lamon, Ward Hill: Recollections of Abraham Lincoln.....	163
Cuthbert, Father, O.S.F.C.: St. Francis and Poverty.....	20	Lanyon, Helen: The Hill o' Dreams and Other Verses.....	66
D'Arras, Rev. Henry, S.J.: Louise Augusta Lechmere.....	548	Lauffer, Berthold: Christian Art in China.....	42
Dease, Charlotte: Children of the Gael.....	548	Laurent, Père: The Mission of Pain.....	427
Dickinson, Edward: The Education of a Music Lover.....	475	Le Plastrier, Constance May: Heirs in Exile.....	595
Donahoe, Daniel Joseph: Early Christian Hymns.....	308	Lilly, William S.: Idola Fori: An Examination of Seven Questions of the Day.....	32
Donat, Joseph, S.J.: Summa Philosophiæ Christianæ.....	595	London, Jack: Adventure.....	67
Donnelly, Rt. Rev. Mgr. E.: (Trans.) Boniface VIII.....	569	Loughlan, T.: (Trans.) Jesus All Great.....	19
Donnelly, Rev. Francis P.: The Second Spring, 211; The Heart of the Gospel.....	211	Macdonald, Rt. Rev. Alexander, D.D.: Medi- tations on the Blessed Virgin, 162; Religious Questions of the Day, or, Some Modernistic Theories and Tendencies Exposed. Vol. III.....	235
Doss, Padre Adolfo de, S.J.: La Perla de las Virtudes.....	571	MacElean, Rev. John C., S.J.: The Poems of David O'Bruidair. Part I.....	113
Drummond, Hamilton: The Justice of the King.....	547	McGowan, Patrick F.: Journal of the Ameri- can Irish Historical Society.....	596
Dudon, Paul: Lamennais et le Saint Siège. (1820-1834).....	427	McLorg, M. Craven: The Most Holy Euc- harist.....	20
Duffy, Susan Gavan: (Trans.) The Old Home and Other Stories.....	620	McSweeney, Rev. E. F. X.: The Story of the Mountains.....	68
Dupont, Etienne: Les Pèlerinages au Mont St. Michel.....	499	Malone, Rev. J. I.: The Purple East.....	284
Durand, A., S.J.: The Childhood of Christ According to the Canonical Gospels.....	116	Maurel, André: Little Cities of Italy.....	283
Dwight, Thomas, M.D., LL.D.: Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist.....	569	Maze, Sancier H.: L'Erreur Primaire.....	404
Ely, Helena Rutherford: The Practical Flower Garden.....	354	Meline, Mary E.: The Story of the Mountain.....	68
		Mercedes: Heart Songs, Verses.....	66
		Meschler, Rev. Moritz, S.J.: Three Funda- mental Principles of the Spiritual Life, 427; Life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga.....	619
		Metcalf and Rafter's Language Series.....	284
		Milburn, James B.: The Restored Hierarchy.....	571
		Muelemeester, Arthur de: St. Cecilia's Hymn Book.....	402
		Mulhall, Marion McMorrough: Beginnings, or Glimpses of Vanished Civilizations.....	284
		Mulholland, Clara: The Little House Under the Hill.....	380
		Mulholland, Rosa: Father Tim, 43; The O'Shaughnessy Girls.....	331
		Mullan, Rev. A. J. Elder, S.J.: La Congrega- zione Mariana Studiata nei Documenti.....	115
		Mullet, Rev. John E.: The Chief Ideas of the Baltimore Catechism.....	63
		Newman, John Henry: The Second Spring.....	211
		Northcote, Rev. P. M.: The Idea of Develop- ment.....	43
		O'Brien, R. Barry: John Bright, A Monograph	199
		O'Meara, Kathleen: Frederick Ozanam.....	91
		O'Neill, Francis: Irish Dance Music.....	548
		O'Neill, Rev. George, S.J.: The Clouds Around Shakespeare.....	138
		O'Sullivan, Patrick: Irish Songs in English and Gaelic; Irish-American Patriotic Songs.....	548
		Ovington, Mary White: Half a Man.....	331
		Page, W. Humphrey: (Trans.) Meditations and Instructions on the Blessed Virgin.....	162
		Peck, Ethel: (Trans.) The Art of Living.....	450
		Perigny, Cte. M. de: Les Cinq Républiques de l'Amérique Centrale.....	380
		Philippa, Mother: The Saints of the Mass.....	571
		Ping, L. G.: The Mission of Pain.....	427
		Power, William F., S.J.: The King's Bell and Other Verses.....	66
		Putnam, Ruth: William the Silent.....	308
		Raupert, J. Godfrey: Back to Rome.....	548
		Raymond-Barker: Louise Augusta Lechmere.....	548
		Richman, Irving Berdine: California Under Spain and Mexico.....	260
		Rickaby, Rev. Joseph, S.J.: How I Made My Retreat.....	571
		Rolland, Romain: Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui.....	597
		Ruvile, Dr. Albert Von: Zurück zur heiligen Kirche.....	178; 200
		Ryder, Rev. Henry Ignatius Dudley: Essays.....	260
		Ryder, Sophia: A Conversion and a Vocation. Sister Mary of the Sacred Heart.....	283
		Schlathoelter, Rev. Louis F.: Daily Com- munion.....	20
		Schortensack, G.: (Trans.) Back to Holy Church.....	178; 200
		Scott, Franklin William: Newspapers and Pe- riodicals of Illinois, 1814-1879.....	498
		Scully, Dom Vincent, C.R.L.: A Medieval Mystic.....	450
		Shao-Yang, Lin: Chinese Appeal to Christen- dom Concerning Christian Missions, A.....	236
		Sheehan, Canon, D.D.: The Queen's Fillet.....	547
		Shewan, Alexander: The Lay of Dolon.....	371
		Singleton, Esther: A Guide to Great Cities for Young Travelers and Others.....	499
		Spillman, Rev. José, S.J.: La Flor Maravil- losa de Woxindon.....	331
		Sprague, Roger: From Western China to the Golden Gate.....	619
		Stacpoole-Kenny: Saint Charles Borromeo.....	163
		Stevenson, Robert Louis: Father Damien.....	210
		Stuart, Janet Erskine: The Education of Cath- olic Girls.....	594
		Swan, Caroline Davenport: The Unfading Light.....	66
		Swift, Lindsay: William Lloyd Garrison.....	331
		Tabb, Rev. John B.: Later Lyrics.....	66
		Tatlock, Father, S.J.: Manual of Latin Pho- nography.....	548
		Taylor, Hannis: The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution.....	307
		Taylor, John W.: The Doorkeeper and Other Poems.....	66
		Telch, Rev. Charles: Epitome Theologiæ Moralis.....	500
		Thiriet, Edmond: Loi d'Exil.....	44
		Tosti, Don Louis: Boniface VIII and His Times.....	569
		Turner, William, S.T.D.: Lessons in Logic.....	546
		Tyck, Father Clement, C.R.P.: The English Lourdes.....	162
		Van Der Loor, J. C.: Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones Ordinarias Variis in Linguis.....	211
		Vermeersch, A., S.J.: Meditations and Instruc- tions on the Blessed Virgin.....	162
		Villaverde Felipe: (Trans.) Más Alegria.....	284
		Walsh, James J., M.D.: Education, How Old the New.....	451
		Walworth, Rev. Clarence: Early Ritualism in America.....	499
		Ward, Mrs. Wilfrid: The Job Secretary.....	163
		Watts, Mary S.: The Legacy; A Story of a Woman.....	283
		Weld-Blundell, Dom Benedict: The Inner Life and Writings of Dame Gertrude More.....	476
		Whitney, Caspar: Jungle Trails and Jungle People.....	354
		Zenver, Philip: Education in Sexual Physi- ology and Hygiene.....	187
		Zugasti, Rev. Juan Antonio, S.J.: La Esclava del Santísimo, Venerable Madre Sacramento.....	353

BOOKS

PAGE

Adventure	67
Alarms and Discursions.....	138
Animal World, The.....	499
Art of Living, The.....	450
Back to Holy Church.....	178; 200; 548
Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church.....	570
Beginning, or Glimpses of Vanished Civiliza- tions	284
Biblical Book, The.....	500
Birds in Literature	620
Book of Knowledge, The Children's Encyclo- pædia	441
Butler, Lieut. Gen. Sir W. F.	309
California Under Spain and Mexico, 1535-1847	260
Catéchisme ou Brieve Instruction du Chré- tien	452
Catechist	499
Catholic Encyclopedia, The, Vols. X, XI.....	522
Chapter, in Christian Doctrine; Reason the Witness of Faith.....	380
Chief Ideas of the Baltimore Catechism.....	163
Childhood of Christ According to the Canon- ical Gospels	116
Children of the Gael.....	548
Children's Encyclopædia, The.....	441
Chinese Appeal to Christendom Concerning Christian Missions, A.....	236
Chistes y Verdades	139
Christian Art in China.....	42
Clouds Around Shakespeare, The.....	138
Club Notes	211
Compendium of Catechetical Instruction.....	499
Conspiracy and Its Agency, A.....	428
Contemplative Life, The.....	21
Conversion and a Vocation, A. Sister Mary of the Sacred Heart.....	283
Daniele Cortis	401
Dawn of All, The.....	498
Devotions for Communion.....	20
Die Geschichte der Weltliteratur, VI Band.	139
Die Italienische Literatur.....	498
Dominion of Canada, The.....	66
Doorkeeper, and Other Poems, The.....	547
Down Our Street.....	308
Early Christian Hymns.....	499
Early Ritualism in America.....	451
Education, How Old the New.....	187
Education in Sexual Physiology and Hygiene.....	475
Education of a Music Lover.....	594
Education of Catholic Girls.....	546
Encyclopædia Britannica.....	428
293; 365; 394; 413; (Ed.) 470; 473; 521;	162
End of the Irish Parliament, The.....	500
English Lourdes, The.....	476
Epitome Theologiae Moralis.....	260
España Eucarística	210
Essays of Rev. Henry Ignatius Dudley Ryder.	43
Father Damien	54
Father Tim	186
First National Conference of Catholic Charities	186
Freddy Carr and His Friends.....	426
Freddy Carr's Adventures.....	619
French Revolution	331
From Western China to the Golden Gate.....	548
Garrison, William Lloyd.....	68
Gemma Galgani, a Child of the Passion.....	548
Geschichte der Verehrung Marias im XVI und XVII Jahrhundert	548
God or No God in the Schools.....	380
Great Texts of the Bible.....	499
Guide to Great Cities for Young Travelers and Others. Western Europe and Northwestern Europe	331
Half a Man.....	571
Handbook of Schools.....	211
Heart of the Gospel: Traits of the Sacred Heart	66
Heart Songs. Verses.....	595
Heirs in Exile.....	68
Her Journey's End.....	235
Heroes of Chivalry.....	66
Hill o' Dreams and Other Verses, The.....	569
History of Pope Boniface VIII and His Times	260
History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages	571
How I Made My Retreat.....	618
Hurdcott	43
Idea of Development, The.....	32
Idola Fori; An Examination of Seven Ques- tions of the Day.....	234
Imitation of Christ.....	476
Inner Life and the Writings of Dame Gertrude More, The, 3 Vols.....	548
Irish-American Patriotic Songs.....	450
Irish Nationality, The.....	548
Irish Songs in English and Gaelic.....	19
Jesus All Great.....	235
Joan of Arc.....	163
Job Secretary, The.....	199
John Bright	150
John La Farge	20
John the Beloved.....	596

Journal of the American Irish Historical So- ciety	596
Jungle Trails and Jungle People.....	354
Justice of the King, The.....	547
King's Bell and Other Verses, The.....	66
La Comunión Frecuente y Diaria y la Primera Comunión segun las enseñanzas y Prescrip- ciones de Pio X.....	354
La Congregazione Mariana Studiata nei Docu- menti	115
La Esclava del Santísimo, Venerable Madre Sacramento	353
La Flor Maravillosa de Woxindon.....	331
Lamennais et le Saint Siege. (1820-1834).....	427
Lands of the Southern Cross.....	353
Language Series	284
La Perla de las Virtudes.....	571
La Piété, le Zèle.....	21
L'Assemblée Constituante	426
Later Lyrics	66
Lay of Dolon.....	371
Leaves From My Diary.....	401
Lectures on the History of Religions. Vol. V.....	595
Legacy, The. A Story of a Woman.....	283
Legends of the Jews.....	44
"Leila"	401
L'Erreur Primaire.....	404
Les Cinq Républiques de l'Amerique Centrale	380
Les Pèlerinages au Mont St. Michel.....	499
Lessons in Logic.....	546
Life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga.....	619
Little Cities of Italy.....	283
Little House Under the Hill, The.....	380
Little Rhymes for Little Folks.....	66
Loi D'Exil	44
Los Sucesos de España en 1909.....	475
Louise Augusta Lechmere.....	548
Love and Marriage.....	68
Manual de Estudios Bíblicos Arreglado para los Países de Lengua Castellana.....	524
Manual of Christian Pedagogy.....	259
Manual of Latin Phonography.....	548
Marriage and Parenthood. The Catholic Ideal	68
Martyrologium Romanum; Sixth Edition.....	571
Más Alegria	284
Medieval Mystic, A.....	450
Meditations and Instructions on the Blessed Virgin	162
Meditations on the Blessed Virgin.....	162
Mementoes of the English Martyrs and Con- fessors for Every Day in the Year.....	450
Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones Ordinarias	211
Varis in Linguis	427
Mission of Pain, The.....	497
Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui.....	597
My Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.....	595
Mystery of the Most Holy Eucharist and Hu- man Reason, The.....	20
Newspapers and Periodicals of Illinois, 1814- 1879	498
Non-Catholic Denominations.....	44
None Other Gods.....	20
Old Home and Other Stories.....	620
Origin and Growth of the American Constitu- tion	307
O'Shaughnessy Girls, The.....	331
Ozanam, Frederick	91
Papal Envoy During the Reign of Terror, A.....	116
Paul of Tarsus.....	20
Piccolo Mondo Antico	401
Pioneer Priests of North America. Vol. III 285; 307; 333;	571
Poems of David O'Bruadar. Part I.....	113
Political History of the State of New York During the Period of the Civil War.....	475
Practical Flower Garden, The.....	354
Priest, The	21
Purple East, The.....	284
Queen's Fillet, The.....	547
Recollections of Abraham Lincoln. 1847-1865.	163
Religious Experience of the Roman People.....	380
Religious Questions of the Day, or, Some Mod- ernistic Theories and Tendencies Exposed.....	235
Residuary Sect, The.....	187
Restored Hierarchy, The.....	571
Reunion of Christendom, The.....	428
Rewards and Fairies.....	185
Roman Diary and Other Documents Relating to the Papal Inquiry into English Ordina- tions, MDCCCXCV. A.....	90
Romance of Old Jerusalem, A.....	67
Room With a View.....	547
Ruysbroeck, Blessed John.....	450
Saint, The	401
Saint Bonaventure	253
Saint Charles Borromeo	163
Saint Thomas Aquinas	253
Saints of the Mass.....	571
Science of Education	259
Second Spring, The.....	211
Secret Garden, The.....	570
Sermons Delivered Before Mixed Congrega- tions	236
Short Catechism for Those About to Marry.....	236
Siege of Boston, The.....	91
Spirit of St. Francis de Sales, The.....	20
Spiritual Instruction	427
St. Cecilia's Hymn Book, with Music.....	403
St. Francis and Poverty.....	90

St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland.....	596
Story of the Mountain, The.....	68
Summa Philosophiæ Christianæ.....	595
Summula Philosophiæ Scholasticæ. Vol. II. Cosmologia et Psychologia.....	236
Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas. Part I.....	379
Switzerland of To-day.....	379
Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist.....	569
Three Fundamental Principles of the Spiritual Life	427
True Hidalgo, A.....	380
Twenty Years at Hull House.....	20
Unfading Light, The.....	66
Un Newman Russe, Vladimir Soloviev.....	284
Vocabolario Italiano-Albanese	570
Wandering Ghosts	114
War Upon Religion, The.....	187
Wendake Ehen, or, Old Huronia.....	619
Where We Got the Bible.....	548
Why Not Receive Communion Every Day You Hear Mass?	20
William the Silent.....	308
Who Are the Jesuits?.....	138
Zurück zur heiligen Kirche.....	178; 200

OBITUARY

Boorman, Rev. Martial, S.I.....	215
Buckler, Rev. Edmund, O.P.....	72
Butler, Very Rev. Joseph, O.F.M.....	408
Campbell, Rev. Louis A.....	72
Carter, Senator Thomas H.....	578
Clarke, Richard H.....	191
Conmy, Rt. Rev. Dr., Bishop of Killala.....	552
Cronin, Rev. E. W.....	119
Cronin, Rev. John B., C.S.S.R.....	144
De Bouthillier-Chauvigny, Marquis.....	360
Digby, Very Rev. Mother M. Josephine.....	167; 175
Doonan, Rev. James, S.J.....	48
Dornhege, Rev. Bernard.....	480
Dore, Rev. John F.....	599
Dwight, Dr. Thomas.....	552; 586
Flynn, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Dennis J.....	336
Forget, Hon. Louis Joseph.....	24
Gordon, Rt. Rev. William, D.D.....	264
Gruscha, Cardinal	480
Hanselman, Rev. Thomas J. M.....	384
Healy, Rev. Gabriel A.....	336
Horning, Rev. Joseph M., S.J.....	504
Klein, Bruno Oscar	288
Krogh-Tønning, Dr. Karl Knud.....	104
Lammel, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Anthony.....	528
McEvay, Archbishop	144
McGill, Very Rev. James, C.M.....	167
McGinney, Rev. Patrick J., S.J.....	48
McGuire, Rev. Hugh.....	504
Moran, Cardinal	472; 476
Mother Borgia Kelly.....	240
Mother Mary Agnes.....	72
Mother Mary Bernard Comerford.....	437
Mother Mary Loretto Quinlan.....	192
Mother Mary Philip.....	240
Mother M. Rose Whitty.....	386
Mother Mary of St. John Baptist.....	240
Mother Sarah Jones.....	576
Mother Scholastica Kerst.....	288
Mother Theodrine	24
O'Connor, Archbishop of Toronto.....	312
Outram, Lady	408
Pagnani, Rt. Rev. Clement, O.S.B.....	421
Paquin, Brother Ulric, S.J.....	215
Pelletier, Sr. Charles A. P.....	119
Price, Rev. John.....	48
Rodock, Rev. John, S.J.....	48
Roth, Edward	431
Sister Alphonse	240
Sister Francis Xavier Provost.....	432
Sister Loretto Whelan.....	552
Sister M. Cecilia O'Connor.....	384
Sister M. Loyola Breagerton.....	384
Sister Madeline O'Brien.....	384
Sister St. Magdalen of Calvary Wall.....	215
Sister St. Paula Lane.....	215
Smith, James	168
Smith, Rev. William St. Elmo.....	96
Taschereau, Sir Elzéar.....	72
Teehy, Rev. Dr., C.S.B.....	312
Tehan, Rev. J. F. X., S.J.....	119
White, Very Rev. Mgr. William J., D.D.....	528
Young, Mr. George W.....	312

ADVERTISERS

- Artists' Materials
Winsor & Newton, Ltd.
- Banks
Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank.
- Bookcases, etc.
The Globe-Wernicke Co.
- Brushes
E. J. Kelly.
- Camps for Boys
Berkshire Boys' Camp—Namaschaug Camp—
St. Ann's Camp for Boys—Camp Portinimicut
(for Girls).
- China, Glassware, etc.
O'Beirne Brothers.
- Dentists
Drs. Burke & Burke.
- Dry Goods
Abraham & Strauss—W. H. Baker Linen Co.
—Brokaw Bros.
- Duplicator
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co.
- Ecclesiastical Wares, etc.
The Gorham Company—The W. J. Feeley
Company—Meneely Bell Co.—Joseph Sibbel
Studio—Fr. Pustet & Co.—Benziger Bros.—
Mayer & Co.—Peter Theis' Sons.
- Educational Institutions
Academy of St. Joseph—Convent of the Holy Child—College of St. Catherine—College of St. Elizabeth—Fordham University—Georgetown University—Holy Cross Academy and High School—Holy Cross College—Loyola School—Helen A. Hayes—Mount Saint Joseph-on-the-Wissahickon—Seton Hall College—St.
Mary's College, St. Marys, Kan.—Spring Hill
College—Winona Seminary—Drake Business School—Clason Point Military Academy—College and Academy of the Incarnate Word—
- Carlton Academy—College of St. Genevieve—
Laurel Hall School—Marymount—Marquette University—Rosemount Hall—St. Mary's College and Academy, Monroe, Mich.—Stella Viae College, Rome—St. Joseph College, Bard-town, Ky.—Saint Louis University—Saint Joseph's Academy, St. Louis—American Conservatory of Music—Loyola University—Catholic Summer School—New York University—Convent of the Cenacle—All Hallows Collegiate Institute—College of Mt. St. Vincent—Georgetown Convent of the Visitation—Hume
School—Holy Angels Academy—Immaculata
Seminary—Mt. Saint Agnes College—Mt. St.
Joseph College and Academy—Paine Uptown
Business School—Sacred Heart College—St.
Ann's Academy—St. Mary-of-the-Woods—St.
Mary's College and Academy.
- Electrical—General
James Reilly's Sons' Co.
- Flooring—Interlocking Rubber Tiling and Mats
Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company—Cary
Mfg. Company (Steel Mats).
- Fences
Enterprise Foundry and Fence Co.
- Groceries
L. J. Callanan—New York Bottling Company
—Barnston Tea Company—Royal Baking Powder Co.—Enoch Morgan's Sons Co.—National Biscuit Company—Capital City Dairy Company "Butterine"—Anheuser-Busch "Malt Nutrine"—Wine Company.
- Hatter
E. M. Knox.
- Inks, Mucilage, etc.
Chas. M. Higgins & Co.
- Investments
Mercantile Trust Co., St. Louis, Mo.—W. N.
Coler & Co.
- Kitchen Utensils
James Y. Watkins & Son.
- Printing
The Meany Printing Company.
- Photographer
Sarony.
- Publishers
Robert Appleton & Company—Benziger Bros.
—P. J. Kennedy & Sons—Dodd, Mead & Co.—
Chas. Scribner's Sons—Longmans, Green &
Company—Joseph F. Wagner—The Mission
Church Press—Irish Messenger of the Sacred Heart—Leo Kelly & Co.—P. Murphy & Son.
- Refrigerators
McCray Refrigerator Company.
- Rolling Partitions
James G. Wilson Mfg. Co.
- Sanitariums
Sacred Heart Sanitarium.
- Shipbuilders
Ward & Company.
- Shoes
James S. Coward.
- Silk—Sewing
M. Hemmway & Sons
- Stationers—Society
Dempsey & Carroll.
- Travel
Miss Agnes J. Kelly—Miss Rathe.
- Tree Expert
Davey Tree Expert Co., Inc.
- Telephone
New York Telephone Company.
- Tobacco
The Surbrug Company.
- Typewriter Supplies
Snelling & Son.
- Vaseline
Chesebrough Mfg. Co.
- Window Decoration
Wm. B. Quaile.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 1

(Price 10 Cents)

APRIL 15, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 105

CHRONICLE

Sixty-second Congress—Message to Congress—Senate Democratic Leader—Socialist Reverses—New Coal Roads Decision—Mexico—Nicaragua—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Italy—France—Belgium—Portugal—Germany—Austria—Hungary—Greece1-4

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Peace Movement—On the Frontier—Spanish Political Chieftains—The Penitentes—Guatemala Next5-12

IN MISSION FIELDS

The Church of Kidangur, India12-13

CORRESPONDENCE

Confusion in Official Italy—Modern Foes in Hungary—Organization Work Among French Catholics—Catholic Protest in Vienna13-15

EDITORIAL

Allcluia—Praise from Sir Rupert—Jubilee of

Italian Unity—Why the Mexican Cabinet Resigned—Unfit Novels—The Leaven is Working. 16-19

THE FLEUR DE LIS19

LITERATURE

Some Devotional Books—Twenty Years at Hull House—None Other Gods—The Priest—The Contemplative Life—La Piété, Le Zèle—Notes—Books Received19-22

EDUCATION

Commemorative Celebration of Lord Baltimore's Landing in Maryland—Safeguarding Children's Morals—The School Question in Belgium—Surprise for Belgian Socialists—Godless Schools in India22-23

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies—Jubilee Mass for Night-Workers—New Passionist Foundation in the Diocese of Brooklyn—

Generous Philadelphia Catholics—Catholic Chaplains at the San Antonio Maneuver Camp—Bequests by the late Rev. B. McKeany23

SOCIOLOGY

England's Matrimonial Laws—Successful Day Bakery Experiment23-24

ECONOMICS

The Tariff and the Farmer24

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Organ of Militant Socialism24

SCIENCE

Extending Wireless Communication at Sea—Phosphate Beds in Montana—To Prevent Clinkering in Coal—Electrical Test for Boiled Feed-Water24

OBITUARY

Mother Theodorine—Hon. Louis Joseph Forget24

CHRONICLE

Sixty-second Congress.—The new Congress met with a Democratic House, the first in sixteen years, and with a Senate in which the balance of power rests in the hands of insurgent Republicans, many of whom are openly opposed to Administration policies. The political complexion of the Congress is as follows: Senate—Republicans, 50; Democrats, 41, and one vacancy from Colorado. House—Democrats, 228; Republicans, 160; Socialist, 1, and two vacancies, one from the Ninth Iowa and one from the Second Pennsylvania district. For the first time a Socialist took his seat in the House—Victor L. Berger, of Milwaukee. Nearly 500 bills were introduced in the House on the opening day, a large number of them relating to the tariff. Representative Champ Clark, of Missouri, was elected Speaker, and Representative Mann, of Illinois, Republican leader of the House. In the Senate the insurgent element gained a liberal concession in an award of four places on the committee on committees.

Message to Congress.—The President sent a message of only 600 words to Congress urging early action on the reciprocity agreement with Canada. That is the only topic mentioned. He reviews briefly the history of the agreement, adverts to its purely economic and commercial character, and to the widespread approval with which, when its scope became known, it was received by the entire country. He mentions also the action of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-first Congress, which confirmed the agreement as negotiated with the representatives of the Dominion of Canada and the failure of the measure in the Senate, and concludes with the statement that he bases this message upon deference to popular sentiment and duty to the great masses of the American people. If Chairman Underwood can have his way, the reciprocity bill will go before the House in a few days. In the Senate the measure grows in strength. No one assumes for a moment that Congress will not pass it.

Senate Democratic Leader.—Senator Thomas S. Martin, of Virginia, was selected at the Democratic caucus, on April 7, as permanent caucus chairman and minority leader during the present Congress. He received 21 out of the 37 votes, 16 going to Senator Benjamin F. Shively, of Indiana, who was then elected vice-chairman. Three Democratic Senators, among them Senator Shively, were absent owing to illness, and Senator Martin did not vote. A statement issued by Senator Owen on behalf of Senators who voted against Mr. Martin, says that those who supported Shively did so because they are militant progressive Democrats, determined to enforce the policies of the national progressive Democracy, and they feared Senator Martin would not be regarded as progressive as the country had a right to expect. Scrutiny of the list of those who would not vote for Mr. Martin discloses that the name of every Northern Democratic Senator, including even Senator O'Gorman, of New York, is in it. This sectional division was undoubtedly accidental, the Springfield Republican remarks, so far as any sectional issue is concerned. But the division reveals the fact that Democratic conservatism in the Senate has its stronghold in the South, with Senator Bailey, of Texas, its ablest and most aggressive champion.

Socialist Reverses.—The results of the election in Milwaukee show a remarkable set-back for the Socialists. The majority against the Socialist candidate for judge was 14,000, a figure never before reached even in the most one-sided campaign. The Socialist nominees for the School Board were defeated chiefly by the votes of women. There was a heavy falling off of the Socialist vote throughout the State of Kansas. The whole Socialist ticket in Wichita, where the movement was strongest, was defeated.

New Coal Roads Decision.—The Supreme Court has widened and strengthened its ruling on the Hepburn act, regulating interstate commerce, by a new decision in the case of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. According to the decision, carrier corporations may own stock in a commodities company and carry its products without violating the law; but when it is manifest that the carrier manages the business of the commodity company and unites the operations of the two concerns, it comes within the prohibition of the law, and is liable to prosecution. Furthermore, any carrier may be prosecuted when the facts show that there exists a plan to do by indirection that which the commodities clause of the Hepburn act prohibits.

Mexico.—President Diaz presented a valuable gold medal to each member of the retiring cabinet.—One of the first cases presented to Demetrio Sodi, the new Minister of Justice, for his consideration was that of a justice of the peace who had been sentenced to two years in prison and loss of civil rights for ten years, for the crime of burglary. After a year behind the bars, the criminal secured his release and resumed his functions as justice of the peace, which he is still discharging.—The prospect for peace by the change of ministry is not so bright. Francisco I. Madero is attempting to obtain from foreign governments the rights of belligerents for his followers; he declares that the revolution is "just, patriotic and necessary," and binds himself to observe Treaty obligations contracted prior to November 10, 1910.—Many acts of brigandage, such as attacks on isolated plantations, looting store-houses and stealing horses, are reported from districts remote from the scene of actual revolutionary effort.

Nicaragua.—President Estrada has dissolved the Constitutional Convention and has ordered fresh elections for another Convention. The Catholic element was uppermost in the body just dissolved, and seems to have adopted a too uncompromising attitude towards the Liberals, who had been in control for many years.

Canada.—Senator Louis Joseph Forget died suddenly at Nice, France.—Immigration is on a large scale, all incoming ships are full and all places taken up to May 31.—The coal miners' strike in Alberta and Eastern British Columbia involves 13 mines and 7,000 miners.—Harrod's Stores, London, Eng., are opening in Calgary a branch costing $1,500,000.—Sheldon, the blind pool operator, has been returned from Pittsburg. A strong effort was made to prevent his extradition by means of charges of embezzlement, etc., in the United States, which the Pittsburg grand jury ignored.—The revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31 was 117 millions. Out of this, 24 millions were spent on railways and 11½ millions on other public works, 3 millions excepted, which was added to the public debt. Nevertheless there was a surplus of 30½ millions over all expenditure.—Should the reciprocity agreement stand, France and England will ask from the United States the privileges of "the most favored nation clause" in their treaties. Similar demands will be made on Canada by several nations.—Canada is excluded from the new Anglo-Japanese Commercial treaty. The Canadian Government will make its own arrangements with Japan.

Great Britain.—Mr. Bonar Law won the safe Unionist seat of Bootle, Lancashire, by 2,194 votes in a total poll of 17,758. Although some 2,000 more voters were on the roll than at the January general election, the poll was less by 1,065. Then the Unionist majority was 1,085, while in 1906, the year of the great Liberal triumph, it was only 340 in a poll of 15,302. The actual Unionist vote was only 22 more than in January, though their managers claim that the greatest part of the new names on the register are of Unionists. The increased majority, therefore, seems due to Liberal abstention rather than to growing Unionist strength. There is, as yet, no sign of an anti-Liberal reaction.—The German Bagdad Railway Company has renounced the right to build the Persian Gulf section, on condition that German capital shall participate equally with that of any other country in constructing it. This is not quite what England wants. The English idea is exclusive control of the section between Bagdad and the Persian Gulf, as a guarantee that the road shall not be used against India; or, still better, that this section shall not be built.—Mr. H. P. Dickens protests against the idea that the proceeds of the Charles Dickens centenary stamp are to relieve the Dickens family's distress, and suggests that they be used to remedy the injustice of the copyright law, the determination of the matter, however, being left to the trustees. The committee has agreed to his proposal.—The preliminary census report gives the population of India as 315 millions, an increase of 20 millions over the figures of 1901, although during the decade the plague has carried off nearly 10 million persons.—An "all-British shopping week," in which only British goods were bought and sold, has been held in the chief cities. The business done is reported to have been very large.—The Cunard Company, which passed its dividend last year, has declared a 5 per cent. dividend for the year just ended. The total profits were close on one million sterling. The new ship for the New York route is to be slightly larger than the White Star Titanic, and of a type medium between it and the Mauretania.—The committee stage of the House of Lords bill began on April 3. A thousand amendments are put down against it. The Government, nevertheless, expects to send it to the Upper House by the middle of May.—While Mr. Athelstan Riley, well-known as the lieutenant of Lord Halifax in church matters, was pulling down an old manor-house on his property in the Island of Jersey, he found a lot of ancient urns filled with guineas of Charles II. The value of the find is said to be £250,000.

Ireland.—A practical movement has been inaugurated by the Bishop and priests of Wexford against the importation, sale or use of objectionable and demoralizing literature. It is stated that "22 tons of printed matter, much of it unfit for the eye of a Christian man, most of it unfit for the eyes of children and destructive to the Catholic mind, are landed weekly on our shores." The Bishops have denounced this literature in their Lenten pastorals, but now it is proposed by organized lectures in halls and churches and the organized action of Catholic societies and political and public bodies to carry on a crusade against these importations.—Mr. Dillon again brought before Parliament the grievances of Intermediate education in Ireland, which, owing to the falling off in the excise grants, is practically bankrupt. "England received an additional grant of $3,500,000, but Ireland not a farthing; and while Irish Intermediate students had increased 50 per cent. since 1900, the grant had decreased $100,000 annually." Mr. Hobhouse promised to compensate for the fall in the excise rates and to make an additional grant.—It was a Nationalist member, Mr. Swift McNeil, Professor of Constitutional Law in the National University, who pointed out to the Unionists the constitutional necessity of obtaining permission from the King to introduce the House of Lords Reform Bill, as it proposes to withdraw his royal prerogative to create and summon peers.—Lord Ashton is collecting a huge fund for gathering and transmitting Irish Protestant grievances in aid of Mr. Balfour's anti-Home Rule campaign. His methods have been discounted in the courts.

Italy.—The Camorra, according to an Italian sociologist, Lémonon, is a secret self-constituted police, to which all Naples, even the street peddler, pays money-tribute for protection. At the same time, for pay, it will be the agent for any scheme of private vengeance, murder included. Its influence over the lower classes is unbounded.—The new Cabinet includes the Socialist, Bisolati. He has been made minister of Agriculture. The Sera of Milan reports that the famous Mgr. Bonomelli, the Bishop of Cermona, expresses himself as gratified by the appointment, because Bisolati has never dealt in real anti-clericalism, and he adds that many Catholics, even ecclesiastics, were accustomed to vote for him. The prelate declares that he does not consider the appointment of Bisolati as the forerunner of an anti-clerical bloc. The Osservatore Romano is satisfied, provided Bisolati does not go over to the Masonic party or forgets the social problem he has to solve. On the other hand, Bisolati is assailed by some of his former friends as a deserter.—The Camorrist trial still holds the centre of the stage. The accused asked the Judge to suspend the trial during Holy Week, so that they might attend to their religious duties.—It is announced that Giolitti's ministerial program will consist, 1st, in suffrage for all who have seen military service and all males who are thirty years of age; 2d, compulsory pensions for workmen; 3d, economy in the administration; 4th, complete independence of the State from the Church.

France.—On March 21, at a place called Firminy, near Lyons, a venerable priest named Aulagné, who was seventy years of age, was summoned during the night to a sick call. The three ruffians who had called for him led him to a dark street, beat him unmercifully, robbed him, and then left him for dead on the sidewalk. He succeeded in reaching his house after an hour, but was unable to give any clue which might lead to the discovery of his assailants.—When Waldeck-Rousseau wanted to arouse public sentiment against the Religious Orders he declared that by seizing their establishments the Government would lay its hands on a milliard; that is to say one thousand million francs, or two hundred million dollars. Waldeck-Rousseau is dead, and the spoliation has been accomplished; but instead of the stupendous sum that excited the cupidity of the enemies of Christianity, the Government admits that it has gained by the crime only the paltry sum of thirty million francs, or six million dollars,—the price of one or two apartment houses in New York.—It will come as a surprise to many that the brother of the famous Félicité de Lammenais is to be canonized. Félicité died in rebellion against the Church. His brother, Jean Robert, who was born in 1780, became, in 1812, the Vicar General of St. Brieuc, and in 1817 founded the Brothers of Christian Education and the Daughters of Providence. After his death a monument was erected in his honor at P'oermel, and on March 22, 1911, the cause of his beatification and canonization was discussed by the Sacred Congregation. In a few weeks the decree will be issued.—On April 8 Cruppi, the minister of Foreign Affairs, admitted to the senate that the situation in Morocco was causing uneasiness. It is rumored that France and Spain are about to send 30,000 soldiers to Africa to be on the ground in case of trouble.

Belgium.—Vandevelde, the Socialist leader, who is nevertheless a very rich man, sent his congratulations to Italy on the occasion of the celebration of its unity in this wise: "Convinced that the establishment of great nationalities is a prelude to the International Aggregation of all the peoples, we Socialists rejoice in the event." The unpleasant inference is that as Belgium is a small nation, Vandevelde and his associates look forward with pleasure to its ultimate effacement. The Bien Public has a grievance against the Catholic members of Parliament for being absent when the congratulatory letter was sent. Had they been present it could have been defeated.—A measure is to be presented to make the University of Liège substantially French, and Ghent Flemish. At Ghent, Flemish will begin to be used in 1916, and will be developed gradually as the needs require. French literature and the philology of the Latin nations will be given in French. For the courses in Flemish there will be optional ones in French. Courses of mining engineering, horticulture, agriculture and veterinary surgery will be added.—The School Bill drawn up by Schollaert is another subject of popular excitement. It is fiercely assailed by the Left, although none of their former privileges are withdrawn. They are angry because justice is being done to Catholics, who really are the main body of the population. The bill insists on compulsory education, but safeguards the principle of liberty by insisting that parents shall have the right to select their school. The school age is up to fourteen, and to insure absolute freedom, an order is given to the head of the family, and he is told: "Take this and send your child to whatever school you wish." On the other hand, there is absolute prohibition against solicitation by any school to obtain pupils. The order entitles the school to so much money.

Portugal.—The Braga administration has ordered the suppression of all reference to the Christian Era in dating documents.—Beginning with April 1, priests and religious organizations with their distinctive emblems are forbidden to take part in funeral processions. Priests are further forbidden to mention political subjects in the pulpit.—All outward manifestations of religious worship were forbidden, but on account of riots in the North, processions were afterwards permitted when there was no danger of breaches of the peace.—The Constitutional Convention is now announced for the end of May.—Reports of monarchist plots and threatened uprisings keep the country in ferment. It is conjectured that they are spread or exaggerated by the Braga clique for the sake of turning the attention of the people away from a study of the masterly incapacity of the administration. As Portugal is commercially a British dependency, the London Times has hinted at intervention in the interest of British merchants and financiers.

Germany.—On March 30, in what is said to have been a brilliant speech, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg discussed the pet projects of the Universal Peace Association,—International Disarmament and International Arbitration Courts. Quite bluntly he characterized both ideas as practically unfeasible. With great candor and firmness he reviewed the essential policy of Germany with regard to possible war, summing up his position in the passage thus reported: "A nation must maintain its sea and land forces at such a point as corresponds with its national strength. Germany cannot afford to bind herself to limit armaments, because she would thereby run the risk of forfeiting her present place among the Powers to some stronger nation that is willing to take it, and Germans would henceforth play the rôle of mere dummies in world affairs." The Chancellor did not attempt to conceal the fact that the policy thus affirmed is just now directed toward Great Britain. "England," he said, "had frequently expressed the view publicly, privately, and officially, that she must possess a fleet so strong as to be equal or superior to any possible hostile combination. It was England's good right to set up such a principle, but it was a principle which no self-respecting foreign Power could afford to recognize for itself. If England came to a world's congress with such a program she would have to reckon on an almost certain rebuff." There is no doubt that this frank expression of sentiment commands the approval of a substantial majority of the Imperial Parliament. On the day following the speech of von Bethmann-Hollweg, that body by a decisive vote rejected the Socialist motion calling upon the Government to take "immediate steps leading to an international agreement concerning universal limitation of armaments and the abolition of the right of capture at sea."

Austria-Hungary.—The discordant elements in the Reichsrath have finally brought about the dissolution of that body. The outcome was inevitable. It has long been recognized that in the prevailing stubbornness of party strife no legislation was practicable. The Emperor, after repeated efforts to harmonize the factions, at last issued the mandate proroguing Parliament and dissolving the Lower House. The members of the Bienenrath Cabinet will retain for the present their portfolios, and will have directing control of the elections, which the imperial mandate declares shall be held on June 10. The crisis bringing about the present state of affairs arose from the dilatory tactics of the Czechs in the budget committee. They used obstructive methods to prevent a vote on the loan asked by the Government in order to tire the Ministry and force them to concede demands made by the Czech section. The Premier, von Bienenrath, would not be coerced, preferring to resign than to surrender. Evidently the Emperor sides with his stand. The loan will now be made possible by an order from the Emperor, according to the famous paragraph 14 covering necessary legislation.

Greece.—While other nations are having troubles about conciliating the claims of two or more languages that may be in use among their people, there is a disturbance in Greece about one. The Purists are not satisfied with Greek in its present condition, and want it purified.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Peace Movement

Sixty years ago Cobdenism was in its glory. Thirty-five years of what, compared with previous tumults, might be called profound peace, was turning many hopes to the abolition of war. This, Cobden held, Free Trade was to accomplish. Commerce, "the fair, white-winged peacemaker," was to bind men together in an ever-widening intercourse. Especially, therefore, in England, the home of trade, did the dream of the golden year ushering in the reign of universal law, when happy sails bearing the printing press and the Gospel should penetrate to remotest lands in farthest seas, and should fetch home in exchange "silks and fruits and spices clear of toll," occupy the national mind.

Combining the goods of time and of eternity, it was to be a millennium that would have satisfied any Chiliast. In it, what no Chiliast ever dreamed of, the unrestrained striving after the treasures of the world, was to lead straight to what Christians had always held rightly to be a blessing attainable only in the climax of their Lord's Kingdom of renunciation. The outward expression of the new faith was the Great International Exhibition of 1851. We, for whom such exhibitions mean only a factitious and passing trade, or the advertising of some great undertaking, or the booming of some new territory, can hardly conceive how the first of them, with its solemn message of peace and good will to all nations, was a religious symbol, a creed visible and tangible. In it were brought together the riches of the four quarters of the globe, chiefly that man might see how much better it was to enjoy these gained honestly by peaceful arts, than to acquire them violently and only in part, or even to miss them wholly, amid the horrors of war; and many trusted that the object-lesson would have its effect.

But they were deceived. Scarcely had the doors of the Hyde Park Crystal Palace closed, than the Crimean war broke out. Then came in quick succession the war in Italy of 1859, the American civil war, the Austro-Prussian war, the Franco-German war, and the Russo-Turkish war, so that for more than twenty years the cannon were never silent long. So far was trade, however free and universal, from keeping the peace when elemental passions stirred the nations, that the very idea, once so favored, was scouted. All night long the mob of Paris surged through the streets screaming: "à Berlin," while every German town was cheering for the Rhine. This, perhaps, was not surprising; but what a demonstration of the inefficacy of the trade theory of peace was it, when in London, the London of Cobdenism, of merchant princes, came the multitude, not soldiers from the barrack and gentry from the club, but from the warehouse and the bank, from the shop and the quay, men who lived by commerce, clamoring for war with Russia, ready almost to tear in pieces those whom they had hailed as prophets of the new dispensation. Russia was at the gates of Constantinople; and there was not a second thought for England's trade.

The idea of the old peace movement was, by engaging all nations in commerce, to create for each a network of interests of which war would be the ruin. A new movement, involving another form of self-interest, is now on foot. It hopes much from the growing burden of armaments, and sees in the readiness of nations to arbitrate certain disputes, a sign of an approach to universal arbitration. But men never yet fought unless the quarrel was worth fighting for, and whether it be so or not, depends on two things, the intrinsic value, material or moral, of the matter in dispute, and the difficulty of waging war. As regards the former, only Anarchists deny that some things are worth war. As to the latter, savages will fight over almost anything, since to do so they have but to put on their paint, seize their rude weapons, and go on the warpath. Our great, great grandfathers would fight where we arbitrate; but the armies and fleets were trifles compared with those of to-day. Frederick the Great's annual revenue during his later years was only £3,300,000; and for long after his accession it was barely £2,000,000; yet he could raise army after army, and leave behind him a war chest of £7,650,000. Again, no matter how badly defeated, a sovereign retained his subjects' loyalty: to-day probably no government could survive a defeat in its own territory. Moreover, fighting is now much more terrifying than formerly. The soldier often has not the incentive he once derived from being at close quarters with the enemy; and for the sailor there is the ever-present fear of the unseen torpedo and submarine. Hence, sovereigns and subjects, soldiers and sailors are all interested in avoiding unnecessary war; the quarrel must be great to be worth the cost, and so arbitration is favored. But the great quarrel can come, in which the nation will rush to arms. Until men have learned in the Ferrer schools to despise both country and flag, no word of arbitration will be listened to when the safety of the one and the honor of the other are at stake. Nothing is more certain to-day than that there is not a nation which does not see its great quarrel hanging over it, and therefore none will lay aside its arms. The burden of increasing armament must indeed come to an end; it is more likely to do so by means of a great war à outrance, in which the victor will dictate terms to the conquered, than by any other.

But the promoters of the peace movement hope to bind all nations together in a formal agreement to settle every dispute in some international tribunal. "Men," they say "enter into society to secure amongst other things, this peaceable settling of disputes: why should not nations do the same?" The idea implies Rousseau's social contract, and that is against it. Men do not enter into society, they find themselves in it by a necessity they can avoid only by fleeing to the desert. Man is a social, as well as a rational animal; and that mankind should lead a social life is demanded by that same nature which requires it to lead a rational life. Man is, therefore, naturally under authority which derives its rights over him from the God of nature, no matter how the person to administer it may be determined. Man's physical and moral needs demand society, of which, in the natural order, the nation is the perfect form. But when this is reached, we find the direct opposite of what was seen in the individual man. The nation is sufficient for itself and its members. So far is it from tending to coalesce with others, that it rather repels them. The particularities of physical type, language, climate, habitat, occupation, etc., all tend to concentrate it in itself and to separate it from others. Hence, the parallel drawn between individual men and nations is singularly weak.

Moreover, there are other difficulties. Supposing such an agreement, who is to make it binding? How is a combination of the greater powers at the expense of the smaller to be guarded against? How would the decrees of the international tribunal be enforced against, say, the greatest of all? Besides, from the natural independence of nations arise natural rights. No jurist admits the validity of a blanket agreement entered into by an individual, which militates against such rights: on the other hand, if we consider the uncertainty of the proposed tribunal and of enduring good faith, the proposed international agreement, if perpetually binding, (and no other would be to the purpose) appears to be of that nature. Hence, it is far from clear that it would not be null and void by reason of its intrinsic vice.

Let us say boldly that war is not an unmixed evil. "Time would fail me to tell of those who by faith conquered kingdoms . . . became valiant in battle, put to flight the armies of the foreigners," says St. Paul; and Christianity has always held that God and man can be served by the sword. Human society owes a great debt to the Crusaders and to those who fought the long battle against the Turk; and not unjustly does every nation honor its warriors. To-day, also, it would be better for unity, harmony, obedience, mutual charity, all the social virtues, that ten thousand should lay down their lives in a just war than that one should perish in the lawless riots and revolutions which multiply around those who speak of universal peace.

Still war is an evil, as is pestilence and famine. These can be mitigated by human effort; and though human wills are less manageable than microbes, it also can be restricted. Only they labor in vain who would turn society upside down in order to banish it utterly. Plague, which we boasted had been eradicated in the progress of civilization, is recrudescing. A failure of crops in the great plains that feed our multitudinous cities is always possible, making famine something not to be ignored. There is the ever-present threat of war. This should teach us that now, as in the past, these are in God's hand and to Him, more than to human skill and wisdom, we must have recourse against them. Our efforts must be joined with the prayer of centuries: "From pestilence, famine and war, O Lord deliver us!" which shall be our chief safeguard until they all cease forever in the great triumph of Christ's Kingdom.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

On the Frontier

"Guarding the Border" is a subject which is never very far from the thoughts of American representatives in Latin America. It is the curse of our Latin-American neighbors, and is in reality creating toward the United States a feeling of distrust among them and in Europe; it is fostering disbelief in our national good faith; in a word, it is affecting our national honor. The Monroe Doctrine is a fact, whether we like it or not, and whatever the opinion of the average American may be. It is a fact that a certain American sensitiveness on the subject of Latin-America is distinctly recognized in European diplomacy as a reef to be carefully avoided in international affairs.

Whether American public opinion affirms or denies the Monroe Doctrine and its corollaries does not matter in the least to my argument, which is that European governments have put up with injury to their legitimate and proper interests, to their subjects and their invested capital in certain of the Latin-American countries, rather than risk offence to this American national sensitiveness by righting the wrong themselves, until their patience with us is exhausted, and they are ready to blame on us everything that goes wrong in those countries. It is equally plain that as long as we neither oblige our turbulent neighbors to provide for the safety of life and property, nor permit others to do so, as conditions grow worse the general irritation against the dog-in-the-manger will increase in direct ratio.

In our relations with Latin-America we are compelled to consider (exclusive of Panama, where special conditions prevail) three types of government:

(1) The disorderly, wilfully unprogressive states where life and property are never safe. (2) Those which have made a certain advance in social and economic stability, but are still subject to spasms of armed discontent, or uprisings by unprincipled politicians who wish to gain the same control of the national finances as they exercise in the countries of the first group. (3) Those countries which have either progressed steadily and from the beginnings of their national existence, with a minimum of political disorder, to the front rank of civilization, or who have with a civic energy we may well envy, eradicated by truly herculean effort this poison of political turbulence.

Until the recent deplorable outbreak in Mexico, that country was considered to belong to the last group under the foregoing classification. It is well known what conditions reigned south of the Rio Grande at the beginning of General Diaz's accession to power. Mexico's present high standing (only partially impaired as yet by the Madero uprising and its American supporters) is due entirely to Diaz and to his helpers, but the Mexicans need (and are proving that they need) a firmly centralized government for many years to come. The great bulk of the population is not fitted for self-government. It is hard on the minority that is ready and equipped to assume the responsibilities of representative government, but one almost loses faith in even this element when a man of Madero's education and antecedents (sincere in his republicanism, as I believe him to be) has been so blinded by his political ideals as to ignore the entire impracticability of putting them into concrete form at the present time, and so regardless of his country's welfare as to try to force the issue with an armed mob. It must not be overlooked that the believers in representative self-government are in no overwhelming majority, even among the educated Mexicans.

There is in Mexico a distinct aristocracy, monarchical in principle and in tradition. Descendants of Spanish noble families bear their titles, republic or no republic, and have no sympathy with popular aspirations and ideals, even though for the moment they may hold public office. They form a party of considerable strength; it was they who supported the Emperor Maximilian, and they might again be willing to support a stronger member of some powerful royal house of Europe. They failed before by their own dissensions and the weakness of their leader. It has been one of Porfirio Diaz's most difficult tasks to reconcile these men (and women) for the best interests of Mexico, to a government republican in form only, but to be republican in essence as soon as circumstances permit.

He thus appears as a moderator of aristocratic anti-republican sentiment, as well as an educator of the native stock, unused, for centuries, to liberty of any kind, rather than as the selfish tyrant that, with genuine American looseness, he has been pictured to be. His rule has been stern and pitiless at times, but I can see no other way to have evolved order, even comparative, out of the chaos which existed before his rule. A government "by the people" is utterly impossible at this time; enormous progress has been made in the past few decades under the system of government "for the people," and it is likely that this system will outlast President Diaz's successor.

It means nothing, if true, that federal troops are deserting to the insurgents. No ideal is involved there. The method of recruiting and the barrack life of the army in Mexico, as in Central America, is such as to make any real cohesion improbable. Nor do I hesitate to say that probably few, if any, of the insurgents know what they are fighting for; if they think at all, they fight as a "regular" party man votes the "straight ticket," because he is told to do so; otherwise because they are paid, armed, fed and given promises, and that is enough. The same sordidness actuates the American.

There is no Byronic fervor for the cause of the oppressed. Miners, cow-boys, sheep-herders, railway men, tramps; any unemployed American is eagerly sought by the "Junta." The reputation of all Americans as fighting men and as dead shots is firmly established all over Latin-America. If he has been in the army he commands a higher price, and may become an "officer," with the liberal promises of concessions if the fight is successful. He counts on the irresponsibility of public sentiment in the United States to save his life if he is caught, by pressure brought to bear upon Congressmen, irrespective of the merits of his case.

He will kill the natives of the country—will attempt to dynamite them, massacre them wholesale, but he will not face death like a man when captured; he must make appeal to the press to save him from the fate he has courted. He is throwing the weight of the fighting reputation of his country for no noble end, and for a promise broken before made, in support of a movement which can only result in danger to the hundreds of millions of American capital invested in Mexico; to the fifty odd thousand Americans living and doing business in the country, and in the disintegration, if it be not ended soon, of the system of government under which our interests have received, on the whole, adequate protection, in spite of the tremendous obstacles and handicaps which have hampered the Diaz administration in the forming of such unpromising elements into a nation fit to govern itself, and to take its place in the world.

Mexico's relations with the United States are truly a test of statesmanship, for while our enormous individual and corporate investments in Mexico require our government to insist at all times upon the fullest protection against violence, at the same time the back-bone of the forces offering violence to our interests and rendering futile the efforts of the Mexican government to protect them is formed of groups of American citizens. It is small wonder that the conviction grows among European diplomats trained to observe keenly, and to suspect all men's motives, that there is more than a coincidence here; it is small matter for surprise that the great Latin nations of the South accuse us of double-dealing, of fair words and foul deeds. It is to our relations with Mexico and Central America, our nearest Latin neighbors, that these countries of the Southern continent look for data upon which to base their policy toward us for the future, and in Mexico and in Central America they find conditions which convince them that we either do not realize our national responsibilities and duties, or that we wilfully disregard them.

In three of the five states of Central America disorder is constant; revolution, successful or drowned in blood; assassination, confiscation or looting of property, forced loans, cynical or brutal crime is the order of the day. It is no less than astonishing that Costa Rica and Salvador have maintained such high standards with such neighbors. The governments of these three states are governments in name only. Public offices are filled, but salaries are not paid, and the performance of official duty is not expected—very often it is not permitted except by the personal command and under the supervision of the man who happens to be "president," who saps the whole strength of the country if he is strong. If he is weak and other leaders dispute his power, none strong enough to take it from him, the anarchy that prevails can better be imagined than described.

In 1907, the government of the United States and Mexico, unable to endure Central American conditions longer, invited each of the five little republics to a conference at Washington, where the Secretary of State, in calling the first meeting to order, said that the agreements which had up to that time been elaborated, signed, ratified, seemed to have been "written in water." Under the influence of these words, a treaty and solemn conventions were drawn up agreeing to refer all Central American disputes and differences to an international court of arbitration to be established in Costa Rica, composed of judges from all five states; to neutralize Honduras, the centre of discord; to take the sternest measures for the repression of filibustering, and to punish with severity anyone "of whatever nationality" fostering or aiding or taking part in a hostile expedition from one of the five countries against any of the others.

One might have thought that with such guarantees the saner spirit of Central America might have asserted itself at last, and given the much-needed impulse toward stability. But no; unable to recruit successfully in Central America for filibustering expeditions under the jealous watch of the diplomatic representatives of the United States and Mexico, the professional disturbers come to New Orleans, Chicago, New York and San Francisco, and buy their men and arms for revolution. Is it any wonder, then, that the Central Americans believe that the words of the Secretary of State himself were "written in water"? W. F. SANDS.

Spanish Political Chieftains

We have spoken of Spanish political parties and of the dissensions among Spanish Catholics, but we think that our remarks will be better understood by the non-Spanish reader if we present a few pen pictures of the men who are now most prominent in the domain of Spanish politics.

The President of the Council of Ministers shall first receive our attention. Señor Canalejas is a fidgety, fickle man, chiefly remarkable for his constant shiftiness. His political history is one of transformation and change. War with no hope of truce seems to exist between his character and anything called steadiness or stability. He first blossomed out as a Republican, and then went over to the Monarchists; but he soon tired of Sagasta and began to flirt with General Polavieja, who, it was then thought, was about to found a great Catholic party; that plan having fallen through, our lightning-change artist hoisted the banner of anti-clericalism; and finally, after much shifting and shuffling, a throw of the dice brought him to the presidency of the Council, the goal of his ambition, the Mecca of his many political pilgrimages.

Canalejas is a talker rather than a thinker. It may be said that his most glaring defect is verbal incontinence. This betrays him at times into outrages against propriety, as when before all Spain he publicly stigmatized the Catholics as the "itch, leprosy and small-pox of the nation." His nerves exercise a disastrous tyranny over him. It is easy to set them a-tingling; and then he loses that evenness of temper so necessary to a public man. His knowledge is extensive rather than solid, varied rather than profound. Having this point in view, Cánovas del Castillo used to say of Canalejas that he had read the preface of every book in print and some others. Nevertheless, as a parliamentary speaker Canalejas has to-day few superiors, though his oratory concerns itself with manner rather than with matter. His weakness as a reasoner and his poverty of thought are decked and cloaked in a rhetorically splendid robe which explains his parliamentary triumphs.

Is Canalejas a wrecker? Is he by conviction a Combes, a Mirabeau? He is not. Beneath all the show of advanced thought and mighty determination and anti-clericalism and radicalism, Canalejas is only a weak man, a cowardly politician, a shilly-shally cabinet minister. His radicalism in religious matters, and his bragging about anti-clericalism are in reality concessions made to the irreligious elements of the Chamber of Deputies through fear of them and for the sake of hearing them clap their hands and yell hurrah. He is an actor who adopts the tones and gestures that will appeal to the sympathies of the gallery gods. The day that the radical press ceases to mark out for him an anti-clerical policy, he will say good-by to violations of the Concordat, to persecutions of the religious orders and to snarls about the supposed clerical problem.

Canalejas sees no way to keep his power, but by tossing out sopas to the Republicans and the Radicals. Hence the characteristic note of his policy in religious matters has been mealy-mouthed quibbling. He knows perfectly well that he owes his present exaltation to a purely fortuitous combination of circumstances; he knows that at any moment he may be ousted; and in consequence he is trying to strike a political pose that shall win for him the credit of being consistent with the views that he advanced and the blows that he struck last year. A single detail will serve better than much philosophizing to bring this fact home to our readers. In a room of his private residence, where he was wont to receive visitors on matters of business, Canalejas had an artistic statuette of St. Francis of Assisi. Now, on a certain day, it came to his knowledge that some of his advanced Republican and Radical allies murmured in their hearts against a President of the Council who could defy the Vatican and pass laws against friars and yet kept in his private office in his private house a statue of a friar, for such St. Francis undoubtedly was. Canalejas took the hint. He made all haste to remove the offending statuette to another apartment, which he set aside for the reception of visitors who were neither anti-clerical nor enemies of the religious orders. Thus he varnished both the crutches on which he limps toward renown for statesmanship.

Canalejas is now about to bring before the Cortes his much advertised and long projected law on religious associations; and he is going to ignore the Vatican, just to emphasize, he says, the supremacy of the State over the Church. But here it is a profound secret known to everybody that he has no desire to break with the Vatican; nay, he dreads a break, and he will do all he can to prevent the passage of his long-heralded law. Behold the full-length portrait of the man who to-day holds the reins of government in Spain!

Don Segismundo Moret y Prendergast has had a political career that can be summed up in two words, weakness and failure. He has talent, but he is absolutely devoid of will power. He is a man of great mistakes and failures. While possibly neither willing nor intending mischief, he has caused Spain nothing but harm, grief and pain. As often as he has been honored with the confidence of the crown, and the times have been many, he has left in his wake a vast deal of political and administrative corruption. Back in 1897, when the colonial war was in full blast, he made a bid for power with his famous cry, "Autonomy is peace." Autonomy was granted to Cuba and Porto Rico, but instead of disarming the rebels it hastened the catastrophe, and Moret, as President of the Council, saw Spain's flag disappear from the world discovered by Columbus. It was Moret, who, in 1908, made at Saragossa a vehement and impassioned appeal to all radicals for the formation of a "block," like that in France, with the avowed object of secularizing and laicizing the State. He is now nearing the end of his days, but his experience seems to have added nothing to his wisdom.

The name of Don Eugenio Montero Rios adorns the Treaty of Paris, by which our country lost definitively the last remaining parts of her once vast colonial empire in America and Oceanica. Like Moret, Don Eugenio is a politician of revolutionary tendencies; though far from being a statesman of a high order, he has a share in all Liberal mischief-making. We owe our civil marriage law to him. Montero Rios is most famous for his extraordinary ability and dexterity in securing for himself and for his kindred and friends highly salaried positions in the public service. He is at present President of the Senate. He is not without influence in the cabinet, for his son-in-law, Garcia Prieto, is Minister of State.

We need add little to what we have said about Don

Antonio Maura, the chief of the Conservative party. Austerity of character, seriousness in politics, sincerity in his convictions, a manliness that does not flinch in the face of difficulty and danger, a mind and will devoted to the great ideals of order, justice and right,—such are the salient qualities of the statesman whom revolution and anarchy have sworn to hate unto the death, whose life has twice been attempted by the fiends of Barcelona. With the intention of arousing the great mass of our people from their indifference, apathy and lack of public spirit, he introduced through his colleague, Señor La Cierva, and caused to be enacted a compulsory voting law, thus obliging the voters to present themselves at the polls, even if they cast no ballot; and he had in process of execution a campaign for moral and social betterment when he fell from power.

Don Juan Vasquez de Mella is the spokesman of the Traditionalists, and perhaps the chief parliamentary figure to-day. He is a great philosopher and a formidable polemic, and he knows how to adorn his profound thought with all the graces of fancy, so that his oratory becomes a terrible weapon against his adversaries. He feels an unconquerable repugnance and aversion for Parliament, which he looks upon as a grand farce, public and official. He rarely appears in the lower House, though he was elected from Pampeluna; but now and then his fellow-Catholics and friends induce him to appear on some extraordinary occasion when they are anxious to hear the voice of traditional Spain. Cánovas and Silvela, knowing his prodigious talent, tried more than once to win him over to recognizing the reigning dynasty and to a place in the Conservative party; but, faithful to his banner and devoted to his political ideals, he rejected their advances and with them the brilliant official position that would have been his if he had heeded their invitation. He would not buy wealth and influence at the price of desertion and political apostasy.

His ambition and boldness, his turbulent and revolutionary disposition, his influence over the lawless elements, and his contempt for social ethics brand Alejandro Lerroux as another Mirabeau. All the physical and moral attributes of a great fighter are found in him. He is robust of body and energetic in will; he has stubbornness to spare; his eloquence is of the aggressive and popular kind that can sway the multitude at will; his program begins with the destruction of altars and ends with the burning of title deeds. Whatever any society may have of the rebellious, of the anarchical, of the depraved, of the destructive, has settled and solidified around him and has formed a powerful party, in which all the low passions and instincts of the irreligious and revolutionary mob are at home. The Liberals sent him poor and unknown to Barcelona to check the tendency among the Catalonians towards administrative, economic, juridical and political independence. He has risen to more than princely power, for he has succeeded in introducing his political principles into the city and provincial councils, and holds a real dictatorship over the flotsam and jetsam of the city.

His great political influence has caused him to be courted by the Liberals, who go to all lengths to secure his favor and good will. Completely discredited before the nation and convicted in full Parliament, hardly a month since, of being at least privy to the administrative immorality of certain friends of his, he has lost none of his political influence, nor has he estranged those who cannot understand how Lerroux who, a few years ago, had nothing, now rides in an automobile and makes an ostentatious display of wealth, whose origin is hidden in mystery.

Here we may remark that since the radical leader has come to be the owner of an automobile and other good things his revolutionary fierceness has subsided very considerably. It cannot be denied, however, that if there is a man in Spain that could arouse the people to riot and sedition, that man is Lerroux. In the Republican camp, he is the only power and the only danger for the monarchy and the Church. Is that danger serious, imminent? We answer emphatically that it is not. In our opinion, revolution is possible only when the army and navy sympathize with it, as was the case in Portugal. The Spanish army is loyal, frankly loyal. If Lerroux could turn loose the mob with dagger and incendiary's torch in Barcelona in July, 1909, it was because the Spanish troops were in Africa and the city was without a guard. Otherwise, Barcelona's history would not record that week of outrage, murder and arson. Lerroux rules the Barcelona mob, but the mob is not Barcelona, nor is Barcelona all Spain.

NORBERTO TORCAL,

Editor of El Noticiero, Saragossa, Spain.

The Penitentes

Although at the close of the French and Indian war, Spain was mistress of all our present territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific, it was by a forced and unnatural process that her domination had been established. Twenty years later, what we call the Louisiana Purchase, was re-conveyed to France, and Spain's control ceased over a territory where it had made no impression.

Spain's troops did not cross the upper Arkansas, whose south bank they followed until the Royal Gorge, near the present Cañon City, forbade their further progress. Her hunters, it is hardly necessary to say, were not held back by scruples of conscience when they went out after the buffalo, and the wide-sweeping plains beyond the shallow, sluggish stream trembled under the hoofs of the mighty herds; but the hunters simply crossed and returned with their rich spoils. Spain's influence did not make itself felt beyond the Arkansas. It is doubtful whether a Spaniard ever saw its headwaters or those of the Rio Grande. Surely, no citizen of the independent republic of Texas ever did, though Texas claimed as her western boundary the Rio Grande from its source to its mouth. The Spaniards spread over New Mexico, but the settlements in southern and southwestern Colorado are more properly Mexican than Spanish.

It is hard to realize the isolation of all that country before the Santa Fé trail wound its way over the vast prairies and brought those remote towns into something like communication with the outside world. Intercourse with the City of Mexico meant a long and hazardous journey, where prowling Indians might be encountered at almost any moment.

The Franciscan missionaries, scattered far and wide among the Indian towns, shared the hardships of exile from civilization and encouraged one another with the thought of what they were doing for the good of souls; but the missionaries were driven out, almost to a man, and their neophytes, as well as the white Catholics, were left in a state of great spiritual destitution. There was no Mass, there were no sermons, there were no sacraments except baptism, administered by some pious patriarch, and matrimony where the nuptial blessing was impossible. Yet the people clung to their devotions. Each little collection of houses (it could hardly be dignified with the name of village) had one who assembled the faithful, recited or read the familiar prayers, and led in singing the familiar hymns. There were sodalities, too; "brotherhoods" (hermandades) they called them, and undoubtedly there was the "Brotherhood of Penance," the venerable Third Order of St. Francis.

Now, as fruits and flowers which are proper to a well-kept garden sometimes escape and, by self-sown seeds, set up a new existence which shows its kinship with the old, yet it has certain wild traits that it has acquired, so the venerable Third Order, left without the paternal guidance of the missionary, overstepped the bounds of prudent zeal and developed into the Penitentes. This brotherhood has its members in all the Mexican settlements, from the northernmost south towards the Gulf; but we are concerned with it as it now is and has been in New Mexico and Colorado.

Let us not suppose that all Mexicans belong to the organization. In the first place, boys and striplings are at most candidates, while the majority of the men have no connection with it. In some small villages, a few men, possibly two or only one, may be pointed out as belonging to the brotherhood; at present, the membership seems to include chiefly those of mature or advanced age. In some little nook among the sand hills, or hidden away in a lonely gulch, the Penitentes of a particular district have their morada, or meeting-place, an adobe building fitted up much like a chapel. The decorations may include pictures or statues of the saints, rather crude productions if judged by American standards, but they are objects of devotion to their owners who, after all, are those chiefly concerned in the matter; but there is sure to be a painfully realistic crucifix, far enough from our customary idealized representations of the sublime tragedy of Calvary.

The members hold their meetings from time to time, when the "elder brother," as the presiding officer is called, is present with his counselors, certain members elected to assist him in looking after the interests of the brotherhood. One morada may have several others dependent upon it, or it may exist by itself with no bonds except those of fraternity uniting it to any other. The brethren who may have transgressed some rule are called sharply to account at the meetings and (it is said) are flogged for their misconduct. We know that on one occasion a Penitente was looked upon as a disgrace to the brotherhood because his daughter had made a run-away match. "How," it was argued, "could he have been a good father, if his daughter acted so scandalously?" As if a good father could necessarily put good sense into his daughter's head!

When a Penitente dies, his brethren observe certain ceremonies, which are full of beautiful significance, how little soever they may appeal to the American taste. The body is laid out upon the bare ground (for even in the houses of the well-to-do there will be found some rooms with floors of beaten clay), and it is then covered with earth, so that only the face remains visible. After night-fall, it is carried in procession with flaring torches and to the accompaniment of weird chanting across the neighboring fields and up and down the hills, as a vivid representation of man's weary pilgrimage through this life into eternity. Upon returning to the house, prayers are recited and hymns are sung. It may be put down as certain that no indecorous scenes are to be witnessed in connection with the death and burial of a Penitente. Would that as much could always be said of those who think they belong to a superior order of beings, and look down upon the Mexican and his ways.

Our impression is that the brotherhood is stronger in the somewhat remote districts and among those in whom there may be a generous portion of Indian blood. Yet men of the highest respectability and of recognized social standing have not disdained to be enrolled. They may not parade the fact, just as men elsewhere seldom make a show of their acts of piety or beneficence, but they see no reason to be ashamed of their connection with a religious organization, as the Penitentes undoubtedly are.

The Mexicans have a proverb to the effect that there is no flock where all the sheep are sound. Why should the Penitentes be immune? It is reported of an American that, as he was living among Mexicans, he saw a way of profiting by becoming a Penitente, and he duly entered the brotherhood. His influence was very considerable, especially at election time, and he used it to good advantage. But when he was far from his Mexican friends he was known as a prominent Freemason. How could he combine the two? We don't know, but the fact is that he did. No other American, as far as we know, ever identified himself with the Penitentes; but it is quite well understood that now and then some Mexican politician has secured or kept up membership in the brotherhood, not so much through love for penitential exercises as for the strictly temporal benefit that may be his on election day. Politics will destroy the Penitentes.

It is during Holy Week that the Penitentes shun attention and receive most of it. They retire to their moradas, which are never in frequented places, and there they wish to be left unmolested. In fact, they station guards to warn the curious that they are not wanted in the neighborhood. But who or what can restrain Yankee curiosity? The spectators sally forth, armed with spy-glasses and cameras and an unlimited stock of impudent assurance. They catch some glimpses of the Good Friday procession, fill up the gaps by drawing upon their perfervid fancy, and send off to gasping Eastern friends blood-curdling accounts of what they could neither see nor hear.

Some Penitentes carry heavy crosses in that procession. The upright is ten feet long and made of a beam which measures six by eight inches; the arms are in proportion. Some members strip to the waist and scourge themselves. Other people, who by no stretch of the imagination, could be called "penitent," inflict great bodily pain upon themselves as they mincingly stumble along like hobbled horses and pant like tired hounds, yet they evoke no doleful wails of woe about their savagery. Why rail at the Penitente? We may not care to imitate him, but he does not ask us that we should. The procession terminates at some hillock, and there one of the number is tied to a cross and remains in that position for some time. It is needless to say that there is no thought of putting him to death. After he is taken down from the cross it is left there as a memorial, to remain as long as the elements spare it.

"Are the Penitentes Catholics?" They are Catholics, though some of them may be of little credit to the Church; but this state of affairs is not peculiar to them. Some years ago, so it is asserted, a very pernicious ethical system was introduced into some moradas or among some Penitentes. Briefly, it is reported to have been this: If a Penitente should steal a horse or a cow and then perform the penance of Holy Week, his sin was forgiven and the animal became his! Certain it is that some abuses aroused the ecclesiastical authorities to vigorous action; but it would be manifestly unfair to blame the whole organization for the scandal that may have found entrance here or there. For our part, we fear that we may have met some scamps among the Penitentes; but we feel free to say that those of our acquaintance were in the main, earnest, prayerful men, from whom many an easy-going American Catholic could learn precious lessons for Lent, and for the whole cycle of religious observances that make up the year.

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

Guatemala Next

Another Central America kettle has been set on the range. While the others are still seething ominously and threatening to boil over at any moment, a Junta Libertadora, with headquarters in New Orleans, has issued a vigorous manifesto against President Estrada Cabrera, of Guatemala, who is charged in it with many serious offences against persons and property. The Junta purposes to bring out a history of Guatemala during the last twelve years. The book is to be copiously illustrated, and is to be supported by a wealth of documentary evidence. After impressing upon the public mind the justness of their cause, the members of the Junta, who affirm that they are the victims or the sons of the victims of the President's tyranny, contemplate such action as shall restore to the citizens of Guatemala the rights and property of which they have been deprived.

Motives of health have prevented us from visiting Guatemala very recently; but as the political situation in the sister republic has not changed perceptibly in the past forty years, an account of a visit paid to it by an English Jesuit in 1881 may serve the purpose. Father Henry Gillet was stationed at the time in Belize, the capital of British Honduras, where he was a teacher in the parish school. At the end of the session, he asked and obtained the permission of his superiors to pay a visit to the Isabel lagoon, famed for its beauty. This lagoon is on Guatemalan territory, but almost within hailing distance of the colony. Although the Jesuits had been expelled from Guatemala in 1871, Father Gillet entertained no misgivings, for the nature of his errand, his nationality, and the flag under which the sloop sailed were, in his opinion, a sufficient protection and a complete justification. But hardly had he set foot on the shore when he was placed under arrest.

After a short delay, to learn the pleasure of President Barrios, he was conveyed as a prisoner to the capital. Five days spent on the road were followed by forty-eight hours without food or drink in a noisome dungeon, where those condemned to death were confined until the sentence was to be carried out. Thence Father Gillet was transferred to the common jail, where he spent ten days in the company of thieves and vagrants before he could get word to the British consular agent. That gentleman lost no time in representing personally to Barrios the complications that might arise from such high-handed action towards one of her Britannic Majesty's subjects, and he insisted upon Father Gillet's immediate return to the place where he had been seized. Barrios acquiesced.

The news of Father Gillet's capture produced consternation in Belize, for it was well known that Barrios was not excessively conscientious in the choice of means when he had made up his mind to act. But while the advisability of sending an armed force to demand the release of the prisoner or to avenge his execution was under discussion in the colony, which had no telegraphic communication with the rest of the world, Father Gillet solved the difficulty by making his appearance among his delighted friends.

Certain newspapers of the time, thinking that Father Gillet's execution was a foregone conclusion, for he was a Jesuit and a foreigner, anticipated the course of events by publishing harrowing descriptions of his trial, condemnation and execution, all fully illustrated from drawings "made on the spot," or elsewhere. They might do duty again if we were to venture into Guatemala, for we understand that the so-called law inflicting the death penalty on any foreign Jesuit that may stumble into the country is still on the statute books.

If the New Orleans Junta succeeds in bringing out a history properly so called of the past twelve years of Guatemala's political life, the book will undoubtedly create a sensation. What might not be its influence on the Washington authorities?

D. P. S.

IN MISSION FIELDS

THE CHURCH OF KIDANGUR, INDIA

Our readers will recall the rather dramatic beginning of this church, for AMERICA related how it was put up in a single night, and how the builders were haled before a pagan judge to answer for some pretended violation of the law. Their triumphant acquittal was the beginning of better days for the struggling little mission.

The celebration of the first anniversary of its erection began in great joy, but through a sad accident nearly ended in greater sorrow. We take the following account of the event from the Salesian Bulletin, of Turin, Italy:—

"A statue of Our Lady Help of Christians, an exact reproduction of the image venerated in Turin, was presented to the church by some of the faithful on the occasion of the first anniversary. It was blessed by a special delegate from the Bishop. The ceremony commenced by a procession from the school near by so as to install the new statue before the solemn High Mass. Our Lady made her solemn entry into the church memorable by a striking temporal favor. The incident is as follows: In these festive celebrations it is the custom out here to fire salutes from time to time by means of Kathmas or small cannon. At the end of the solemn High Mass, the man in charge fired some salutes, just as the preacher was about to ascend the pulpit, which, on account of the crowd, was erected in the open air.

"Noticing that one of the cannon did not take fire, he went close to it to relight it, when suddenly the Kathma burst, doing great damage to the man, who lay senseless and bathed in blood. He was removed to a neighboring house, where the Father Vicar administered the last rites, as there seemed no probability of saving him. He was then removed to a hospital some twelve miles away, and the present writer was one of those in attendance, since we expected him to expire at any moment. At some distance from the hospital the resident doctor came forward to meet him, and after a brief examination said: He is dying; have you given him the last Sacraments? We were all much moved, but we yet had confidence in Our Lady Help of Christians, for the congregation had gone in again to pray for the unfortunate man.

"On reaching the hospital the doctor applied some restoratives, and after a short time declared that he thought there was no immediate danger of death. The night passed in anxious waiting and prayer. With the dawn the doctor announced that by careful treatment the wounded man would soon recover. And so the event proved. The man is quite recovered, and is going to the church at Kidangur next Sunday to make his thanksgiving."

CORRESPONDENCE

Confusion in Official Italy

ROME, MARCH 26th, 1911.

As you know from the press despatches things are at sixes and sevens in the halls of the mighty who rule our sunny Italy. It has been well known since last fall that the Socialists were in a fair way to win out at the next election, so everybody has been coquetting with them. First, the Liberal Prime Minister, Luzzatti, made concessions to conciliate them, but when recently they demanded the putting through of an extension of the suffrage, which would clinch their hold on the coming election, Luzzatti drew the line, lost the confidence of the House and resigned.

Giolitti, the conservative leader, is an opportunist, and I have heard that he expressed a willingness to stand with the Catholics, if they would get together and make sure his conservative majority. But either through division or want of leadership the Catholics cannot assure him of strength enough, so he goes where he can get strength. Without the support of the Socialists he cannot stand; if he refuses to form a ministry, it looks as though Parliament might be dissolved and then the Socialists would come back with power enough to ride the house alone.

The King has conferred with some of the most radical of the Socialists with a view to have them go into a coalition cabinet under Giolitti, and Rome expects to hear the announcement the day after to-morrow. The old administration held over for a day on account of the jubilee celebration of the making of United Italy. This was a sort of overture to the opening of the Exposition, and was no time to swap horses. Meanwhile the program, which the Socialists will force our friend Giolitti to accept, besides the election laws, contains a number of economic measures for the benefit of the under dog, and in addition are strongly anti-clerical and will bring the question of the expulsion of religious promptly to the fore.

It was rumored about town last week that the Gregorian University foreseeing the coming storm would close down for this year on May 1st; but that is a canard. Meanwhile the government has constructed with most astonishing speed and thoroughness a new municipal trolley line (tramways they are called here) and opened it this week. Construction work on the exposition buildings does not seem to have been so rapid, and the expense has been rather extraordinary.

If I have any memory of expositions in America, it seems they were all very costly and never did anything like paying expenses. However, this Exposition will draw visitors, and Rome lives on visitors. One of the complaints raised against Luzzatti was the immense number of emigrants leaving Italy; he tried to take some consolation from the fact of the millions of dollars they sent back to Italy annually. He did not seem to heed that fact that, while emigration increased, return shipments of money decreased, and had evidently never heard of the advice given by Campanella to the Spanish King centuries ago, not to treat the American colonies as mines of silver and gold, but as colonies for raising strong and loyal men subject to the Spanish throne, averring the obvious, that men are more important to a nation than money.

C. M.

Modern Foes in Hungary

BUDAPEST, MARCH 17, 1911.

Since the beginning of the present century, more notably, however, during the past six years, several remarkable innovations have become apparent in political and public life in Hungary.

Up to very recent times, those in charge of national affairs devoted their attention solely to such questions as concerned the mutual, legal and economic interests of this country and Austria; these topics, moreover, invariably characterized the platform of the so-called "48" or Függetlenség (Independent) party, the oldest political faction in the Kingdom, and whose principles aim at a realization of those conditions aspired to in the quasi "Declaration of Independence," which precipitated the Austro-Hungarian War of 1848. Its leaders maintained constant vigilance in Parliament to forestall any movement actuated by Austrian influence that might redound to Hungary's detriment. In questions relating to the Church, to religion or philosophy they did not greatly delve, nor were social problems given, to any extent, their attention. Of recent years, however, this situation has gradually become altered, and from a two-fold cause. First of all, in that the political leaders have, with shrewd calculation, rendered unpopular the policies of the Függetlenség party; secondly, through the Social-Democrats, the Freemasons, and with them the Jewish element, questions of purely social and religious import have been brought more directly to public attention.

In the formation of the cabinet of that year, the Függetlenség party, numbering among its leaders the noted Count Albert Apponyi and (at that time) Francis Kossuth was made one of the three constituents of the Coalition, which, in 1906, with Alexander Wekerle, then Prime Minister, as its head, became the governing body in Parliament. Its policies of opposition were thereby rendered impracticable, and the party's favor with the people at large, as was to be expected, greatly diminished.

The Social-Democrats, on the other hand, have been advocating their pet measures with remarkable vehemence; their scant representation in Parliament gives them no telling opportunity of directly executing their revolutionary ambitions; nevertheless they are, and have been for some time, exercising an unfortunately wide influence in public opinion, through their press—chiefly the Népszava (Voice of the People),—and by means of public meetings, parades, and, most successfully, through the trades and labor unions, over the various branches of which they have obtained vast control.

Simultaneously, the Freemasons have begun a still more animated phase of aggressiveness. This may be illustrated by an incident which occurred during the early part of the present year's legislature. A bill was introduced in the Lower House, moving that the hitherto prevailing custom of inquiring the religious belief of witnesses in the national courts of law be, for the future, rendered unnecessary. Carried to the Upper House, the proposal was warmly defended by Gabriel Antal, Bishop of the Reformed Church, who declared religion to be a purely private question, deserving in nowise consideration in matters legal or public.

Through the regrettable absence of several Catholic bishops, the bill was passed with a majority of three votes. In itself the question at issue was not one of great moment, yet its enactment marks the first achievement of her enemies in their efforts to weaken and eventually obliterate the influence which the Catholic Church has hitherto exercised in every department of Hungarian government.

According to the boast of Combes, ex-Minister of France, four-fifths of the Catholics of that country were won from their adherence to the Church, and from a Catholic mode of thinking, by the journalism of his own Freemasonry. And the self-same weapon has now been set up in Hungary, charged with quite as deadly ammunition as could possibly be directed against any nation's morals. Pornography in every conceivable form is one of the serious problems which Christian reformers are forced to meet: moving-pictures, vile pamphlets, lewd postcards and a score of other ingeniously devised methods serve as harbingers of filth and obscenity to every quarter of the kingdom. Then there are daily journals, still more formidable, since their influence is uninterrupted. These latter are all of comparatively recent origin. Last year appeared the new morning daily Világ (World); not long before, Az Est (The Evening)—both Freemason sheets; they have, moreover, the Új Korszak (New Era) for school teachers; A jó pajtás (The Good Comrade) for children; Galilei Kör (Galileo Circle) for University students, and their official monthly bulletin, Kelet (The Orient).

As can be seen, there is no walk of life which has been overlooked by these propagators of the printed word; and manifest as is the source whence these numerous organs arise, no less obvious is their individual purpose,—hatred towards the Church. And calumny, abuse, deception, intimidation,—all are their means to that one end. It is interesting to note the topics which are day after day glaringly headlined in the Freemason and Social-Democratic press: "Secularize the Church's possessions," "Laicize every school," "Suffrage for all classes," and similar proposals; these are the invariable leaders, and their advocates thresh them out with unflagging energy, especially that of universal suffrage, by the aid of which they hope to introduce various radical elements into Parliament, and thereby be capable of carrying out their drastic plans towards the Church's annihilation.

To cope, moreover, with that inborn Catholic loyalty so characteristic of the true Hungarian race, the aforesaid organs must needs direct their weapons at the very principles which have ever been treasured as their national traditions. They can evolve no doctrines superior to the hackneyed tenets of Darwinism and crude Materialism; their polemical standard is of a pitifully inferior grade, and for the most part they content themselves with abasing sallies against the clergy, untiringly ferreting out any scandals to which the name of a priest can be possibly joined, and, giving wide publicity to any and every affair of this nature, seek to lower the priesthood in the estimation of the laity.

Meanwhile, however, the Catholic leaders have by no means been inactive. To counteract the efforts of the Freemasons, Congregations of Mary have been spread among the Catholic men and youth all over the country. The scope of the Congregation, originally kindred to our Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, is being broadened into what will rather resemble perhaps the Knights of Columbus, and its influence, chiefly amongst the coming generation, will, it is hoped, effectuate a forceful militia of Catholic laymen.

The Népszövetség (People's League), with the political Christian Socialist party, is energetically coping with the Social-Democrats. The Népszövetség was instituted two years ago, and modeled after the Volksverein of Germany. Since its inception it has secured more than 200,000 members, and aims principally at disseminating Christian principles amongst the people at large, providing them with suitable reading matter, free legal advice and pecuniary assistance at a minimum rate of interest. The Christian Socialist organization is of long standing, but as a political body came into existence only during the past year, under the leadership of Canon Alexander Giesswein, Domestic Prelate of the Diocese of Győr, who is, moreover, the party's sole representative in Parliament. To Monsignor Giesswein's philanthropic efforts is due the insertion of several important points in the newer laws, providing for the amelioration of social conditions in every part of the kingdom.

Foreboding, therefore, though the enumerated conditions appear, animated Catholic organization has assumed a promising aspect amongst all classes; the lethargy in Catholic circles, which has afforded alien elements so choice an opportunity, is being followed by earnest and serious action; and instead of apathetical contempt of these ruinous influences, a vigorous campaign has finally been begun against them, the result of which we may await with sanguine interest.

PETER J. DOLIN.

Organization Work Among French Catholics

PARIS, MARCH 12, 1911.

Within the past few weeks French Bishops have been issuing pastoral letters urging the need of organization among their people. The letter of the Bishop of La Rochelle is attracting widespread attention. Among other wholesome truths, this sentiment of his Lordship is specially quoted: "Not every Republican is necessarily an Atheist, and the fact that a man votes the Monarchist ballot does not suffice to make him a thoroughgoing Catholic. The Catholics of my diocese may vote as they please, so long as political conditions remain normal. But when our fight is being waged for the holiest of earthly things, the soul of the child, one who professes to be a Catholic, must put aside political preferences and parties and give his devoted service to those who strive loyally to save that soul."

The Bishop tells his flock that the work of organization is being urged in all the dioceses of France, and exhorts them to enter wholeheartedly into the efforts to unify Catholics throughout the country in the cause of Catholics schools.

M.

Catholic Protest in Vienna.

VIENNA, March 10, 1911.

The people's assembly hall, an immense auditorium in the Vienna town hall, on March 5 was the scene of a splendid demonstration planned by the Catholics of the city in protest against those concerned in the attempt to disturb the religious peace of the empire by renewing in Vienna the bitter animosities of the Los von Rom movement. In all its history the town hall never witnessed so tremendous a gathering; and long before the hour announced for the opening of the meeting the thousands of Catholic men and women of every class who came to pledge their cooperation in the objects of the assembly had so crowded the vast auditorium as to make necessary an overflow meeting in the adjoining park. The enthusiasm of the great multitude, giving unquestionable evidence of the deep, earnest Catholicism of the capital city, must have warmed the heart of Dr. Nagl, our Coadjutor-Archbishop, who, in conjunction with the Mayor, Dr. Neumayer, had perfected the arrangements for the meeting, and presided during the evening's program.

In his opening address, Dr. Nagl expressed his gratification at the response his call to arms had received. He described the meeting as an overwhelming proof presented to the enemies of the Church that their efforts to arouse discord among Catholics and to sow dissensions among them would be fruitless. "Loyal to Church," he said, "as we are loyal to Emperor and to fatherland, let us remain firmly united; let no petty misunderstanding inflame mischievous animosities among us; then will the glory of victory be ever with us."

The principal address of the evening was made by Dr. Meffert, the well-known Munich-Gladbach lecturer. He spoke on the theme, "Faith and Culture," and rarely have the Catholics of Vienna had the pleasure of listening to such an impressive discourse. Full of power and of deep, incisive thought, the speaker's address was a veritable balancing of accounts for good and all with the Los von Rom disturbers, and his telling points, marshaled with an occasional spice of dry humor, evoked repeated bursts of applause from the immense gathering.

Declaring that the twentieth century is sure to witness a tremendous conflict of principles, the orator held it to be a matter of course that the Catholic Church would be the centre about which the conflict would wage. The Catholic Church is the upholder of Christianity—nay, she is Christianity in the concrete; the fact that she is especially assailed is but an overmastering evidence of her power and of the immensely important place she holds in the world's history. The history of the Church, he affirmed, is her most glorious apology. And, contrary to the assertions of modern falsifiers of her record, she has in all her years been a watchful guardian and protector of learning. As the Vatican Council proclaimed, with her every science is free to pursue its investigations in its own field, along its own lines and following its own methods.

Regarding the relations of the Church to the State, Dr. Meffert affirmed it to be a miserable calumny to say that the Church is lustful of power and that she wished to rule the State. Leo XIII has given satisfactory proof of this in his splendid study of the relation subsisting between the two independent societies. What the Church does combat, and what she will combat as long as there is in her the breath of life, is State omnipotence. To supinely stand for that folly were to fall back into the hideous disorder of Heathendom. The ecclesiastico-political program of the Church has as its foundation principle the words of Christ, her head: Give, then, to God the things that are God's and to the State the things that are of the State. Dr. Meffert panegyricized the attitude of the Church in regard to the indissolubility of the matrimonial bond, the essential strength of domestic and civil life, and ably refuted the invidious charge that the Church is the enemy of industrial and economic progress among the nations.

Speaking especially of Germany, he contended that reactionism and sluggish backwardness are to-day the characteristic defects of purely Protestant districts and of the purely Protestant political parties, whilst it is matter of plainest experience that the Catholic Centre party has been in the forefront of every progressive movement started since its organization, the pioneers blazing the way to economic development and to remedial legislation for the social betterment of their countrymen. "To-day," he declared, whilst his hearers applauded him tumultuously, "the party of discontent, the breeders of social discord and ruinous upheaval, finds its stronghold in 'red' Saxony, the most Protestant section of the empire." Dr. Meffert concluded a speech which lasted an hour and a half with an eloquent plea for united action on the part of all Catholics; he boldly urged them to seize and use the weapons hitherto largely left to the enemy—organization and the press—and in loyal "thinking with the Church" to prove in their own lives and activities the matchless energy for good which is the Church's boast in all the ages.

K. K.

Among the forty-five European rulers of states, reckoning Pius X in the number, there are twenty-eight, almost two-thirds, who have gone beyond the half-century mark. On February 26, the youngest of these monarchs, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, passed life's fiftieth milestone. Of the twenty-eight there are eighteen who have lived more than sixty years, thirteen of these latter being over sixty-five. Seven have completed the scriptural three-score and ten: Prince John II, of Lichtenstein, is 71; King Charles, of Roumania, is 72; Pope Pius X is 76; Prince Henry XIV, of Reuss, is 79; Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, is 81; Duke George II, of Saxe-Meiningen, is 85, and Prince Regent Luitpold, of Bavaria, has just completed his ninetieth year. Prince Luitpold, since the death of King Christian, of Denmark (January 29, 1906), in his eighty-eighth year, is the senior among Europe's rulers. In length of years upon the throne, however, Emperor Francis Joseph, the beloved monarch of Austria-Hungary, leads all his companion princes, that distinction having come to him upon the death of Queen Victoria, January 22, 1901. The ruler of the dual monarchy was born on August 18, 1830, and he assumed Austria-Hungary's crown December 2, 1848, after the abdication of his uncle, Ferdinand I, following the revolution of that year.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Alleluia

AMERICA begins its new volume just as the Church is exulting in the triumph of Easter. The happiness of "this day that the Lord has made" is ours in a very great degree, because the Alleluia of 1911 is a culmination of the Alleluias which, by the peculiar blessing of God, we have been able to sing with ever increasing joy since the Easter of last year. Each week as we set out with our tribute of love for Him to Whom AMERICA is consecrated came the wonderment as to "who would roll away the stone." But we continued on our journey, though "it was yet dark," for the sun had not risen, and lo! "the stone was rolled away." The angels were there with their message.

The words of praise and encouragement from subscribers and contributors, the unfailing courtesy and kindness of those with whom we were at times compelled to come into conflict, as well as the continually widening influence which AMERICA was exerting, made each succeeding step a happy one in the progress of the year, and we are now setting out upon the new journey with more than usual confidence that next Easter we shall be able to send even a more joyous Alleluia than the glad one we send to the world to-day.

Praise From Sir Rupert

Catholics will be grateful to the courageous and kindly Methodist Bishop, Thomas B. Neely, who, in an address at a Church Conference in Cambridge on April 6, called attention in such a striking fashion to the countless benefits which by the overshadowing Providence of God have been poured out on this country through the instrumentality of the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church. The testimony, however, is only by deduction.

It was a Catholic who threw open the portals of the Western World to Christianity, and the thought that ever dominated the mind of the greatest of the world's navigators, and ever inspired his purpose as he drove his caravels through the dark waters of the unknown seas was that his daring would help to the expansion of the boundaries of the Catholic Church, of which he was a loving and devoted subject. Protestantism, of course, was not then in existence.

Like Columbus, other Catholic explorers proclaimed their ardent and loving loyalty to their faith. They penetrated to the remotest recesses of the continent, and from Santa Fé in the south to the St. Lawrence in the north, from St. Augustine in the east to San Francisco at the golden gates of the west, from Jogues' Lake of the Blessed Sacrament in New York to Marquette's River of the Immaculate Conception midway, and to Sacramento on the slopes of the Pacific, the Catholic Church inscribed the names of its saints, its faith and its sacraments from ocean to ocean in characters which not only time can never efface, but which will continue to proclaim through the centuries that Catholicity is not an alien in this part of the world.

There was a Catholic who attached his sign manual to the Declaration of Independence and was among the most self-sacrificing and illustrious of the heroes who gave us that cherished document. Catholic blood was poured out in torrents for the preservation of the Union in the War of Secession, and to-day the countless schools and churches and hospitals and asylums which Catholics have erected all over the land, not from the lavish benefactions of the rich, but from generous contribution of the laboring classes, to whom, thank God, the Church is mainly ministering, are so many testimonies to their belief and confidence in the stability of the country's political institutions. Catholics are the strongest, if not the only, bulwark against the atheistic and anarchistic socialism that is threatening all governments to-day. The sanctity and inviolability with which they invest the marriage tie is the main safeguard this country has for the dignity of and holiness of motherhood, the rights of the child to existence and education, and the permanency and happiness of family life, on which our whole social and political structure depends. Their long and sometimes apparently hopeless fight for religious education is at last opening the eyes of thinking people to the madness of expending countless millions to bring up a generation of atheists, who will sweep all churches out of existence, Methodist as well as others, and be the greatest foes of their native land; and, finally, the doctrine which is planted down deep in the soul of every Catholic, viz., that the authority of rulers is derived from God, who, while giving the right to command, imposes the corresponding duty to obey, imparts to his soul an ardent patriotism which is not a mere sentiment or a condition of mind determined by temporal advantage, but a sacred duty, which can demand any sacrifice for the defense of the country's honor and greatness.

Of course, Bishop Neely did not say all this. Indeed, he said the contrary; and professed to see in the Roman Catholic Church "the greatest peril in this country." But it is a way that some orators have of arousing attention by asserting a paradox, and the other members of the Conference must have smiled when the eloquent Bishop reeled off his vaticinations of woe. Some of the lay-readers, however, have expressed great indignation at the Bishop's lack of rhetorical judgment.

Jubilee of Italian Unity

On March 17, 1861, was born the Kingdom of Italy, the necessary consequence of the revolutionary theory of the immutability of accomplished facts. Lombardy had been Piedmont's prize in the war of 1859, and in the following year the Revolution had taken possession of the Two Sicilies, the Duchies and part of the Papal States. By means of colonized voters, repeaters, stuffed ballot boxes, intimidation and other methods of obtaining a predetermined result, it had guided so-called plebiscites to declare for annexation to the northern kingdom, and consequently United Italy was a foregone conclusion.

Only in a topsy-turvy book can we find the Carpenter weeping as he ate the oysters he had lured to their fate. No one dreams that robbers add to their crime by rejoicing over their booty. Should the police, after capturing a band, proclaim tragically: "They were actually reveling as we came upon them, drinking the very liquor they had stolen, and shouting in admiration of the jewels," people would only laugh; nor would they be indignant if the robbers, acquitted by the court and retaining their spoil, should celebrate the anniversaries of their fortune. We, therefore, are not so insane as to demand that those who call themselves the Kingdom of Italy should spend its fiftieth year in sackcloth and ashes.

Neither do we ask them to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, concerning the establishment of that Kingdom. We are not so simple as to require what is morally impossible; and the turpitude of the history of that event is such that its defenders, since they are human, could not lift the veil from it. We do, however, wish them to be as truthful as they can. The "Grido di dolore" from every part of the peninsula imposed upon public opinion in 1859: we would rather not hear about it in 1911. We would prefer to hear nothing of the fable that the Italian princes were tyrants, for the world knows now that not even Bomba was such. In the old days the English press was energetic in building up the fable. The Illustrated London News proved one sovereign a tyrant because he used to write his notes on state documents in a sort of spiral, in order, so we were told, to torment his ministers. It gave a picture of such a note, confiding in the Englishman's inability to read Italian. The document was a poor person's petition for relief from the royal treasury: the spiral note was the grant of a weekly stipend. No poor man would address such a petition to the King of Italy: should he do so the notes on it would be written in straight lines, but they would not authorize a grant from public funds. We object to be told, as a writer on the Times tells us, that the people of the Italian peninsula are all of one race, and that no one, least of all the Pope, is the worse for having been forced to yield Italian soil to the Italian State. Such manifest falsehoods are an insult to the meanest intelligence. We object, too, to his assertion that the people under the old régime were serfs. The writer should look up the word serf in the dictionary. They were not serfs, and, moreover, their lot was infinitely happier than it is to-day. He must not tell us that the Italian Kingdom is stable, when we know that the King had to receive and invite into the Cabinet a deputy who had shouted for his father's murder.

England took a leading part in the Italian Revolution. If its great journals choose to take a leading part in rejoicing over its jubilee, in which the European sovereigns seem inclined to take as small a part as possible, it is their own affair. To those who stand apart to view the proceedings it argues in England a blindness inexplicable, to rejoice over the revolution it made half a century ago, ignoring utterly the revolution now knocking at its own door.

Why the Mexican Cabinet Resigned

All the members of the Mexican cabinet are "Secretaries of State," one being Minister of Foreign Affairs, another of Justice, another of War, and so on through the list. The calendar for March marked 23 when the various secretaries sent in their written resignations. Along with certain publicly known reasons, which stamp their action as timely, to say the least, each has his own particular motive, as he is careful to state. One mentions as his motive his persuasion that different political schools should be represented in the cabinet, and, therefore, changes are needed. Two allege their shattered health; Secretary Sierra is in within three months of his eighty-third birthday, so he may be excused; the other is Ramon Corral, the ailing vice-president, who has since obtained eight months' leave of absence for a trip to Europe. Secretary Limantour thinks there should be cabinet changes from time to time. (He became a member of the cabinet in 1892, then being thirty-eight years of age, and remains in the new cabinet.) Secretary Molina, of Public Works, goes to the point: "The desire of the public for a cabinet change is pronounced." Secretary Gonzalez Cosío of War and Marine is equally frank. He "wishes to facilitate the work of the President in restoring order and peace, which have been disturbed for reasons which the authors of the disturbances have not clearly defined." His resignation was not accepted, although his patriotism may be called upon for another resignation before all shall have been settled.

We have had some slight acquaintance with the Mexican press for twenty-five years, and we are free to admit that up to and including the celebration of the centenary of Mexican independence in September, 1910, it betrayed a certain dull sameness. Certain papers were openly anti-Catholic, and their contents reflected the spirit of the proprietors; others were openly Catholic, and their contents were in keeping with the professions of their proprietors; others busied themselves with commerce or literature, and left religion and politics severely alone. It was a comparatively rare thing to notice any adverse comment on the administration of the laws or the conduct of the executive; and if some feeble remark were made, the full strength of the comma and the rich resources of the potential mood of the verb were pressed into service. If now and then some quill-driver rashly left the beaten track, his patrons soon had occasion to subscribe for another paper or be satisfied with none. The darkness just before the dawn and the hush that precedes the hurricane give some notion of what the Mexican press was; whether it be brightness or glare, the refreshing breeze or the whirlwind, the press has undergone a marked change. If Diaz has indeed made modern Mexico, as all are ready to admit, for a newspaper of his capital to speak of his administration as una dictadura sabia y civilizadora (a wise and civilized dictatorship) is little short of astonishing, when we reflect that is said of one whose title is Constitutional President of the United Mexican States.

We think that Diaz has become, to some extent, the victim of his cronies and toadies. As gongs and tom-toms were used to drown the shrieks of the suttee, so a powerful clique of flatterers have kept the groans of his people from reaching the ears of the old man who, in his more vigorous days, went forth and saw and heard and administered justice. Perhaps it was sometimes of the rough and ready sort, but he had to deal with rough and ready opponents. The resignation of the cabinet shows that Diaz knows of the evil; he admits that there is now in Mexico such a thing as "public opinion." A chapter replete with great facts has closed; something which may repeat the history of forty years ago has opened.

Unfit Novels

All of us who have to do with the training of boys and girls will be glad to learn that the fight against vicious literature, now well on in Germany, has been begun in England as well. Recent despatches tell us of a strongly worded protest against "certain novels issued by publishers of repute, which are not only unfit for perusal by a modest girl or a right-minded lad, but are likely to do harm to the moral character of all readers." The protest is made in a circular letter addressed to the London press by a number of peers, prelates, and school-masters.

The circular refers to works of popular fiction generally in esteem to-day. While granting that many of the books of this class of literature now in special demand in circulating libraries and at book stands are not indecent in the ordinary sense of the word, it contends that their whole tone has a debasing and demoralizing tendency. In them, it affirms, open vice and licentiousness are palliated and even justified. The reason of the crusade proclaimed by the signatories of the circular rests in the fact that an appeal to authors and publishers of such books has proved to be useless. The law requires strengthening before the circulation of the evil things can be stopped.

Pending the arousing of public opinion, which will achieve the desirable legislation, parents and school-masters and all who are interested in the training of young people are urged to set their faces against the sale of such novels, and to use every legitimate means to expose their character when "it cannot be detected by the titles, which are often colorless and misleading."

The movement cannot be too highly commended. The need of a similar crusade among ourselves in America has been frequently affirmed by those who have to do with the education of the young, and it is to be hoped that the example of England and Germany will lead to the organization here of an association, by means of which wholesome pressure to a like end may be brought to bear on publishers, circulating libraries, and book-sellers.

The Leaven Is Working

Would it not prove a surprising consummation to have denominationalism in educational work strengthened by the very efforts made to purge our schools of every trace of religious affiliations? The outcome is entirely within the possibilities. The Catholic attitude upon the school question is so entirely logical that it has been a mystery to us how any professing Christian could fail to grasp its truth. The elimination of explicit religious instruction from the program of schools, colleges and universities can have but one effect. It must lead to secularism, and secularism, with the tremendous numerical influence it would possess, must lead in the end to a sweeping removal of everything Christian from the lives of our people.

Perhaps prejudice against the Catholic Church and a certain mistrust of her growing strength have been the cause of the unwillingness manifested by non-Catholics to accept the oft-repeated statement of the Catholic position. Perhaps the material sacrifices which the Catholic idea entailed was the stumbling block. Perhaps the Christian bodies, outside of the Catholic Church, really believed that home influence and Sunday-school training would be able to hold the generations of their young people, entrusted to the care of the non-religious public schools, without taking upon themselves the burden of the millions required to establish private religious schools. Would it prove strange to have it come to pass that their eyes have been opened by the results brought about by the disbursement of the Carnegie millions in favor of non-religious training in the schools of the country?

There is some leaven working. Repeatedly of late voices from without the Church have taken up the Catholic contention and spoken even more plainly than a prudent purpose to avoid inopportune discussion has permitted Catholics to speak. Thus, two weeks ago, Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Chancellor of the American University, made a stirring address before the Newark Methodist Conference. He spoke in support of the need of education as "church armor," and cited the work of Roman Catholic institutions in evidence of the soundness of his contentions. He did not refer directly to the injurious working of the Carnegie Fund, but he lamented the fact that many of the universities of the country had been induced to divorce themselves from denominational affiliations. "The Methodist Church," said Dr. Hamilton, "has seen its mistake in not recognizing the visitation of opportunity in years gone by. It is only by making education a part of the activities of the Church, and by making religion a part of the educational system of the American universities that the principles upon which the government of the nation was founded can be preserved and the best interests of modern civilization conserved."

And Dr. Hamilton's words were not coldly received by the members of the Conference. Reports assure us that at the close of the address there was an unusual demonstration of approbation from the ministers present.

THE FLEUR DE LIS

Certain envious people, whose word is not to be taken in a matter of so much importance, aver that when some dwellers in mud huts on the marshy banks of a great river determined for the first time to seize their spears and sally forth to war on their fellow savages, encamped on the summit of a distant hill, they were at a loss for a distinctive banner to be borne ahead of their martial forces for the sake of inspiring enthusiasm and serving as a rally-point in the fury of the bloody encounter. While the sages squatted around their council fire and debated the momentous question, one of them, abstractedly digging his toes into the slimy ooze, disturbed the slumbers of one of the denizens of the low-lying shore. "Eureka," he cried, but not in Greek, "as we are to fight for our ancestral homes, here is something identified with them." And thereupon a crapaud was chosen as their symbol. One patriot sacrificed a piece of dimity, on which the crapauds were arranged in haphazard fashion, and, stalking along behind and around the fond reminder of home, the heroes cried havoc and started up the hill. The result of the battle belongs to another chapter, and is reserved for another occasion.

The golden lilies on a white field, so long emblematic of the ancient royal house of France, yielded to the tri-color when the mighty political upheaval at the end of the eighteenth century swept away old landmarks, changed the face of the country, and transformed its social life. These "golden lilies," we say it with all due apologies to national feeling, are not lilies. As fleurs de lis, or flower-de-luce, or plain, homely, lovable "flag," they have held an honored place in the garden for so long a time that nobody would venture to measure it. Stately mansion and humble cot have welcomed them and treasured them. Dainty hands have cared for them and they have rioted in the exuberance of their determination to flourish and flower; neglect has been their lot, and they have smiled bravely through it all and have held out sturdily in hopes of more propitious days. If you like a plant that will stand everything in the way of ill-treatment, except frying, boiling, and baking in a quick oven, the flower-de-luce is for you.

In a remote part of the country, where nearly all the rain comes down in a roily stream through irrigating ditches, there was once a garden fair to the eye, for it glowed with bright bands of flag, clear white, gold, imperial purple, lavender and blue; but misfortune befell it. The irrigating ditch, ugly but indispensable, failed in its mission through no fault of its own. A freshet carried away the dam which restrained the eager waters and doled them out as need suggested; and the harm was not repaired. The season, bright with the sun's glare but distressingly dry, left the earth parched and panting and the snow came as a longed-for relief. The flags were ready at the first call of spring, and they began cheerfully enough; but disputes and contentions prevented the storing of the life-giving water. They struggled on, putting out a few dwarfed flower stems, but only a feeble picture of their former glory. Not until their third season was their perseverance rewarded by the arrival of a muddy stream in the disused ditch.

Oddly enough, considering the form which its name so often takes, the fleur-de-lis is known to the growers as Iris Germanica, and thus it appears in their gorgeous catalogues. To our mind, all are "just lovely," but some of particular worth have been singled out for honorable mention by name. Who does not know the fragrant orris-root? It is simply the dried and ground root of Iris Florentina, whose white blooms, touched here and there with lavender, exhale the same delightful odor. Its first cousin, dignified with the surname of "Silver King," yields sweet-smelling blossoms of immaculate white. "Sambucina" is as rich as an orchid. Claret and orange and purple combine to please the eye, while a delicate perfume hovers over all. The elder brother of the present King George V, was remembered when a variety of most vigorous growth with large, fragrant flowers was to be named. "Albert Victor" is the most imposing member of the iris family; light blue and lavender are the prevailing tints.

Perhaps some carping critic may say that these floral treasures and others of the kindred that we might mention are not in all botanic strictness German iris. Be it so. This is not a treatise on botany; it is the expression of a wish to see the home beautified, so beautified as to defy the biting cold and fierce storms of winter; so beautified as to be a lasting joy without that never-ending care and attention that must be bestowed upon anemic exotics whose chief claim to notice is that they come from afar.

H. J. S.

LITERATURE

SOME DEVOTIONAL BOOKS.

The Saints of God, as has been observed, are but so many replicas in little of Blessed Mary's Son, the Prince of Peace: "replicas," because they reached heroic sanctity by modeling their lives on His; but only "in little," because the limitations of our nature make it impossible for one person to reflect very brightly more than a few of the perfections of Our Saviour's character. How admirable that character is, Father Alexander Gallerani, S.J., tries to show in the seventeen short chapters of a book called "Jesus All Great," which is translated by T. Loughlan, and published by P. J. Kenedy & Sons. This is a companion volume to "Jesus All Good," by the same author, which was warmly welcomed on its appearance some two years ago.

Among the books lately received which treat of the success the Eternal King's friends have had in making some of His perfections their own, is "The Spirit of St. Francis de Sales," a new and enlarged English edition, gotten out by the Benziger's, of the well-known work of the Bishop of Belley. It was, of course, the gentleness of Christ that shone out in the life of De Sales, and any one who would take up the excellent practice of reading every day one of the short anecdotes or exhortations in this book, would grow meek and gentle too.

The same publishing house is sending out a little essay by Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C., on another Francis, him of Assisi, called "St. Francis and Poverty." It was his desire to imitate the "extensive sympathy" of Our Lord, as the author shrewdly remarks, that filled the Poverello with such a passion for poverty; for "whilst wealth, by some inherent tendency, drives men apart, poverty draws them together."

Then from B. Herder comes M. T. Kelly's sketches of two of the King's earliest and closest friends, "Paul of Tarsus" and "John the Beloved." Each of these interesting little biographies is so short a book that it can be read at a sitting, and is sold at so low a price that they should find favor with readers of slender means and scanty leisure.

There have also been sent for review several other little books and pamphlets, which seem to suggest to ordinary Christians an easy means of likewise becoming the King's friends. One from Burns & Oates: "Devotions for Communion," though not very neatly bound, gathers into one volume many beautiful Communion-prayers and reflections from à Kempis, the writings of the saints and the Church's liturgy. Those who seldom have occasion, unhappily, to use a book like the foregoing, Canon Antoni asks, in a little pamphlet Benziger Brothers publish, "Why Not Receive Communion Every Day You Hear Mass?" and Rev. Louis F. Schlathoelter puts in a nutshell for them the advantages of "Daily Communion," in a booklet sold for five cents by the Columbia Publishing Company of Milwaukee. Those who still ask querulously "How Can This Man Give Us His Flesh to Eat?" should find many of their intellectual difficulties with regard to the Real Presence dissipated in a pamphlet published by the International Truth Society, of 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, entitled "The Mystery of the Most Holy Eucharist and Human Reason," by the Rev. Joseph Chiandano, S.J., translated from the Italian by M. Craven McLorg.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Twenty Years at Hull House. By JANE ADDAMS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.50 net.

Everybody interested in social work knows Hull House in Chicago, where social workers live and organize, whence their undertakings radiate, and around which cluster the building wherein they carry on their personal work. It takes its name from one who planned a home for his family, little dreaming of future fame. But as the slums crept nearer and nearer the home was turned to other uses, until at length it came to that which has made it known in every English-speaking land. The original house stands no longer; its builder's name has been retained because his heirs have been benefactors of the works founded by the author of the book before us.

Jane Addams was born some fifty years ago in Cedarville, Illinois. Her childhood's surroundings were comfortable, and her father's growing prosperity brought greater ease with the lapse of time. Graduating in Rockford Seminary in 1881, she resolved to study medicine so as to serve the poor. Accordingly she entered the Woman's Medical College, Philadelphia; but a spinal affection from which she had long suffered interrupted her course and sent her to Europe for two years. There she visited Toynbee Hall, London, and gained the idea of the modern Settlement. She abandoned her medical studies, and in 1889 moved into Hull House with her companion, Ellen Gates Starr.

After twenty years she gives us her reminiscences of her work, that of the Settlement, and that which reached out to procure the welfare of the poor by the enforcing of existing laws and the promoting of new legislation. The former included the clubs, the gymnasium, the theatre, the trades and arts classes and the lecture courses; the latter was busy with sanitary inspection, the control of the sale of drugs, children's courts, the regulation of labor and the contesting of civic elections. In the earlier chapters of her book she goes back to her childhood, and they are not its least interesting part. The book is copiously and admirably illustrated by Miss Norah Hamilton.

Miss Addams' character appears singularly amiable and strong, and thoroughly genuine in a love of the poor. It needs only the supernatural to attain sanctity. But that "only" means a defect almost infinite and to be almost infinitely mourned. She was religiously inclined as a child, but seems, as far as one can judge from her book, to have drifted away from all definite faith. This has no place in Hull House, which is situated in the midst of a population largely Catholic. No wonder, then, that all who hold man's chief duty to be the service of God, lament at seeing an institution which, co-operating with the Catholic Church, could do so much to draw him to his Creator, leading him in the opposite direction.

This lack of the supernatural deprives Miss Addams' work of its strongest motive. Viewing it absolutely one is struck with its dimensions. Comparing it with the great city in which it is done and with the masses it never can reach, one feels that its results are an insignificant return for so much effort. The world is not going to be regenerated by sociology; and the material betterment effected by any social work is so limited that, if it stops there, it seems hardly worth its sacrifices. Elevated to the supernatural order it touches eternity and its value is measureless; for the salvation of one soul for which Christ died would be cheaply bought even though it cost all the riches of earth and all the efforts of man. H. W.

None Other Gods. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $1.50.

A book remarkable for character-study, development of plot, sustained interest, and the other-world point of view. In addition to all these distinctions, the wit and humor of it, especially in the first part, are most refreshing. Also, one magnificent chapter describing a night in a Benedictine monastery atones, in great degree, for the rather bare and forbidding sketch of the religious life which Father Benson furnished us in one of his recent stories. Frank Guisely is the hero. He is presented to us in the first pages as a Trinity College student, given to practical jokes and to a "terrible way of meaning what he said." He has just become a Catholic, and his father has written him a letter in which he informs the convert that he will have nothing more to do with him. Frank interprets the letter literally, sells at auction his books and furniture, and takes to the open road. He becomes a tramp, falls in with a Major Truscott and a woman passing as the degenerate major's wife, and clings to these wretched persons, through all manner of sordid surroundings, to the end. Frank makes it his one business in life to separate this woman from the major, and he succeeds, losing his life in the moment of success. All this time Frank advances by leaps and bounds up the steep paths of holiness. Such are the bare outlines of a plot in the working out of which the author has created a magnificent and strikingly original story.

Father Benson cares little for the obvious. It is the thing that does not happen which appeals to him. He loves to record the unrecordable, to describe the indescribable, to tell us what a thing is by setting down minutely what it is not. His mysticism is at times strongly Maeterlinckian. He detects dreadful significances in details the most insignificant. As a thief suspects each bush an officer, so Father Benson suspects an inward event of "tremendous significance to lie behind outward happenings made up of trifles light as air. He is a mystic, and sometimes he uses turns of language which, while meaning one thing to him means something else to the reader. For instance on page 313 we have the following reflection from the hero: "Religion doesn't seem to me a thing like Art or Music, in which you can take refuge. It either covers everything, or it isn't religion. Religion never has seemed to me (I don't know if I am wrong) one thing, like other things, so that you can change about and back again. . . . It's either the background and foreground all in one, or it's a kind of game. It's either true, or it's a pretense."

The ordinary reader might gather from this that one cannot turn to religion for consolation, since religion has no consolation to offer. This, of course, is obviously false. The hero means to say that he cannot turn to religion for the simple reason that he is always thus turned. It is a very subtle thought, and likely to be misleading.

Strangest of all, Father Benson teaches his mysticism in the language of the smart set. Also, his style is at times extremely colloquial. For instance on page 2, one is staggered by the following: "A white-aproned cook or two moves across the cobbled spaces with trays upon their heads; a tradesman's boy comes out of the corner entrance from the hostel; a cat or two stretches himself on the grass." [Italics ours]. Evidently consistency is not the bright particular jewel that sparkles on the edifice of such a sentence. It would be ungenerous not to add that the style of the writer throughout is impressionistic and distinguished. The deeper meaning of the story will remain a secret to the average reader. FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

The Priest. A Tale of Modernism in New England. By the Author of "Letters to His Holiness Pope Pius X." Boston: Sherman, French & Co. $1.25 net.

One hesitates at first whether it is worth while referring to this book. It is a protest against the supposed ecclesiastical tyranny that keeps great minds in thralldom. Its effect on the reader will be the opposite of what is intended. Its chief personage is in league with a Unitarian minister, and Dorothy, the squire's niece, to compound a new theology which will bring all men into the Church. When properly suspended by his superiors, Dorothy seems to solve the problem of his future.

* * *

The Contemplative Life. By a CARTHUSIAN MONK. New York: Benziger Bros.

A governor in a province of China asked a Catholic bishop what was the use of installing a community of Carmelites in his diocese before Christianity was solidly established among the people. The bishop replied that ten religious who pray will do more than twenty missionaries who preach. This piece of valuable advice may be of service outside of China. Indeed the unchurched world in general may profit by it, and also worldly-minded and ignorant Catholics whose vision is affected by the religious fog in which they sometimes prefer to live. * * *

La Piété, Le Zèle. Par l'ABBÉ P. FEIGE, Supérieur des missionnaires diocésains de Meaux. Paris: Pierre Tequi.

Piety is the characteristic of the Angels; zeal of the Apostles; in other words, piety and zeal signify the love of God and our neighbor; two virtues which ought to be especially exercised in these days when religion is having such a hard fight with the world around. The Abbé furnishes us with a series of discourses on the nature and motives of piety as well as the means to increase it, and does the same for zeal. The book has the endorsement of distinguished churchmen, prefixed by a note of acceptance from His Eminence Cardinal Merry del Val. * * *

Some weeks ago we drew attention to forthcoming books in England, which might interest Catholic readers. Recently we read the announcement that Mr. Lucien Wolf had been entrusted with the task of writing the authoritative biography of the late Marquess of Ripon. Lord Ripon's career should make such a work a valuable and interesting contribution to the English history of the last century. He was in succession Secretary of State for War, at the head of the Indian Office and afterwards of the Colonial Office, and Governor-General of India. Lord Ripon resigned the highest official position in English Freemasonry and quitted its-ranks to become a Catholic at the full-tide of his political career. We have no means of knowing what qualifications are possessed by Mr. Lucien Wolf to enable him to deal adequately with the religious life of Lord Ripon and with his sturdy honesty in following his conscience in the despite of worldly ambitions.

Another announcement of interest to Catholic readers, especially to those who are students of Polish literature, is that of the approaching publication by Messrs. Dent of the "Life of Adam Mickiewicz," the national poet of Poland. The biographer is Miss Monica Gardner, who has contributed to the pages of AMERICA several brief essays on the Polish poet. Mickiewicz, of aristocratic birth, was exiled from his native land for his patriotic devotion. At one time he held the Chair of Slavonic Literature at the College of France, and his poems enjoyed great popularity in Europe for two generations.

Messrs. Doubleday, Page & Company, the authorized American publishers of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's works, have issued "The Kipling Index," in the form of a small pamphlet. It is a welcome guide to the voluminous productions of a writer whose book-titles are rarely luminous to one seeking the rediscovery of a favorite story, striking passage or remembered episode. The compilation has been done very intelligently by Mr. Eugene F. Saxton; and as the publishers offer it to anyone on the payment of five cents postage, it is likely to have a wide circulation.

On or before May 1st of this year, a catalogue of all the books written by Catholic authors, and now in the Carnegie Library, Pittsburgh, will be issued by the Library authorities. The catalogue will contain between 250 and 300 pages, and will give a list of nearly 1,500 Catholic authors, whose several thousand volumes may be found in the Library. The work of preparing the forthcoming catalogue was started some months ago, following a recommendation to the Librarian of the Carnegie Library by Rev. Thomas F. Coakley, D.D., of St. Paul's Cathedral, Pittsburgh. It has since been prosecuted with earnestness under a corps of trained librarians, with the constant collaboration of Father Coakley, and its authors believe that the care taken with its production will make the catalogue the most elaborate and complete of its kind ever published. In preparing the Carnegie catalogue, special efforts have been made to correct the errors and omissions in existing catalogues of Catholic books, and certain new features have been introduced, which will add greatly to its utility. It will be an annotated list, with exhaustive classified and alphabetical indexes, and in addition to this, every important book will have a brief notice giving its table of contents, and a short critique, indicating the relative value of each work.

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Historical Records and Studies. Vol. VI, Part 1. February, 1911. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.
- The Science of Education. By T. P. Keating, B.A., L.C.P. With an Introduction by the Rev. T. A. Finlay, M.A. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 90 cents.
- The Inner Life and the Writings of Dame Gertrude Moore. Revised and Edited by Dom Benedict Weld-Blundell. Two Volumes. New York: Benziger Bros.
- Father Damien. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. Hyde, of Honolulu, from Robert Louis Stevenson. With a Statement by Mrs. Stevenson. Notre Dame, Ind.: The Ave Maria Press. Net 30 cents.
- Lays and Legends of Our Blessed Lady. By a Member of the Presentation Community, Lixnaw, County Kerry. New York: Benziger Bros.
- The English Lourdes. By Father Clement Tyck, C.R.P. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 70 cents.
- Her Journey's End. By Frances Cooke. New York: Benziger Bros. Net $1.25.
- Won by Conviction. (A Character Study.) By the Rev. Denis O'Shea. New York: Benziger Bros.
- What the Old Clock Saw. By Sophie Maud. Benziger Bros. Net 75 cents.
- Alleluia. An Easter Booklet. By Rev. T. J. O'Mahony, D.D., D.C.L. Second Edition. Dublin: Browne & Nolan.
- The Chief Ideas of the Baltimore Catechism. With Some Additions Arranged According to the Method of Rev. John Furnis, C.S.S.R. By the Rev. John E. Mullett. New York: Benziger Bros. Net $3.25 per 100.
- The Child Prepared for First Communion. According to the Decree, "Quam Singulari." By the Rev. F. M. Zulueta, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $2.25 per 100.

Pamphlet:

- Why Should I be Moral? A Discussion on the Basis of Ethics. By Ernest R. Hull, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 15 cents.

Latin Publication:

- Opuscula Ascetica Selecta. Ioannis Cardinalis Bona. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.25.

German Publications:

- Luther. Von Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Drei Bände, Erste Band. Luthers Werden: Grundlegung der Spaltung bis 1530. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $3.90.
- Der Eid wider den Modernismus; Und die Theologische Wissenschaft. Von Dr. Theol. Joseph Mausbach. Erstes bis fünftes Tausend. St. Louis: B. Herder.
- Katechesen. Für die Vier Obern Klassen der Volksschule. Im Engsten Anschluss an den Thurer (Rottenburger) Katechismus. Ausgearbeitet und Gehalten von P. Celestin Muff, O.S.B., Zweiter Band. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 75 cents.

EDUCATION

Each year March 25 is observed throughout Maryland as a holiday, since it is the anniversary of the landing of Lord Baltimore's colony on the shores of that Commonwealth. To the school children throughout the State is allotted a special share in the commemorative celebrations. In each school, in the larger communities at least, an address to the pupils is made by some well-known Marylander, there are recitations and singing of patriotic songs by the children, and where possible dramatic representations are given of historic scenes in the early history of the State. This year, as usual, Cardinal Gibbons directed the parochial schools to join in the special observances of the day. In their case the children attended a Mass of Thanksgiving in the morning, and the afternoon was given over to a similar program to that followed in the city schools. In addition the diocesan committee, of which

Rev. Dr. C. F. Thomas was chairman, had announced a series of competitive essays on noted sons of Maryland, open to the different grades, including colleges, academies and universities. Cash prizes were awarded to the successful competitors in the various contests.

Thomas D. Walsh, superintendent of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, makes some suggestive statements in the report of the society just issued. He tells us that the society investigated in 1910 complaints to the number of 129 of illegal admissions of children to moving picture shows. Of 87 cases prosecuted in court convictions were obtained in 77. Aside from these cases the society prosecuted offenders against children for crimes having their origin in moving picture establishments, with the result that sentences of imprisonment were imposed aggregating upward of fifty-five years. "The society," adds Mr. Walsh, "is powerless to check this rapidly growing evil without the support of every mother and father in the community, as well as of all those who have the interest of the children at heart. The Church is the greatest factor in this preventive work and must speak at once and with force from the pulpit and to its Sunday-school classes if it would save the children."

Word comes to us that united action on the part of the Catholics of Belgium is finally assured in the one matter concerning which there has been fear of a contention injurious to the cause. As their present majority in parliament is a small one, the assurance is doubly gratifying; division among the Catholic representatives might so easily lead to a defeat of the party. The school question has been for some time the occasion of discord. A fairly strong minority of the party, under the leadership of M. Woeste, has opposed compulsory school laws absolutely; the rest of the Catholic majority, though not admitting all that the Liberals and Socialists demanded, stood ready to accept the principle of compulsory school laws in order to secure to children a certain minimum of training. Cardinal Mercier has just published a pastoral letter in which he proposes a compromise that satisfies both wings of the Catholic party. The Cardinal avows his readiness to accept the compulsory school bill under fixed conditions: first, its provisions must in no wise interfere with the right of parents to send their children to free Catholic schools instead of to the interdenominational public schools; and secondly, the law must provide that these free Catholic schools shall receive their proportionate share of the school tax. M. Woeste and his following accept the Cardinal's stand unreservedly; the progressists, as his opponents in the party have been termed, affirm that his Eminence expresses just what they have been contending for. These mutual assurances settle the difficulty and a long-dreaded split in the Catholic party is thus happily and finally avoided.

A recently organized society of teachers in Brussels, Belgium, composed exclusively of Socialists and having as chief purpose the propagation of socialistic doctrines, was treated to an unlooked-for surprise in its first public meeting, held in the Maison du Peuple in that city. M. de Brouckere, a militant Belgian Socialist, had been invited to address the gathering on the topic: Neutral Schools. Expecting an entirely different treatment of the subject, the members of the society were amazed to find themselves listening to a speech proving the flat impossibility of neutrality, i. e., of non-religious training in schools. The orator affirmed the impossibility on two heads: to defend such a system is to follow a vain dream, and in the supposition that the vain dream could be made a reality, its exponents would find themselves forced to close their schools. Neutral schools, he explained, so far from helping to spread the light of intelligence, must plunge their followers into abysmal darkness of ignorance. "For," he continued, "neutrality in the matter of education must have one of two meanings: Either it supposes that its devotees hold no positive and fixed opinions in all the questions of controversy of the day, or it simply forces them to banish from their programs of study and to ignore such questions and to teach nothing that is in any way subject of discussion. M. de Brouckere, in a very effective analysis of neutrality, then proceeded to show how school training is radically impossible in either of the two suppositions. Whatever the speaker's purpose, he certainly did a good work in pricking a bubble Socialists love to see floating above them.

We learn from the Bombay Examiner that the Travancore Government lately disposed of a joint memorial signed by the Archbishop of Verapoly and five Bishops, in which they pleaded that Catholic students of the State should be compelled to receive education only in Catholic schools. The prelates pointed out that a godless education cannot but produce most harmful effects on society. The Government replied that they were wholly unable to act on the principle that Catholic children should receive their education in Catholic schools only. They also expressed their regret that the memorials had reflected on the education given in other schools generally, and saw no grounds for the implication that the education imparted in non-Catholic schools is either godless or is causing harmful effects on society. The Government concluded with the remark that an exceptionally difficult question like this could not be solved if the heads of one denomination took it on themselves to speak disparagingly of the work done by other denominations. So the Catholics in Travancore, like their co-religionists elsewhere, are having their own troubles in their efforts to obtain a Christian education for their children.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The growth of social unrest and anti-religious social theories in the United States has been a source of much anxiety to the Catholics bishops and clergy for some time. To combat these features of the socialist propaganda, which are particularly directed against the doctrines and moral teachings of the Catholic Church, the Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies has been created. Archbishop Farley has been chosen honorary president, and the bishops of Brooklyn, Trenton and Newark honorary vice-presidents. The headquarters of the League are at No. 20 Vesey street. The League will be governed by a board of twenty-five directors and a special "committee on social studies." The latter will have a two-fold purpose, namely, the extension of the "retreats" movement, begun less than two years ago, and the establishment of regular courses of systematic study by Catholic laymen of social questions and modern apologetics. The classes will be opened next fall and will continue through the winter and spring. The plans of the Laymen's League will be made known more fully at a public meeting to be held on the first Sunday in May at Carnegie Hall. Archbishop Farley will speak.

New York was the first city to arrange for the celebration of an early morning Mass (2.30 a.m.) for night workers, and two such Masses are now said here every Sunday morning in the churches of St. Andrew, downtown, and St. Francis of Assisi, uptown. For Sunday morning, May 7, a jubilee celebration is being arranged, when the Mass on that day will be celebrated at St. Patrick's Cathedral. His Grace Archbishop Farley will pontificate, and the sermon will be preached by Bishop McFaul, of Trenton, N. J., who will take for his subject the Catholic Press.

Bishop McDonnell has invited the Passionist Fathers to establish a foundation of their Congregation in the Diocese of Brooklyn, where they have long enjoyed much local favor as missionaries. They will build a monastery on Shelter Island, which will also serve as a summer retreat for the members of the Eastern houses of their Congregation, and afford priests for the care of several transient summer colonies along that section of the Long Island coast. The spiritual care of the summer boarder, who yearly increases by hundreds, here as well as along the Jersey shore, is a serious problem, but both Bishop McDonnell in Long Island and Bishop McFaul in New Jersey are happily solving it in the most practical manner. Not only are the needs of the summer visitor carefully looked after, but substantial churches are rising all along these coasts, testifying to the pious generosity of the transients, and forming centres from which permanent parishes are being organized. The spread of the Faith in both sections during the past twenty years has been most notable and gratifying.

Philadelphia Catholics gave this year $60,345 at the annual diocesan collection for their seminary, an increase of $3,642 over the amount subscribed the previous year.

There are three Catholic Chaplains, Rev. Joseph C. Kennedy, Twenty-second Infantry, Rev. George Waring, Eleventh Cavalry, and Rev. F. P. Joyce, Fourth Artillery, now with the United States troops gathered at San Antonio, Texas. The Rev. Alexander P. Landry has just been appointed a chaplain in the Army. Until recently he was Field Secretary of the Catholic Extension Society. He belongs to the diocese of Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Rt. Rev. Bishop Shaw, of San Antonio, Texas, assisted by the military chaplains present in the camp, celebrated Mass recently for the United States troops stationed at Fort Sam Houston and the Maneuver Camp. The services were the first held in the handsome new chapel built and donated to the United States Army by the citizens of San Antonio, and formally accepted by President Taft on his recent visit to that city. Preaching on the warfare of life to the officers and soldiers who crowded the edifice, the bishop showed how by fidelity to Church and country they would prove themselves worthy of our Army's glorious record and add such lustre to their Church, the Mother of heroes, as was shed on it by the Christian soldier, St. Sebastian; so that when "taps" is sounded over their grave each shall merit the epitaph: "Here lies a Christian soldier who fought the good fight and kept the faith." Bishop Shaw announced that Mass would be celebrated in the Chapel every Sunday hereafter.

The will of the late Rev. Bartholomew McKeany, of Bondville, Mass., provides for public bequests amounting to $59,000. The largest single bequest is one of $25,000 for masses to be celebrated only by missionary priests in China, India and Africa. Rev. J. A. Walsh, of the Boston Cathedral, is to be consulted about the proper distribution of the money in the countries named. The sum of $10,000 is to be spent by the executor of the estate in establishing an endowment fund in some suitable institution, the income to be spent in the training of young men for the missionary field in China, India or Japan. A total of $7,000 is bequeathed to the Sisters of the Good Shepherd of Springfield, and $5,000 to the Mercy Hospital. Father McKeany left all his real estate, with the exception of one farm in Belchertown, to the church of which he was rector, besides giving it $3,000 in money.

SOCIOLOGY

Henry VIII has long been dead. Whatever good he may have done was so deep "interred with his bones," that his admirers have hard work to dig it up. The evil he did, according to Shakespeare's rule "lives after him," and has followed England's "imperial sway" to "regions Caesar never knew," nor, for the matter of that, Henry either.

There lives in Vancouver, B. C., or, rather, lived—for he may be in the Provincial jail now—a man named Herbert Victor Baker. He was a clerk in a hotel, but, as regards his mind, he soared, like Claude Melnotte, "above the level of his mean estate." He was, and still is, a logician. Applying his logic to his matrimonial inclinations he argued: The affinity of a woman to her deceased husband's brother is the same as that of a man to his deceased wife's sister. By law the latter is no impediment to matrimony, therefore the former can be none, according to the received maxim that favorable things are to be broadened out to their utmost limits. He therefore had no hesitation in seeking a license to marry his brother's widow, and in asserting that there was no obstacle to their union.

Alas for Mr. Baker. Aristotle himself could not have picked a flaw in his logic; but he reckoned without his Henry VIII. That England is free from "the enormous tyranny of the Bishop of Rome," that it is a Protestant land, that its king is always a Protestant, if not by choice, at least by compulsion, that it is burdened with neither priesthood nor sacrifice other than those of what its chief pastor elegantly termed "an interloping Italian mission," are all due to the tender conscience of Henry VIII regarding his marriage with his deceased brother's widow. He had received all needful dispensations. But when the Gospel light shone forth from Anne Boleyn's eyes he saw that the impediment of affinity in that case was of divine law, and therefore incapable of dispensation.

Parliament has made it lawful for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister, and if the ghost of Henry VIII is not powerless to bless, it must, for a reason every historian knows, have blessed it in its deed. But the foundation of Protestant England is not to be tampered with; and so this is the law of the British Empire, sublime in its contempt of logic: A man may marry his deceased wife's sister, but a woman may not marry her deceased husband's brother. Its consequence for Mr. Baker is that he may have to go to prison.

To give workingmen the comfort demanded for them by Leo XIII in his encyclical on the conditions of labor, the Organization of Labor in Paris established a day bakery at 3 rue Las-Cases, where night-work does not exist, the bread-making beginning at five in the morning. An additional baking on Saturday does away with any need for Sunday work. The greatest attention is paid to the demands of hygiene. The undertaking, which was of the nature of an experiment, has proved completely successful.

ECONOMICS

The editor of an illustrated magazine with a guaranteed monthly circulation of 600,000 copies comments thus on the tariff issue in his number for March, 1911:

"The Editor, who was raised upon a farm, graduated at an agricultural college, and owns and operates two farms, while he loves farm life, has a decided opinion that the farmer does not have a 'square deal.' For instance, the tariff upon the goods the farmer buys averages 45 per cent., and the prices are inflated to their limit by combinations, while there is but 25 per cent. tariff upon the farmer's products, and even this is unavailable because of the farmer's lack of a general combination. The same implements the farmer uses upon his farm here can be purchased much cheaper in foreign countries by our farmers' competitors, and in many instances the manufacturers make special efforts to introduce their labor-saving machines among foreign farmers, thus resulting in a reduction of the prices of our farm products, while at the same time charging our farmers excessive prices for their implements. Many other things might be referred to, but these are food for thought. The Editor's sympathy is with the farmer, for he knows how industriously the whole family has to toil, and practice economy in order to pay off the mortgage. A farmer may feel that he is more than ordinarily successful if he is able to give his children a moderate education and lift the farm mortgage before old age overtakes him. Of course those who inherit the farm, or have it free of debt, can enjoy life; but to buy a farm and undertake to pay for it by the products is a hazardous undertaking, and unless such farmer well understands his business and knows how to economize, the best of his life will be gone before he can call the farm his own."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The following complimentary notice of the weekly newspaper, the Appeal to Reason, is from the editorial page of the Springfield Republican, of April 8. It is so seldom that any notice whatever is taken of the Kansas exponent of militant Socialism that the editor will make haste to lay the flattering unction to his soul:—

"The Survey this week follows its mission as a journal of constructive philanthropy by printing an article by W. J. Ghent on that remarkable scream of a Socialist weekly newspaper, the Appeal to Reason, published in the small city of Girard, Kan. Mr. Ghent is the head of the Rand school of social science in New York, a convinced Socialist of the "highbrow" variety, and more or less of a sympathetic critic of the Appeal's militant style of propagandist journalism. It is an informing article. The Appeal to Reason appeals less to pure reason than anything else under the sun, probably, but Mr. Ghent shows the cool and well-calculated method of its fury against the existing order. The paper has the astonishing circulation of half a million a week, and it goes into every State of the Union. If Thomas Paine were now alive and in the prime of his powers, and if he were a militant Socialist, he would produce a weekly newspaper very like this one. But the present editor, Mr. Wayland, is really a combination, in the field of socialist journalism, of Thomas Paine and W. R. Hearst."

SCIENCE

The present wireless communication from ship to shore is seriously hampered by distance. The messages have to be relayed from ship to ship and are finally delivered at their destination. This is mainly due to the antennae, which are not sufficiently aloft to distribute the aerial waves. The modern ocean leviathans will be freed from this inconvenience, as they will be equipped with such masts and powerful instruments as will put them in touch with the land from mid-ocean.

* * *

The geological survey of Montana reports that it has discovered phosphate rock beds in the above named district, which are apparently the largest deposits of their kind in the country. Covering an average of many square miles, they run as deep as from four to six feet. The land was being prospected with a view of granting a part to the Northern Pacific Boulevard Co., but President Taft has sent a message to Congress advising the withdrawal of the tract and the passage of a law leasing it for the government.

* * *

The clinkering of coal, says L. S. Marks, in Engineering News, is directly attributable to the presence of calcium, iron and sulphur in the coal. He indicates that there is but one real remedy against this inconvenience, and that is low temperature combustion. If the temperature is necessarily high, then the trouble can be greatly reduced by the use of steam or by the addition of kaolin or pure quartz to the fuel, but both of these methods are far too costly to be commercially justifiable.

* * *

The new test by electricity of the purity of boiled feed-water has demonstrated itself fully reliable. The test is based on the fact that pure water is a poor conductor, but when rendered saline its conductivity increases in direct proportion to the amount of salt added. By passing a current through a tube filled with feed-water and reading off the ohmic resistance, the conductivity is ascertained in terms of the salt present and the impurity of water rated.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

Mother Theodrine, former Provincial of the Daughters of the Cross in India, died recently at the mother house, in Liège, Belgium, in her 80th year. She went to India in 1868, holding the office of Superior there from 1875 to 1898 when, owing to ill-health, she returned to Europe. Great love for the poor, which showed itself particularly in the care she took of orphan children in India, was the distinguishing characteristic of a life of singular devotedness. A few weeks before her death she celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of her religious life.

The Hon. Louis Joseph Forget, member of the Canadian Senate and one of Canada's leading business men, died at Nice, in France, on April 7th. Senator Forget was vice-president of the Dominion Steel Corporation, and was one of the few French-Canadian millionaires. He was a son of the youngest of fifteen children, and was born at Terrebonne, Quebec, March 11, 1853. For many years he was at the head of the well-known firm of Forget & Co., bankers. He was also deeply interested in the cause of charity, education and religion, was a governor of the Notre Dame Hospital, the Western Hospital and vice-president of the Board of Governors of Laval University.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 2

(Price 10 Cents)

APRIL 22, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 106

CHRONICLE

President Warns Mexico—Treaty with Japan Denied—Indian Agency Scandal—Curtis Guild, Jr., Ambassador—Chaplain Dallam Pardoned—Death of Tom L. Johnson—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Spain—Italy—France—Belgium—Germany—Austria-Hungary . . . 25-28

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Squabbles of Spanish Catholics—A Challenge to German Critics—The Apostleship of the Press—Some Social Problems . . . 29-34

IN MISSION FIELDS

France and the Eastern Missions . . . 34-35

CORRESPONDENCE

United Italy's Limping Celebration—The Catholic University of Austria—The International Independent Telegraph Agency . . . 35-37

EDITORIAL

Let Us Hate Nobody—Fooling the People—Secretary MacVeagh on Pensions—The Sunday

Comic Supplement—Editing Under Difficulties—The Reichstag and the Vatican . . . 38-41

LITERATURE

The Profit and Loss of Greek—Christian Art in China—Father Tim—The Idea of Development—"Bulletins" of the Observatory of the Ebro, Spain—The Legends of the Jews—Non-Catholic Denominations—Loi d'Exil—Books Received . . . 41-45

EDUCATION

Representative Hebrews in Favor of Religious Training in Schools—Presbyterian Pastor Condemns Carnegie Foundation—The School Question in Australia—New York University and Group System of Study Courses . . . 45

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Babylon and Christianity . . . 46

SCIENCE

Photographing Stars Near the Moon—The Simultaneity of Magnetic Storms—Official Time in France—Double Stars—New Fashioned Burglar Alarm—Decrease in Price of Radium . . . 46-47

PERSONAL

Hon. Anthony M. Coll—Bequests by Miss Ellen Haggerty . . . 47

SOCIOLOGY

Cold Water and Fresh Air Cures for Tuberculosis . . . 47

ECONOMICS

Cheap Labor in the West—English Spinners to Grow Cotton in Mississippi—New Railroads in Alaska . . . 47

ECCELSIASTICAL ITEMS

Bibles for the Annapolis Cadets—The Franciscans Return to San Antonio—Polyglot Congregations in Toronto—The Sixty-Ninth at Vespers—Archbishop Stagni Popular . . . 47-48

OBITUARY

Rev. James Doonan, S.J.—Rev. P. J. McGinney, S.J.—Rev. John Rodock, S.J.—Rev. John Price . . . 48

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Official Facts About the Y. M. C. A. . . . 48

CHRONICLE

President Warns Mexico.—President Taft sent a warning to the Mexican government, and also to the insurgents, that they must not endanger the lives of citizens of the United States on American soil by fighting near the border. This step was taken in consequence of the killing of two Americans and the wounding of eleven others in the town of Douglas, Ariz., the result of an engagement on the Mexican side of the border. It is realized that conditions are most trying to Americans on this side of the Rio Grande, but it is also believed that the insurgents would be glad of any development which would draw the United States into the situation, and it is the purpose of the President not to be made a party to the affair if it can possibly be avoided. The administration is urging the press to refrain from treating the subject in a sensational manner in order that the delicacy of his position may not be made more difficult.

The American Consul at Ensenada reported the landing of thirty men and a Maxim gun from the British man-of-war Shearwater to protect the town from insurgents. The insurgent attack was not made, however, and the men returned to the ship. Although the administration announced these facts, it declined to comment upon them.

Treaty With Japan Denied.—Sensational reports in the press alleging the discovery in the city of Mexico of a secret treaty with Japan, the knowledge of which on the part of the American government prompted the mobilization of the troops along the Mexican border, were set at rest by members of the committees of both houses of Congress, which have to do with foreign affairs. Democrats and Republicans alike promptly denied the rumors, feeling satisfied that the reasons given by the President for mobilizing the troops were the real ones and that Japan was not a factor in the Mexican equation. Developments in Mexico and the revelations of the extent to which the neutrality laws were being violated have clearly demonstrated the wisdom of the President in using the first opportunity to acquaint the members of these committees with the reasons for that step. It is true that President Taft has not denied the Japanese secret treaty, but the members of the foreign affairs committees have denied it for him and on his authority.

Indian Agency Scandal.—The Indian Rights' Association filed charges last December with the Indian Commissioner and requested an investigation into the affairs of the Pima Indian reservation in Arizona. It was alleged that Superintendent Alexander's administration had been marked by dishonesty, general neglect of the welfare of the Pima Indians, and failure to protect their rights. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Robert G. Valentine, acted very promptly and ordered a thorough investigation of the charges. The investigation ended in the suspension of Superintendent J. B. Alexander and six of his subordinates, and the transfer of one other. Besides the falsifying of vouchers and pay-rolls, the forging and misappropriation of checks, it was disclosed that Government checks were issued in the names of dummies and of persons who performed no labor, and used by the superintendent and some of his subordinates for their personal benefit, as though they had been bank notes. Henry M. Alexander, known as supervisor of ditches, a brother of the superintendent, to whom doubtless he owed his office, was likewise seriously implicated. This supervisor read the handwriting on the wall and sent in his resignation, but the Indian office promptly refused to accept it, and suspended him. Special Agent Charles L. Ellis has been sent to fill temporarily the place made vacant by the suspension of Superintendent Alexander and to bring order out of chaos.

Curtis Guild, Jr., Ambassador.—The nomination of former Governor Curtis Guild, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be American Ambassador at St. Petersburg was sent to the Senate on April 13 by President Taft and ratified by that body on the same day. The new ambassador was born in Boston in 1860 and was graduated from Harvard in 1881. He has been active in State and national politics, serving as Lieutenant Governor of Massachusetts from 1902 to 1905, Governor from 1906 to 1909, and received seventy-five votes for the nomination of Vice-President in the Republican National Convention in 1908. Quite recently he returned from Mexico, where he was special ambassador from the United States at the centennial celebration. He received an LL.D from Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., in 1906. At St. Petersburg he succeeds Ambassador Rockhill, who will be transferred to Constantinople.

Chaplain Dallam Pardoned.—The long-drawn-out case of Chaplain John E. Dallam, of the Twelfth Infantry, was decided by the President, and the chaplain remains in the army, though sentenced to dismissal by court-martial. Chaplain Dallam entered the army as a private at the beginning of the Spanish War, and later studied theology and as an Episcopalian clergyman received an appointment as chaplain. When he withdrew from the Episcopal Church he was undecided what Church to join, and for a year or more he was a parson without any ecclesiastical affiliation. His commanding officer insisted that he should choose a denomination, as it is mandatory that an army chaplain should be attached to some recognized Church body. His delay in making the choice led to a court-martial, and while under sentence of a six-months' suspension he was again court-martialed for insubordination and sentenced to dismissal. The President, however, commuted the sentence, prompted thereto by the Chaplain's record, which was exceptionally good, except for the unfortunate discussion over his religious belief.

Death of Tom L. Johnson.—Tom L. Johnson, twice Congressman from the Twenty-first Ohio District, four times Mayor of Cleveland, champion of three-cent street railway fares, and prominent advocate of the Single-Tax theories of the late Henry George, died in Cleveland, on April 10. Tom Johnson became a great power for industrial and economic reform largely by virtue of his success in business. He will be long remembered for his services in the reform of municipal government. As a step towards municipal ownership, for which he believed public opinion was not far enough advanced, he advocated a movement for three-cent car fares to the end of showing forth in a city like Cleveland the extent of monopoly exaction under private control. Unfortunately the rise in the prices of material and labor rendered the success of the experiment extremely doubtful. However, he left the mayoralty with the credit of having given perhaps the best administration up to that time known in this country for our larger cities. One of the noteworthy achievements of his Congressional career was the ruse by which he forced the printing of the entire text of Henry George's "Protection or Free Trade" in the Congressional Record. In 1903 he ran for governor and was defeated, but was re-elected mayor in 1905, meeting final defeat in 1910.

Mexico.—Governor Teodoro Dehesa of the State of Veracruz, who enjoys the reputation of being the best governor in Mexico, was summoned to the capital for consultation and advice. His arrival was the signal for a great popular demonstration of respect. It is hoped that he may be appointed to the portfolio of government which has been vacant since the resignation of Corral. The office is equivalent to that of federal superintendent of police in the extent and importance of its duties.—During the past five months the insurrection has cost the Mexican government ten million pesos, taking no account of the injury done to trade and manufactures. The administration has requested the authorization of Congress to draw on the reserve funds.

Canada.—Sheldon, the absconding stock-broker, has been committed for trial for fraud.—Some two weeks ago the Sechelt, a small coasting steamer, capsized during a gale in the Straits of Fuca on her way from Victoria to Sooke, and eighteen lives were lost. A similar vessel, the Iroquois, plying among the Canadian islands of the San Juan Archipelago, has been lost in the same way, with fourteen lives, in the narrow waters between Vancouver Island and Sidney Island. Deck cargo that broke adrift seems to have been the cause in both cases. The Government is making an investigation, which will result in strict regulations concerning cargo carried on deck.—The very unpleasant weather of April is most agreeable to western farmers, who suffered last year from an untimely spring, followed by drought and late frosts. It is said that the crop prospects for this year are excellent.—The Conservatives continue to appeal to the Prime Minister to test the sentiment of the country on Reciprocity by opening a typical Liberal constituency to an election by means of the resignation of its representative, and undertake to open a similar Conservative constituency in the same way. Sir Wilfrid Laurier declines to do so.

Great Britain.—The recount at Exeter resulted in the unseating of the Liberal member and the transferring of the seat to the Unionists by a majority of one. There were some demonstrations against the judges when their decision was announced.—The Indian Government is sending a force of a thousand men to the Persian Gulf coast to cooperate with the cruisers against gun-running to the Afghan border.—Stenie Morrison, sentenced to death for murder of Beron on Clapham Common, has had his sentence commuted to penal servitude for life. There seems to be some dissatisfaction regarding the testimony of the police.—Hitherto the aristocratic spirit has despised the bourgeois notion that the birching of boys in the great schools dishonors them. Eton, therefore, has maintained the birch up to the present. It is now announced that in future it will be used on the lower boys only.—The Bishop of Lincoln began his tenure of office by an attack on the morals of the county, with very slender grounds for it. The chairman of the Lindsey Quarter Sessions, after reminding the grand jury that he has spent more years in administering justice in the county than the bishop has passed weeks in it, contradicted his assertion flatly.—The Times and other papers are working very hard to make the attitude of Prussian ministers regarding the Modernist oath appear threatening towards the Holy See.—“The Shepherd of Dartmoor,” whom Messrs. Churchill and Lloyd George used effectively as an example of how there is one law for the rich and another for the poor; whom Mr. Churchill discharged from prison on condition that he should remain for six months in the situation procured for him; who disappeared after two days, and whom the police have, Mr. Churchill says, been looking for ever since, has turned up at last, arrested for the theft of whiskey.—The peers continue to throw their estates on the market, thus destroying their only real title to share in legislation.—The King has ordered the strict enforcing of Queen Victoria's regulations, which excluded divorced persons from court. King Edward had relaxed them.—William Gordon Hake, “Father of the British Bar,” completed his hundredth year on April 5. He defended the last sheep-stealer tried under the law that made the crime a capital offence. General Gordon of Khartoum was his cousin, and his wife was a cousin of Florence Nightingale.

Ireland.—The committee appointed by the Government “to ascertain and consider, among other things, the existing financial relations between Ireland and the other component parts of the United Kingdom and to distinguish as far as possible between Irish local expenditure and imperial expenditure in Ireland,” consists of seven members, selected seemingly as experts in finance rather than on political grounds. Sir Henry Primrose, the chairman, a cousin of Lord Rosebery, has been president of the Board of Customs and Inland Revenue. He is not deemed friendly to Ireland, but is balanced by Mr. H. W. Gladstone, son and private secretary of the Home Rule Premier. Mr. Adams was recently head of the statistical department of the Irish Agricultural Board and proved exceptionally efficient. Messrs. Jackson and Plender are English bankers of repute. The only Irish representatives are Bishop Kelly, of Ross, and Lord Pirrie. Bishop Kelly is eminently qualified by judgment and character and by his experience on the Agricultural Board and on several Royal Commissions of inquiry into Irish economic and social conditions. Lord Pirrie has risen from the ranks to the control of the great Belfast shipping industries, and is a pronounced Home Ruler. The members are regarded as individually satisfactory, but not as fulfilling Mr. Asquith's promise that “the different sections of Irish opinions would be represented.”—Mr. Redmond wrote to President Taft in March asking him to use his influence “in securing the passage of a special Act recognizing the Irish National trade-mark so as to enable the Irish Industrial Association (which controls its use in Ireland) to obtain registration in the United States.” Mr. Taft considered the proposition equitable and referred the matter to the Secretary of the Interior. Later he wrote to Mr. Redmond: “I am doubtful whether this (a law providing for national trade-marks) is likely to be considered at the extra session, but I shall certainly bring it to the attention of Congress at the regular session in December.”—By 42 votes to 9 the Dublin Corporation passed an amendment to the proposed Address to the King: “That as Ireland is still deprived of her Parliament this Council proceed to the next business.”—The London Observer, which at the late elections raised the anti-Home Rule cry of “American dollars,” is now owned by them, having passed into the hands of Mr. W. W. Astor, M. P.

Spain.—One of the projects of Canalejas is obligatory military service for all Spaniards. If it becomes a law, it means that seminarians and young friars will be called from their studies to the barracks, when the country is in no danger and has no need of their services in any military capacity, even as an ambulance corps. Conservative papers remark that what Spain needs is not more soldiers but better drilled and better equipped soldiers. Of the forty thousand sent to Morocco, many were raw recruits who did not know how to handle their guns and were ignorant of the meaning of the military terms used by the drill-masters and officers. Four thousand properly trained troops would have been more efficient.—Don Jaime, the Carlist pretender, attended a banquet of his party leaders in Valencia and returned undetected to Barcelona. His visit was followed by the establishment of a daily paper in the interests of his party.—In the recent elections in Bilbao, the Catholics polled a far heavier vote than the Republican-Socialists; but the Catholic vote was scattered among three sets of candidates, the result being that all were defeated.—Two letters of Lerroux, the Barcelona agitator, have mysteriously disappeared from the record of the Ferrer case. All the documents were to have been published at the public expense. The newly formed cabinet has little prospect of lasting long. Renewed hostilities and French military activity in Morocco seem to indicate that a fresh outbreak is imminent among the hill tribes.

Italy.—On April 10 an earthquake shook Rome and the surrounding villages and towns.—The question that has been mooted for twenty years of making Rome a seaport seems now about to take shape. It is proposed to dig a ship canal between Rome and Palidoro on the coast. A society of French capitalists, on April 1, deposited 2,000,000 francs in the Provincial Bank as a guarantee that they will construct the canal within a specified time. It is also proposed to lay out a grand highway from Rome to Ostia, with tram and train service. This road was to have been one of the attractions of the Jubilee, but it has failed of realization.—The Camorra trial still continues to amaze and horrify, and promises to continue indefinitely. The mass of evidence is enormous and can never be sifted.—The Jubilee celebration at Rome, beyond an occasional paragraph, continues to pass unnoticed in the press of the world.

France.—On April 12, 13,000 soldiers had assembled at Epernay to proceed against the riotous wine growers. In the town of Ay storehouses of champagne were wrecked, the wine spilled in the streets, and houses were set on fire. In other places barricades were thrown up to oppose the advance of the troops. It will be remembered that the outbreak occurred in the Department of Aube, which protested at being counted out of the champagne district. When that delimitation was changed and Aube restored to its previous position then trouble began among the wine-growers of the Department of Marne, which believed that its interests would suffer by the restoration of Aube. On April 14 quiet seemed to have been restored, but the next day the disorder was as bad as ever. It is a singular Easter for France.

Belgium.—The Liberals propose to filibuster so as to prevent the passage of the Schollaert School Bill. Although handicapped by previous legislation the Catholics during their tenure of power had increased the attendance at school to more than twice what it was under the Liberal régime. Thus in 1884, when the Liberals lost control of the Government, there were in the primary and higher grades 7,747 schools, 13,955 classes, 612,181 pupils. At present there are 15,128 schools, 33,428 classes, and 1,437,597 pupils. Schollaert's Bill will extend the limits of primary education still further and will enable the Catholics, who are the bulk of the population, to come into their own, from which they have been debarred by their extraordinary tolerance of iniquitous conditions.

Germany.—Following a two days' visit in Vienna, during which every effort was made by Emperor and people to show them most hospitable welcome, Crown Prince William and Crown Princess Cecilia ended their long trip and were royally received by their own people in Potsdam. Quite an extraordinary feature of the enthusiasm attending their home-coming was the appearance of the two dirigibles, the new military balloon "M 4" and the Siemens-Schuckert balloon. When the princely pair arrived at the gates of the marble palace, these two, gaily decked with flags and bunting, circled the palace grounds showering down flowers upon the welcoming thousands, who wildly cheered their appreciation of the novel feature.—This year again the Prussian Landtag failed to pass the budget by April 1, as should be done. Because of the recurrence of this defect representations have been made seeking to influence the Government to an earlier call of the chambers hereafter. Besides the late opening of the session, the principal reason of the delay has been the intolerable flood of talk from the Social-Democrats. The insistence with which they broke into the debates might be excused did they try to lend any practical service in the discussions. A feature of the third reading of the budget bill was the bitter complaint urged by the Conservatives against the Government. The ministers, so the Conservatives affirmed, had failed in their duty in not sufficiently safeguarding Prussian interests when they permitted the amendment granting Alsace-Lorraine three votes in the Bundesrath to pass in the meetings of the Commission charged with the preparation of the Constitution for the Reichslande. The objection is readily understood when the fact is recalled that it is in Prussia the Conservative party enjoys its greatest strength. The Chancellor made a fitting reply to the objection, and a representative of the Centre reminded the Landtag that it were well not to interfere in matters strictly within the jurisdiction of the Reichstag.

Austria-Hungary.—Recent despatches indicate that the vexed questions involved in the projected reform of the laws relating to military service in the dual monarchy are being satisfactorily solved. The special committee representing Austria and Hungary, which has been sitting in Vienna since the beginning of April, announces that an agreement has been reached in the language question and in the matter of military criminal procedure. German will in future be as a rule the official language, though certain exceptions are allowed in favor of the Hungarian regiments. Following these announcements the Emperor received in special audience Baron von Bienerth, the Austrian Premier, and Count Khuen-Hedervary, the Hungarian Premier, and both statesmen assured his Majesty that full agreement in the further details of the military service legislation would be reached

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Squabbles of Spanish Catholics

The readers of AMERICA who have perused our former articles may have asked themselves in bewilderment how it is possible that in a nation like Spain, where the Catholic Faith has been so deeply rooted for centuries, and where the vast majority of the people profess it, there can be tolerated and there are tolerated ministries that directly attack their Faith and wound their deepest religious sentiments. The answer is obvious. The Catholics of Spain live in a state of deep and permanent division, and the anti-clerical cabinets profit by this division to combat the Church and to wage war against it. In vain have the Pope and the Bishops repeatedly raised their voices to urge the different Catholic parties to make common cause and to present an unbroken front to the fierce attacks of anti-clericalism and revolution; in vain have they at critical junctures asked them to lay aside for a moment their political differences and party preferences and unite against the common enemy. Their advice and their recommendations have not been heeded; their voices have been lost in a vacuum. Like those Byzantines who, while the Mohammedan army was at their very gates, discussed among themselves whether the light on Tabor was created or increate, Spanish Catholics seem to find no better occupation than to attempt to define with mathematical precision the imperceptible lines which mark where Liberalism begins and ends. They have already spent several years in these very subtle disquisitions, and the likelihood is that they will keep on till the end of time.

Let us put the question bluntly: Is it possible to be a Catholic and belong to the Conservative party now headed by Maura? The Alfonsists and the Conservatives answer affirmatively; the Carlists and the Integrists thunder "No!" There we have the kernel of the nut. Is it not a strange situation? Maura, hurled from power by the forces of Freemasonry and revolution, made the target of the wrath of the anti-clericals and the Republicans because he was a "clerical" and a "reactionary" (that is, he was the representative of order and social tranquillity, the enemy of jacobinism and the supporter of the rights and interests of the Church), is considered by the Carlists and the Integrists as incompatible with Catholicism and deserving their weightiest censures and anathemas.

These hopelessly contradictory opinions of Maura are met with not only in the bosom of religious orders, but also among the diocesan clergy. While, on the one hand, very distinguished priests and religious of great authority are of the opinion that in the present circumstances it is prudent, reasonable and sensible to second and sustain Maura, not because his program is ideal in matters religious, but because in the present conditions it is the nearest possible approach to the Catholic ideal, other religious and other priests, perhaps more numerous than his supporters, are of a contradictory view, and see in the chief of the Conservative party the personification of a political theory a thousand times worse than jacobinism. We think it is not rash to affirm that the hierarchy, generally speaking, are in favor of supporting Maura, and that if it were in their power they would not hesitate to recognize the advantage of uniting all the Catholic elements into a "block" in his favor, to offset the block made up of Democrats, Radicals, Republicans, Socialists and Liberals. But this is impossible.

As I write these lines, the echo of the strife among our fellow Catholics reaches my ears. As the election of provincial deputies was approaching, the Carlists, the Integrists and the independent Catholics hastened to form a "Catholic-Antiliberal Coalition," which was to work at the election against the Republicans, Liberals and the Conservatives. The other Catholics—that is, the dynastic Catholics—basing their position on the message recently addressed to all Spanish Catholics by the Cardinal Primate of Spain in the name of His Holiness, declined to join the coalition, and they protested that it was not permissible to apply the nickname of "Liberals" to Catholics belonging to the Conservative party; they added, moreover, that when there was no probability of success, Catholics distinctively as Catholics ought not to propose candidates, but that in such a case they ought, for the occasion, to support the least undesirable candidate, and thus prevent the election of a greater enemy of religion.

Three or four days ago, the matter was brought before the Right Reverend Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá, who, after examining it, withheld his approval from the coalition; for, as there was no hope of electing the coalition candidates, to vote for them would be to scatter the Catholic vote and facilitate the election of Republicans and Radicals. The coalition was thereupon dissolved. We are not to suppose, however, that its former members will come out on election day and support the Conservative candidates. "Oh, no! They will not vote at all, or they will cast blank ballots, or they will vote for anybody that is not a Maurist. The reason of this is that these militant Catholics, Carlists and Integrists, starting from the pessimistic principle that the present political condition is incurable, and that every attempt to cleanse the Conservative party is foredoomed to failure, are awaiting a grand re-birth of strong Catholic feeling as the result of a social commotion and upheaval; for they have persuaded themselves that, from the very magnitude of the evil, things must take a better turn.

With the condition of affairs thus plainly set before them, our readers will have no difficulty in understanding why it is that, notwithstanding their social standing and numbers, the influence of Spanish Catholics upon the social and political life of the nation is either very slight or simply null, and that, step by step, we are nearing a religious situation like that of France, with its secularizing, laicizing and atheistic laws. Quite otherwise would be the case if, taking things as they are to-day for to-day, all Catholics should persuade themselves that just now the only guarantee of social order and peace is the monarchy, as it is the only bulwark of liberty, of religion and of the Church; and that in this persuasion they should loyally and patriotically lend their aid to Maura, from whom much more could be expected if he were to see himself thus ably seconded. Unquestionably, his political program would improve from a religious standpoint, and he would blot out of it certain suggestions of liberalism which now tarnish its lustre.

NORBERTO TORCAL,

Editor of El Noticiero, Saragossa, Spain.

A Challenge to German Critics

No one who has studied the official utterances of Pope Pius X during the years of his pontificate will need to be reminded of the reasons which have impelled his action. Conditions marking the so-called intellectual progress of our time have constrained the Holy Father so to use the fullness of the authority delegated to him by God as to make certain that the truth revealed by Christ shall not be vitiated or impaired, that it shall not be despoiled of the godlike character which it possesses. His Holiness has been especially insistent that those who are called to instruct others should be free from suspicion. There must be no mistrust of the "pure and undefiled" quality of the doctrine which they impart. Unhappily, it is to these that Modernism, the heresy of our day, especially appeals; its peculiar attractiveness arising from the pretence of scientific character and scholarly method under which it masks its errors. It was to meet this danger that the Encyclical Pascendi took on the form it did, accurately analyzing the system of the new heresy, scientifically exposing and refuting its principles, and pointing out with unmistakable clearness the dangers it contained for Catholic faith.

To be sure, those who willingly blind themselves to the truth cannot be saved from error, even though absolutely convincing arguments be urged upon them. But the Holy Father determined that if any such be found among us, they should, at least, be forced openly to declare themselves and so cease to be a hidden snare for the children of the Church. To this end the fundamental definitions occurring in the Encyclical Pascendi, as well as in the Syllabus of Pius IX, were summarily condensed into the form of a declaration or oath, and to this it was required that all those who, because of their position or charge in the Catholic Church, exert an influence upon the faith of the people should subscribe.

Such a precept is not at all an extraordinary one; nor can the requirement of such an oath be in any way taken to imply a lack of confidence on the part of superiors in those from whom it is demanded. Does any reasonable man take exception to the oath of loyal service imposed upon civil officials? For years it has been customary within the Church to require from certain churchmen a profession of faith, confirmed by oath, covering the Tridentine decrees and the Vatican decrees, and no one has thought to discover in it any evidence of a restraint of personal freedom, or of an enslaving of science, or of an injustice to the proper supremacy of the State.

Quite as little reason of legitimate complaint is contained in the so-called anti-Modernist oath. Its formula comprises nothing that a professing Catholic has not already accepted as true. Most of its declarations will be freely admitted by every believing Christian. The Pope, in prescribing the oath had no intent to define anything new; his sole purpose was to provide a solemn guarantee that the deposit of Catholic verity in all its fullness should be proclaimed by the authorized teachers of the Church without weakening and without change.

This matter of fact view has found little antagonism worthy of notice in the world outside of Germany. There, strange to say, anti-Catholic sentiment has proved strong enough to arouse bitter agitation against what it terms the "intolerance of the Pope." Pressure was brought to bear with certain members of the Reichstag, until it became almost a party question among them to urge the Government to use suitable measures to safeguard the independence of German ecclesiastics, and in particular of the professors of theology in the Catholic faculties of State universities. The Vatican, it was affirmed, was using the vast moral pressure it could put upon them to force them to accept the anti-Modernist oath in violation of their personal liberty and freedom of action. To be sure, no doubt with proper intent to avoid greater evils which a needless clash with State authorities might superinduce, the Pope had formally dispensed professors of theology in the faculties of State universities from taking the oath when these professors had no direct charge in the care of souls; to be sure, too, other absurd charges and insinuations injected into the controversy were splendidly combated in the Prussian chamber. Even non-Catholic leaders refused to stand for the bigotry of the enemies of the Church, protesting that the oath was a proper means used by the Church to defend her ancient dogma against what she deemed to be vicious assaults from heresy. And a foreign journal, noted for its liberal inclinations, the Etoile belge, complimented them on their action. Commenting on the Reichstag debate, it said: "There is no more evidence of an intolerant spirit in the oath than there is in the obligation regarding his teaching imposed by the Protestant synod on every Protestant pastor, and no greater restraint of liberty of conscience." A very just contention. One is a Catholic, or one is not; one is a Protestant or one is not. And just as Catholicism is unthinkable save where full deference is paid to the teaching authority of the head of the Church, so Protestantism must cease to be Christian if there be granted to every Protestant pastor the right to reject as he pleases doctrines which in the very nature of things must be conceded to be fundamental principles of the Christian religion. To profess oneself a Modernist, however, is to acknowledge that one has broken with fixed doctrine, be it Catholic or Protestant.

In view of this very elementary truth it is difficult to comprehend the reason of the tempest of anti-Catholic opposition which is agitating the evangelical group in the Reichstag. It is equally difficult to appreciate Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg's apparent purpose to interfere in a matter that is no affair of his, even though the professors in the subsidized theological faculties of State universities were obliged to take the oath in question. These professors are not asked to do so, but in case they were, if a professor in any one of these faculties is not in full accord with the doctrinal teachings of the Church concerning the supreme authority of the Pope, by the very fact he ceases to be a Catholic. Why, then, this heat of contention that rages in their regard?

It will not do to make clamorous outcry that the anti-Modernist oath is a new instance of the consistent purpose of the ancient Church to restrain the freedom of the individual intelligence and to repress and enslave scientific research. Similar defamatory charges regarding the Catholic Church have been too often refuted to have them merit serious attention. Yet the Neues Jahrhundert, a publication which claims to be the organ of the Modernists, these up-to-date defenders of unlimited freedom in the scientific field, is petty enough to revive the old fiction. The Bonifatius Korrespondenz, the official review of the Austrian Bonifatius Verein, meets the calumny in a manner that should satisfy even the progressive intelligence of the Neues Jahrhundert. "The editors of this review," says the Korrespondenz, "have a great deal to say concerning the scientific and scholarly methods characteristic of present day knowledge. Surely they will not deny that a fundamental requisite in such methods is a convincing and irrefutable proof of statements advanced by those who pursue them. We, therefore, call upon the editors to furnish us such proof of six categorical statements contained in No. 3 of the Neues Jahrhundert for the current year. These statements are:

"1. That there are honest, simple-hearted priests who satisfy their conscience in the sight of God, and take the anti-Modernist oath demanded of them with the prayer upon their lips: Lord, forgive us the sin that is forced upon us.

"2. That the anti-Modernist oath puts an official Church anathema upon all freedom of theological research.

"3. That there are Bishops who permit 'distressed ecclesiastics, worried in conscience, to make the oath with all kinds of mental restrictions.' We ask for an explicit naming of these Bishops and of these distressed ecclesiastics.

"4. That the Bishops of Germany have acted with 'cruelly comical inconsistency,' striving, as they did, to obtain from Rome a dispensation in the matter of the oath in favor of professors, whilst they permitted its full burden to rest upon 'poor men engaged in the care of souls, who are affected, after all, only indirectly by what the oath implies.' And we demand here proof from the Neues Jahrhundert that professors, in general, are dispensed from the oath; that the oath affects pastors of souls only indirectly and secondarily; that in excepting professors attached to State universities (since these alone, and these only when not in any way engaged in the care of souls are dispensed), a cruelly comical inconsistency is to be noted.

"5. That in consequence of this oath the 'more intelligent' among the Catholic clergy have been reduced to a condition of extreme need. We presume the charge means that the 'more intelligent' clerics have refused to accept the obligation and have thus put themselves out of way of receiving charges in the care of souls.

"6. That Prince Max, in his recently retracted article, gives an example of one 'forced to do penance though he had written only what is historically true.'"

The Korrespondenz is still awaiting an answer to its challenge, a condition of affairs only too common in our day. It is easy, indeed, to formulate lying charges regarding the Catholic Church; it is not quite so easy a task to prove such charges when the makers of them are brought to book and asked to show cause in the calumnies maliciously spread among the people.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

The Apostleship of the Press

The young Catholic who wishes to be a writer is, just now, the object of much solicitude. It is announced—a late discovery—that when a young Catholic undertakes to make money and to become a celebrity by the use of his pen, he does not find in the Catholic press an open road to gold and glory. The press, as distinctively Catholic, is committed to the expression of the Faith. It cannot be used as an avenue to wealth and worldly renown.

Now, all this is hardly a discovery of the new century. It sounds like very ancient historic truth. We do not know that in the entire library of the writings of the Fathers of the Church there is a single line that was written by a millionaire. Neither is it on record that any one of the writers cared about being a millionaire.

The young Catholic, therefore, who wishes to become a distinguished writer with an income, is told to go out of the Catholic atmosphere, to work as an "indifferentist," a "nothing," to be a Catholic incog. To this advice is added the quieting forecast that, when he shall have become a celebrity according to the standard of the world of unbelief, he will be able to teach that world with recognized authority.

Now, there is a distinction to be made here. He may, indeed, become a celebrity. This may, perhaps, be a possibility, dependent, of course, on very uncertain and infrequent conditions. But that, having arrived at the goal, he shall be able to speak with authority as the champion of orthodoxy, is, at the best, a very remote probability. By that time, his life-training will have established in him even a physical impediment. The law of habit is not suspended for him in this particular matter. The rule is and was and shall be that he who schooled himself to the mind and speech of indifferentism until he has become a celebrity of the world, must be lacking in that which can come only from specific training for the other work. And there is also a necessary moral element, namely, of character, which is not apt to be cultivated by continuous quest for the colorless in thought and expression.

So that, even though, upon the dawn of that doubtful day of his future renown, he may wish to lead to higher things, he will find something more to do than merely to drop his mask and be apostle to crowds still as docile as they were when he gave them the amusement they were willing to pay for. We have in mind a certain Dives who wanted to come back from where he was buried to give a warning, out of his experience, to his brethren. And it was said to him: "They have Moses and the prophets. If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe if one rise again from the dead."

It is a common saying that we are living in a commercial age. The fundamental axiom of commerce is "give nothing for nothing." We have ceased to notice incongruities in the application. The charity dollar is begged for an equivalent. Not seldom it goes to the poor through the lawn-fête or the church carnival—that is, what is left of it. Or it is given for a chance to win the hundred-fold, a gold watch or a diamond ring. However, these incongruities aside, commercialism can very naturally assert itself in mere letters. One may deal in literature just as one deals in corn and cattle. The sentiment of the publisher, when he surveys the new edition, need not differ from the sentiment of the farmer when he looks out over herds and harvest. Both look beyond—to the market. Net income can be the dominant in the mind and heart as well of the one as of the other.

Of course, there is money in the press. If there were no money to be made from printing, there would not be so many publishers, so many writers. And there are also failures with the pen and with the press, for the same reason that there are mortgaged farms and assignments and bankrupt sales and abandoned shops. It has been estimated that more than ninety per centum of the commercial enterprises begun end in failure. The failure of the writer, then, is not to be wondered at, considering that there are proportionately so many more who think themselves great writers than there are those who think themselves even very ordinary farmers, blacksmiths, lawyers or merchants. If a man takes up writing as a commmercial enterprise, he should abide by the laws of commerce. Disappointment which is based upon misapprehension should not be made the ground for a grievance against the press. But particularly, disappointment which is based upon a double misapprehension should not prompt one to lay a grievance at the door of the Catholic press.

The press is the most adaptable instrument in modern society. It may be used to make money, or to occupy one's leisure, or to feed one's vanity, or to gain entrance into the circle of the literati; or it may be used simply as an instrument of the apostolate. If a man directs the instrument at the apostolate, he cannot expect it to play into his purse. It may provide for his needs; and anything more will be an accident. When it is directed to other ends, it ceases to that extent to be an instrument of the apostolate. Yes, and to a greater extent. When the apostle sets out with the idea of a respectable bank account or a niche in the mausoleum of fame, there is bound to be a conflict. There will be a divided attention, of which the better half will most probably be transferred from the giving to the getting.

The apostolic outfit was one coat and no purse. But with this the Apostles did precisely apostolic work. The favor they found with the world was to be put to death. They were warned by the Master that the world would hate them as it had hated Him before them. In the apostolate of the press one may expect all those things which are being deplored as the sad lot of the Catholic writer. The thing for an aspirant to decide is, whether he wishes to engage in the apostolate. To this end it were well for him to recognize, at the start, its aims and its conditions. To warn, to instruct, to encourage the faithful; to denounce error and proclaim the truth; to speak as the herald of the Vicar of Christ; to promote harmony amongst the members, and to foster the true spirit of Catholic life which is union with the head: this is the aim, the vocation. The conditions will be such as they have been.

W. F. POLAND, S.J.

Some Social Problems*

Rightly deeming false views on fundamental questions the most dangerous of human evils, and professing with Plato to be not more ready to refute them than be refuted, according as he or another should advance what is untrue, Mr. Lilly proceeds at full tilt to attack the political errors of the day with a "spear that knows no brother." Fortified by wide knowledge of men and books, a trained mind, sound Catholic instinct, and a radical honesty that often turns his weapons against his own political bias, he ranges the whole field of thought and action from London and Dublin to Calcutta and New York, assailing follies and fallacies wherever he sees them with a refreshing vehemence that is ruthless without being rancorous. Addressing himself "not to professed students, but intelligent and thoughtful men of the world," on Popular Government, Parental Right, Cheapness, the Social, Irish, Indian and Criminal Questions, he would "rescue essential principles from Utilitarianism and Eudaemonism," establish jurisprudence upon practical reason, and assert the true doctrine of the liberty of man as a moral agent in a moral organism, the State.

* Idola Fori: An Examination of Seven Questions of the Day. By William S. Lilly. London: Chapman & Hall. St. Louis: Herder. $2.25 net.

Believing, with Mr. Belloc, that Party Government has outlived its usefulness, he attributes its failure to the "one man, one vote" electoral system. This, he holds, is undemocratic, since it does not express the true "will of the people," which should be the expression of "all the elements in the country in due proportion," having regard to property, intelligence and character as well as numbers. To be consistent he should have added "all the time," i. e., the universal referendum and recall, but these devices are abhorrent to him. A strong second chamber would help, but how otherwise this due proportion is attainable he does not inform us; elsewhere he makes the omnipotence of wealth in the hands of a small minority largely responsible for the immoralities and miseries of the impoverished majority. The Belgian system of additional votes for heads of families, university graduates, clergymen, etc., should go far towards establishing due proportion, especially as coincident with it is the wide distribution of wealth, which he rightly deems the truest test of national prosperity; but this he does not mention, nor any other plan of electoral apportionment.

Herein consists Mr. Lilly's weakness. He is lynx-eyed and unerring in diagnosing the diseases of the day, but he is seldom sure of the remedy; and when he is, his prescription is not always convincing. He is severe on Lloyd George's property tax, but when, forgetting politics, he settles down to the question himself, he out-Georges the British Chancellor. Property should be rightly, not merely legally, acquired, and rightly used; and for this purpose he would have the State (1) Establish the interdependence of labor and capital by giving the worker a share in the profits; (2) Control monopolies, regulate prices and own all public utilities; (3) Apply indirect tax to luxuries and so graduate income tax and death duties that their burden fall on the wealthy; (4) Give the unearned increment, especially in land, to the community; (5) Penalize speculation in stocks and shares, etc., since this is public gambling and comes under the Fourth Lateran Council's definition of Usury: "The attempt to draw profit and income without labor, cost or risk, from the use of a thing which does not fructify."

Parental rights and, indeed, the rights of man in every relation, are admirably differentiated and defended. Rights are not, as Matthew Arnold held, created by the State, but inherent; and of such is the education of children. The State may control it, subject to parental rights, "but to force upon them, directly or indirectly, a religious teaching of which they disapprove is a gross invasion of those rights." The only cure for the usurpation by democratic governments of these and similar individual rights is the general diffusion among the people of the basic principles of rights and duties; yet though the Irish are, he admits, a thoroughly Catholic people, and therefore presumed to be possessed of this knowledge, Mr. Lilly fears that Briands, Vivianis, etc., would be the outcome of the establishment of Democracy in Ireland.

His treatment of the Irish Question is characteristic. The stubborn prejudices of a patriotic British Tory are pitted against a well-informed judgment, and it is a crowning proof of his honesty that judgment wins.

We must refer the reader to Mr. Lilly's discussion of this point, noting, however, that the fault he finds with England's policy in Ireland is the very opposite of what he deems worthy of condemnation in India. In Ireland she was too severe, in India not severe enough. In striving "to force English ideas down the throats of the natives" she has indoctrinated those who received her education with the materialism of Spencer, Huxley and Tyndall—their favorite authors—thus uprooting their inherited notions of morality and planting in their stead the seeds of Jacobinism and Anarchy. It is these Jacobins who, for their own selfish ends, would force on the hundred races of India a system which is alien to their thoughts and traditions. Mr. Lilly would suppress the native journals that clamor for self-government, and "mercilessly root out sedition," but parliament is weak and inadequate, the Indian viceroys are unfit or unsupported; and, again, the only remedy is religious education, which can be imparted effectively only by Catholic missionaries.

His knowledge of India was derived from books, but having studied Cheapness and Criminality in the shops, factories and prisons, his conclusions are as satisfying as his principles are sound. Cheapness of production, far from being a glory of the age, is one of its worst evils. The seamstress gets four shillings for making a dozen shirts that they may be sold cheap at half a crown apiece. The instance is typical of the sweating system; the result is immorality, degradation in the home, physical deterioration, loss of life and health, and inferiority of goods. Cheapness is the product of the "sweater," who is the offspring of the law of Supply and Demand, which is the doctrine of the Right of Might. Instead, he would substitute the Might of Right. The worker has a right to a fair wage, the means of living a human life. Skilled laborers may be able to secure it by combination, but for unskilled laborers "a national minimum wage" should be fixed by legislation.

This will be thought by some a socialistic remedy, but Mr. Lilly is not afraid of the word. It is the truth latent in Socialism which has made it formidable, and if we would prevent the realization of its pernicious doctrines we must destroy the evils on which it feeds, no matter how radical the method. Self-preservation as well as distributive justice demands that "the shame of mixed luxury and misery," which obtains in England and is taking root in America, be eradicated. And Justice—the constant will to give to each his right and due, be he employer, employee or criminal—not might, greed or sentimentality, is the only solvent of the multiplex evils of society.

Such in outline is Mr. Lilly's solution of some pressing public problems. His book should prove a stimulating and helpful guide to economists, legislators and social workers who are more eager to ameliorate conditions than to exploit theories and fads. All will find him interesting, for he is unconventional, direct, aggressive, and his occasional exaggerations are the evident outcome of sincerity of conviction and ardent sympathy with his kind. Indirectly and quite unconsciously he disposes of the widespread fallacy that Catholics are denied liberty of opinion. His mode of treatment makes it clear that none enjoys greater freedom of view and intellectual independence than the man who is well grounded in Catholic Philosophy. M. KENNY, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

FRANCE AND THE EASTERN MISSIONS.

One of the most treasured conquests of Catholic France was undoubtedly the protectorate which the government exercised over the Catholic missions in the Levant and the Orient. This protectorate goes back to the days of Charlemagne, who, in virtue of a convention with Harun-al-Raschid, Caliph of Bagdad, was proclaimed the possessor of the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre, and was empowered to restore all the churches of the Holy Land. Thus began at the dawn of the ninth century that general oversight which France, the eldest daughter of the Church, exercised over the faithful in the Holy Land, and the pilgrims who visited it. The protectorate was more effective during the Crusades; but even after the fall of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem, every Mussulman understood that the Christians in the Holy Land remained in some way under the care of France. This persuasion was intensified and strengthened when at the end of the thirteenth century King Louis IX, the Saint, established a consulate at Alexandria, Egypt, for the special work of caring for pilgrims. The recognition of the French protectorate in international law dates from Francis I, who, after his defeat and capture in the memorable battle of Pavia, entered into an alliance with the Sultan Suleyman the Magnificent of Constantinople. To offset the scandal which the alliance caused in all Christendom, Francis obtained from the Grand Turk in 1526 a commercial truce, in virtue of which the French trading posts and all pilgrims were declared neutral, thus permitting the resumption of commercial intercourse with the Orient after a long interruption.

Nine years after the signing of the commercial truce, it gave place to a "capitulation," which was signed by both parties to the truce. Article 80 of the capitulation granted to the French the free practice of their religion, and the guardianship of the holy places, which were to be entrusted to religious, and the untrammelled exercise of their functions, throughout the Ottoman empire, to all bishops dependent upon France and to all Catholic priests, whatsoever might be their nationality. It was also agreed that European merchants, whose governments might have no treaty of friendship with the Sublime Porte, could navigate Turkish waters under the French flag, and under the same protection could buy, sell and barter in all places subject to the Ottoman sway.

This capitulation was ratified on various occasions by the successors of Francis I and Suleyman until 1740, when a formal treaty secured to France the express right to protect all Latin Catholics and their establishments, regardless of the nationality of the persons concerned. The treaty further provided for the free exercises of their functions by all bishops dependent upon France and of all religious professing the Catholic faith, as well as for the safety of all French pilgrims and others dependent upon them in their journey to and from the Holy Land. This protectorate of France over the Latin Catholics in the Levant and elsewhere has received the sanction of the Holy See, the only exception recognized being the protectorate of Austria, where it exists. From the time of its discovery to the recent overthrow of the royal house, that part of the Far East which belongs or did belong to Portugal has been under the protection, so-called, of the Portuguese monarchs; but we are not considering that part of the world.

This right of protecting Catholic interests carries with it, by favor of the Holy See, certain honors which are shown to the representatives of France whenever they are present in any one of the "protected" churches. If a French consul is present at a religious service, the Te Deum is to be chanted by the officiating clergy; he is to have a seat of honor in the church, and is to be incensed at the solemn Mass. At the end of high Mass on Sundays, the versicle, Domine, salvum fac regem, was sung by the choir, after which the officiating priest chanted a prayer for the most Christian king and the members of the royal family. When the kingdom gave way to a republic, the versicle was changed to Domine, salvam fac rempublicam, and a prayer for the constituted authorities took the place of that for the king and his family. Considering the great spiritual needs of the present republic, we trust that the prayer is still chanted. These marks of respect were shown to the official representative of France and to none other.

The importance of this protectorate which gives France the lofty prerogative of defending Catholicism in the Orient and the Levant explains clearly the earnestness which French statesmen, up to very recent times, have shown in maintaining it. Even the Revolution which, towards the end of the eighteenth century, destroyed the French churches and hunted down the French priests and religious, did not entertain for a moment the thought of surrendering the protectorate. In 1794, when the reign of terror was at its worst, General Aubert-Dubayet, the ambassador of the Convention near the Sublime Porte, wrote to his home government (if such it could be called): "Hasten the coming of the missionaries and Sisters of Charity. They are worth more than an army, for they excite no fear of themselves and make France loved."

Thus spoke a Republican general, addressing himself to French revolutionists, who had torn down the altars of God and had raised others to the goddess of reason personified by unspeakable persons. It was no love for religion that prompted them, for they had none; it was patriotism, the desire to see their country stand high abroad. With them, as with so many of their successors, anti-clericalism was for domestic use exclusively, and not for export. Comparatively recent times have shown us the diverting spectacle of the French government vexing the Jesuits in France with all kinds of petty annoyances and persecutions, even ordering them out of the country, yet granting financial aid to those same French Jesuits when they were engaged in educational and missionary work in the Levant.

Perhaps it is too much to expect that statesmen should be models of consistency, for most of their fishing is done in troubled waters; but, whatever France may do nowadays for religion abroad, "the glory has departed," as far as the protectorate begun by Charlemagne is concerned. Religion as such is lost to sight; statecraft is a sorry substitute for the missionary zeal of former French rulers and cabinets.

CORRESPONDENCE

United Italy's Limping Celebration

ROME, APRIL 2, 1911.

On Monday, the 27th ultimo, United Italy opened the celebration of the semi-centenary of her national birth with a parade, speeches at the Capitol, the opening of one of the Exposition buildings and a banquet followed by fireworks in the evening. The day was fine, the program carried out smoothly, the city well policed and orderly and the sight-seers mildly enthusiastic. There was scarcely a cleric or an ecclesiastical student to be seen anywhere in the city during the day; the decorations were confined almost exclusively to the public buildings, the embassies and the hotels; the spectators were the people of Rome (very few Italians from out of Rome coming to the celebration), and the tourists, who in numbers disappointed largely the bonifaces of the town, who confess that an ecclesiastical fête of any universal interest always brought them more patrons.

However, the United States landed some six hundred from a Mediterranean touring steamship, who ran up from Naples on Saturday night and flitted away again on Wednesday morning. The King's speech was sophomoric and Nathan's soporific. The former had each of the seven paragraphs of his utterance loudly applauded except one: the solitary exception was the one containing the sentence—"With Rome for its Capital, Italy represents the tranquil co-existence (convivenza) of the Churches with the State, which guarantees full and fruitful liberty to religion as to science. One of the evening papers through a slip of the linotype quoted the phrase as "convivenza" of the churches, which is not without some grim humor. Nathan's speech refrained carefully from all reference to Church or religion and confined itself to a gloriose word painting of Italy, with Rome for its Capital, past, present and to come. He had scarcely got launched on his rhetoric when the senators and deputies began to converse in such audible tones as to be significant of indifference if not of more studied reflection, necessitating the orator's pausing from time to time and finally closing inaudibly, when he received a little perfunctory applause, which the evening paper suggests was indicative of gratitude for relief from an awkward, not to say painful, situation. There was an evident effort to abstain from direct anti-clerical reflections; the key-note of all the speeches being Italy's indefeasible right to Rome as her national capital. However down in Anagni the mayor let himself loose in a vulgar outburst against the Church of Christ.

The new ministry has taken over the government with no enthusiasm on any side. Bissolati, the Radical Socialist, invited into the cabinet, declined the invitation on the ground, it is reported, that the concessions offered him were not ample enough. However, the two new socialistic members, Finocchiaro and Nitti, offer little consolation to Catholics, judging by the tone of the Catholic papers. Il Momento says the new ministry augurs a more sectarian and Masonic policy for the country and Il Cruciato that the anti-clerical concessions of Giolitti of course were not announced publicly, but will doubtless embrace the exclusion of all religious teaching from the schools and the predominance of civil matrimony.

As far as an innocent bystander can observe the Vatican goes right on with its daily work and audiences as if the Exposition did not exist and the changes of ministry meant nothing. I see that the Reverend Mr. Tipple (an ominous name and one to conjure with) has stated that the Exposition ignores the existence of the Pope. The boot is on the other leg. The Holy Father possesses his soul in peace with little or no thought of the Exposition. C. M.

The Catholic University of Austria.

SALZBERG, March 10, 1911.

The readers of AMERICA have already been informed of the progress of the work begun some years ago by the Catholics of this empire to found and endow a Catholic University independent of State control. So-called Catholic universities exist, it is true, in Austria-Hungary, but the management of these advanced schools is so strictly within the jurisdiction of the civil authorities that the ample powers demanded by ecclesiastical usage to safeguard the religious development of students who attend their classes are not conceded to the Church authorities. Our Austrian Catholics have determined to establish a school such as their coreligionists of Belgium possess in Louvain, such as the Catholics of the United States have in Washington, and those of Canada have in Quebec. As described in former letters, the project is in the hands of a strong committee under the presidency of his Eminence Cardinal Katschtaler, Prince-Archbishop of Salzburg.

On March 5, in connection with a gathering of Catholics in this city, called to consider the ever-present school question, a special meeting of the University committee was convened. In opening the meeting, his Eminence thanked the members of the committee for the earnestness they had exhibited in the cause during the year just closed, and exhorted them to press on in their zealous efforts to complete the fund required for the great undertaking. In his address Cardinal Katschtaler paid a remarkable compliment to Belgium, a country he declared to be "a model to every Catholic nation in its financial, industrial, social and political development." His Eminence conceded that other factors have had to do with the excellent conditions prevailing among that people, but he did not hesitate to affirm that the principal reason of the remarkable strength of Catholic life in Belgium was unquestionably the activities clustering about the Catholic University in Louvain.

"Who can measure," he said, "the immense influence exerted by that school through the distinguished Catholic representatives it has sent out to play a distinctly Catholic part in parliament, as statesmen, as officials, and in the schools of the kingdom?" From Belgium the Cardinal turned to Canada, and after an eloquent review of the splendid display of faith seen there during the Eucharistic Congress of last year, "a display," he affirmed, "so magnificent that even Catholic nations in the old world will find it difficult to surpass it in future congresses," he added his conviction that such manifestations of Catholic life and faith would have been impossible were it not for the blessings flowing out into the land from the old-established University of Quebec and its associated institution of more recent years in Montreal.

The financial statement of the committee announced that at the close of the year 1910 the total fund in hand amounted to 3,775,877 crowns. Collections are being taken up throughout the empire, and the generosity of the people promises a speedy completion of the sum the committee wishes to have in hand before the work of building shall be undertaken.

K. K.

The International Independent Telegraph Agency

INNSBRUCK, APRIL 1, 1911.

In a resolution of the press section of the Seventh Austrian Catholic Congress, held last September, in Innsbruck, the necessity of an international independent telegraph agency was emphasized, and the desire expressed that such an agency be called into being as soon as possible. Neither the necessity nor the desire was new. The latter has been given expression to in one form or other in the resolutions of every Catholic congress of recent years, and the absolute need of some such antidote and corrective to the poison of untruth, and to the irresponsibility and inaccuracy of the misstatements supplied as "news" to the press of the world by the press bureaus at present in existence, has become increasingly evident with the elevation of these bureaus to the positions of enormous influence they at present occupy.

Recent events have only served to bring this into stronger relief. One has but to recall the accounts, always "full," "complete," "accurate," "of eye witnesses," etc., published in our newspapers and magazines of the riots in Barcelona; of the trial and execution of Ferrer, and of the revolution in Portugal. What with the wholesale calumnies of the clergy and the religious orders, the "subterranean passages" and "stacks of rifles" in religious houses, the suppressing of facts favorable to the Church and the exaggeration of the unfavorable, it seemed clear that an effort was made to picture things Catholic in as sinister a color as words could do, and the deeds of the Church's enemies as seldom falling far short of, when they did not actually attain to, the heroic.

In the European non-Catholic press the magnificent success of a Eucharistic Congress in London, Cologne and Montreal is dismissed with a few paragraphs, whereas the proceedings of an insignificant meeting of free-thinkers and anti-clericals fills columns. Significantly, in the reports of parliamentary discussions in the French, Spanish or Italian chambers, the anti-clerical deputy or premier always "proves"; the Catholic member on the contrary merely "endeavors to refute" or "tries to deny." Then again, how infrequently are the comments of Catholic papers on a parliamentary or any other question, even one of most intimate concern to the Catholic Church, made the subject of a press despatch or news-item? According to the press-despatches, in a conflict between Church and State, the State is in nearly every case merely resisting the usurpations of the Church.

An occasional clerical scandal will be magnified beyond belief and given wide publicity; not so, however, the repentance and retraction of the unfortunate individual, public though that repentance and refutation be. Vatican decrees and encyclicals are misconstrued and mistranslated—witness the case of the Borromeo Encyclical in the Liberal and Socialistic press of Germany. The Pope is apparently continually being displeased with his Cardinal Secretary of State and dismissing him. And so we might go on for pages! Enough has been said, however, to make abundantly clear how untrustworthy, misleading and—the expression is not too strong—diabolically distorted are the majority of the press reports of events within or affecting the Catholic Church. What has been said of a certain brand of history, that it is a conspiracy against the truth, may be applied with much greater propriety to a great part of our twentieth century news-supply. When it is not downright false or misleading, it is too often, to borrow an expressive word from our German cousins, "Tendenzios."

This deplorable condition of affairs finds a ready explanation in the fact that where they are not in the hands of the Church's enemies, or are not financed by anti-clerical parties, the existing agencies are owned by people who are simply neutral or disinterested in church matters, and are, to a large extent, controlled or protected by some one government or other; some of them, indeed, enjoying both forms of patronage at once.

A telegraphic news-agency that would be accurate and authentic in the news, which held itself aloof from such patronage, whose despatches would not be "doctored" to serve the ends of any certain clique or international cabal, would be a boon not only to Catholics and the Catholic press, but to all who love truth, and to those newspapers who print the "romance" news and the "fable-grams" not from any inherent prejudice, but because they are ignorant of Catholic teaching, and have no authoritative sources from which they can draw their supply promptly and cheaply.

Within the past year a notable effort has been made to furnish such sources for the Australian press by the recently consecrated Bishop of Auckland, New Zealand, the Right Reverend Dr. Cleary. An account of his excellently planned and organized enterprise was published in AMERICA of February 18. In England, too, the first steps have been made towards the organization of an international Catholic defence league. And now comes the good news from Switzerland that a stock company has been formed there to conduct an international independent telegraphic agency which will begin operations on the coming first of May.

The new agency is no mere mushroom growth. A committee of four influential Swiss Catholics, Herr Jakob Rohner, a well-known manufacturer; Dr. Geser-Rohner, a lawyer and cantonrat of the Canton of St. Gall; Dr. F. Lampert, Professor of Canon Law in the University of Fribourg, and Herr G. Baumberger, chief editor of the Zürcher Neueste Nachrichten, has for more than a year been quietly conducting a thorough investigation into the matter; the possibilities and the difficulties have been thoroughly discussed, the views of personages high in Church and State ascertained, and everywhere the project has met with the most enthusiastic approval and endorsement. Milan has been selected for the location of the central bureau, with branches in Rome, Munich, Zurich, Vienna, Budapest, Warsaw, Cologne, Brussels, Paris and Madrid. The branches in London and New York and in other important centres will follow as soon as they can be efficiently organized. It is well to remark, to prevent possible confusion, that the new agency is an independent undertaking from the "Central-Auskunftstelle," of which a description was given in a recent number of AMERICA.

The selection of Milan as the seat of the head office has not been made haphazard, but is the result of a thorough study of the conditions in that and other cities, particularly in Vienna, which was at first proposed for the purpose. Milan unites to the advantage of being sufficiently close to Rome, that of excellent railroad connections and an unsurpassed long-distance telephone and telegraph service. There are, for instance, through rail routes by way of the Simplon and St. Gothard tunnels to Paris and London, over the Brenner pass to Munich and the cities of southern Germany, with direct lines thence to Cologne, Brussels, Amsterdam, etc., on the north-east, and to Dresden, Berlin and northern Germany, and thence to St. Petersburg and Warsaw on the north-west; over Venice and Trieste to Vienna, thence to Budapest, Belgrade, Constantinople; over Marseilles to Madrid and Lisbon. These excellent connections are invaluable for the rapid correspondence service, which will be one of the features of the bureau. The telephone and telegraph service from Milan is even more excellent in extent and efficiency. The advantage of this to the new bureau is so evident that comment is superfluous. The agency will use as telegraph and cable name the word "Iuta," formed of the four initial letters of the German title: "Internationale Unabhängige Telegrafische Agentur."

In the choice of its director-general the agency has been singularly fortunate. Dr. Ludwig Kaul, a German, although still young, is a journalist of great and varied experience, and has a knowledge of every important European tongue. For some years he has conducted, with conspicuous and yearly increasing success, a private telegraph agency in Zurich, called the "Helvetia," along the lines of the new venture. The "Helvetia" becomes on May first with its plant, correspondents and patronage, part and parcel of the latter. This must be considered a singularly fortunate circumstance, for it relieves the new international bureau of the thousand and one initial anxieties and difficulties incident upon every new foundation, and enables it to concentrate all its energies on widening the patronage and increasing the efficiency of an already existing and admirably-planned organization.

The intense interest which the news of the new foundation has aroused on the continent and on all sides and the cooperation already secured leave little room for reasonable doubt that the I. U. T. A., within a short space of time, will count among its subscribers the entire Catholic press of Europe, as well as a large and ever-increasing number of the independent publications, to say nothing of the parliamentary, ministerial and private patronage it will in time receive.

All kinds of news will be supplied, ecclesiastical, financial, political, economic, scientific, artistic and literary. The magnificent and truly heroic work of Catholic missionaries in all parts of the known world, a work that has been too little appreciated even in the Catholic press, and is almost, if not totally, ignored by the non-Catholic sheets, will be fully reported by the new agency. Anyone who is at all familiar with the periodical and propaganda literature of the various Catholic missionary associations knows what valuable contributions these missionaries are making to various sciences, such as geography, anthropology, ethnology, botany, to say nothing of the tens of thousands they have led into the paths of civilization and the light of the gospel.

No country would seem to offer a more promising field to the new agency than the United States. Whatever the reason may be, whether it is that they have grown more tolerant, or out of a wholesome fear of the largely-increased influence of the Catholic Church on public opinion during the last few decades, our great newspapers and magazines seem concerned to give as little offence as possible to the Catholic body, and, merely as a matter of business, they prefer to publish accurate news about Catholic matters to the extra, often great, expense of supplying the correction later, on the protest of some influential Catholic personage or association. To such publications the I. U. T. A. will supply all they desire, and will supply it as promptly and cheaply as any one of the existing agencies. On those, however, whom the old demon of bigotry still holds in bondage, it will act as a wholesome check to their ravings, which they will ignore at their peril.

The new agency has an imperative claim on the support and patronage of the Catholic body. It opens out a splendid prospect of largely increased efficiency and prestige to our American Catholic press, and brings the realization of Catholic dailies nearer. Steps have already been taken to organize an American branch of the stock company of the I. U. T. A., and to put it into intimate connection with the central bureau. Due notice of the progress of this organization will be given in these pages. The entire American press, Catholic, non-Catholic and secular, will, in due time, be canvassed for patronage

M. J. AHERN, S.J.

The South African Federation begins life with a debt of £116,502.628, over 580 million dollars, and an interest charge of £3,963.072 per annum. As its whole population is barely a million, each white man in South Africa has to carry an average debt of $600. Canada, with a population of 7 million, has a debt of no more than 260 million dollars, not quite half that of South Africa; moreover, it has something to show for its money.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

"Let Us Hate Nobody"

While skimming over the morning paper in search of foreign news and chatty locals and spicy personals, the reader would give a little start of surprise if his eye were to alight upon a leader with the above title. The thoroughly Christian sentiment that it expresses ought certainly to animate us, but we hardly expect to see it thus plainly put in what is commonly the record of twenty-four hours of clever politics and business tact and petty human miseries. A short time since there occurred in Valencia, Spain, an event which was an occasion of distress and grief to all worthy people. It was the funeral of one who had once been conspicuous in every Catholic enterprise, but when his lifeless body was borne from under the roof which had sheltered him, living and dying, the way did not lead to the parish church for the last prayer and the last blessing and then to the Campo Santo, "the Holy Field," as God's acre is called in Spain's language of faith and piety. At what moment the change had come perhaps he himself could not have told us; but a mighty, an awful, change had come and had disturbed his life. Living, he had cast his lot with the enemies of the name of Christ. But dying? There was none to bear testimony to the return of the prodigal to his Father's house nor to even a heart-throb of grief for the harm that he had done. Outwardly, he had torn himself away from the spiritual mother that had borne him to God; outwardly, there death found him. It was a strange, disorderly throng that followed his corpse to the place not hallowed by benediction and prayer. With noise and outcry and shouts of defiance and derision, they trooped along as might victors in a street brawl. It was a sad day for the ancient and venerable city of Valencia, when the body was conveyed through its streets and with it there went no Catholic rite nor symbol.

But if people are worked up to a high pitch of excitement they often say and do what they afterwards regret, when the storm gives place to calm reflection. Did those Valencia flouts subside into a silence full of remorse for a demonstration so untimely and so unbecoming? Far otherwise. In the next succeeding issue of their organ of propaganda they said to the children of the Church: "Now, Catholics, go and dance on his grave; one of your enemies is dead."

"Let us hate nobody," admonishes the paper where commerce and banking and the petty events in the life of a great city are gathered together for our information and amusement. "Why should we rejoice at our neighbor's misfortune? We do not and cannot know the secrets of his heart. Even when his eyes had closed upon this world, his soul had not yet fled. We know not what his thoughts then were. May not a wave of repentance have passed over that seared and scarred spirit? Hidden, mysterious, unsearchable, are the ways of God, and it is not for us to attempt to fathom them. We know our duty; let us pray that we may do it; let us pray that all men may know and do their duty; but let us not usurp God's place by pronouncing sentence against those whose lives taught us what our own lives ought not to be."

Counterfeit coin is a vile imposture; the counterfeiter is a public enemy. If, however, we see someone happy in the possession of a few brass and pewter trinkets in the firm persuasion that they are gold and silver coins, we ought to regret that he is so deceived about their true worth; and we ought to use all honorable means to undeceive him, both for his own sake and for the sake of his neighbor whom he may unintentionally defraud in exchange. Though his trinkets are almost worthless and are not at all what he supposes them to be, shall we improve matters by performing a war dance on him and his gimcracks? The deeper our conviction and the more intense our feeling on any proposition, the more likely are we to despise and reject whatever opposes what we maintain; and our mental state is but the homage, conscious or unconscious, that we pay to truth and its importance. We might have a feeling of more than transitory interest in a snap-shot of the summit of Cotopaxi, but that feeling would not be militant, aggressive, contentious; for Cotopaxi does not enter very intimately into our daily existence. Quite different is it when we think deeply and feel strongly. Hence, our tendency in the domain of religion to think and speak vigorously not only against the counterfeiter and his pinchbeck (and, surely, they deserve it all), but also against the ill-informed holder of the spurious metal. Would this course win him? Rather, might it not make him more set in his preconceived notions? Nobody, be he saint or sinner, really likes to be called a villain except by himself. Why should we glory because our neighbor is wretched? Would it not be better to attempt to enlighten his darkness and lead him to understand that mint fine metal is better for him than the closest of imitations?

Fooling the People

The contradictions in the mental and moral equipment of many of the French politicians of to-day have already been noted in AMERICA. A recent issue of the Contemporary invites its readers to wonder at a few more. Thus Briand, the Arch-Socialist and Anticlerical of a previous period, was thrown out of power because he was not sufficiently one or the other. And yet in the new Socialist Cabinet of the man who succeeds Briand there are, according to common report, eight men whom it is difficult to classify as Socialists. They are multi-millionaires. They are not sans culottes. Monis himself is the prosperous owner of vast stores of cognac and the principal shareholder in the Hotel Continental. Berteaux, who is a Government broker and a millionaire, has been made Minister of War. As war rumors can naturally affect the money market, it is the acknowledgment of sublime virtue in this exalted statesman to make him Minister of War; Delcassé is a landlord, as was his predecessor Pichon, and yet landlordism is to disappear in the Utopia of Socialism; Pams, who is going to right the wrongs of the downtrodden peasantry in his capacity of Minister of Agriculture, is the wealthiest member of the Cabinet, and Massé the Minister of Commerce, Boncourt of Labor, and Caillaux of Finance are all opulent citizens.

Naturally one asks will the Minister of Agriculture contribute to rural pensions; will the Minister of Labor provide out of his ample resources for the operatives in factories and other victims of the present system? Caillaux, the Minister of Finance, will have the hardest time in defending himself, for, besides his salary as Minister, he receives 250,000 francs as Administrator of the Credit Foncier of Egypt, 200,000 francs as President of the Board of the Credit Foncier Argentin, 220,000 francs as President of the Board of Rio de la Plata, and some other trifles besides. Yet he is pledged to embody in the forthcoming legislation an Income Tax Bill. He was very much embarrassed when an importunate and offensively logical royalist named Delahaye asked him how he reconciled his financial status with his political professions. Indeed, he is said to have blushed to the roots of his hair, but that was due to the suddenness of the attack. His hair will never grow gray from protracted worry about his inconsistencies. For he is not likely to be very urgent in pressing the Income Tax Bill for consideration. That proposal has been slumbering for fourteen years or more in the Government portfolios, and it is inconceivable that M. Berteaux is going to take it out. A tax on his income would be too great a contribution to his country, which has helped him so generously to accumulate his enormous capital.

Abraham Lincoln is credited with saying that "you can fool all the people some time, you can fool some people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time." He was not thinking of France when he presented this nugget of wisdom to the consideration of his fellow countrymen. However, the American voter does not differ essentially from his French contemporary. He, too, can be fooled. Incidentally one may understand how it is that many of these French politicians who were brought up Catholics have become persecutors of the Church. There is money in politics.

Secretary MacVeagh on Pensions

The civil war pension list is a topic whose discussion public officials studiously avoid. Though it has practically lost its patriotic aspects and has become a political list, costing the government about $160,000,000 per year, for reasons best known to themselves timorous politicians usually give the subject as wide a berth as possible. All the more credit, then, is due to the public officer who is not afraid to make a frank statement concerning the system of civil war pensions as it exists in the country to-day.

Franklin MacVeagh, Secretary of the Treasury, at the thirteenth annual meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Science recently held in Philadelphia, made a vigorous plea for a civil service pension for government employees. He favored the project not merely as most important for the civil employees, but chiefly because he considered it absolutely necessary for the welfare of the government itself. "And while we have a perfectly enormous civil war pension list, which is not a credit to us," said Secretary MacVeigh, "the whole civil list is left without any protection or consideration." The unfairness of the system evidently is keenly recognized by Mr. MacVeagh, since he was bold enough to assure his auditors that the civil war pension list has become "a mere political machine."

We are not sure that the project of a civil service list advocated by the Secretary would not come in time to be quite as serious a burden upon the people and quite as ready a vehicle of graft as the pension list appears in the Secretary's judgment to have grown to be. Nevertheless the plan thus to favor civil service employees has weighty reasons to recommend it, not the least of which, perhaps, is the assurance which the establishment of such a list would inevitably afford. On economic grounds it would force our legislators to pay decidedly greater heed to the abuses which made Mr. MacVeagh's characterization of the civil war list entirely fair.

The Sunday Comic Supplement

So much has been said and written concerning the harmful influence of the Sunday comic supplement upon the minds of young people, one might be readily pardoned the judgment that the condemnation of them is practically universal among the right-minded. It is a genuine surprise, then, to learn that the offensive crudities and coarseness of their caricatures have staunch defenders among those holding high place in the world of art. At a conference, in New York, of the recently founded League for the Improvement of the Children's Comic Supplement, two of the country's foremost artists, John W. Alexander and George De Forest Brush, amazed those present by the stand they took in opposition to the project. Both declared the supplement to be "all right."

"I cannot believe," said Mr. Alexander, "that the men working for the Sunday supplements—some of the brightest men in America—would do anything to harm children. If the supplements were suppressed it would be a national loss. A child's mind is naturally clean. If there are vulgarities in the picture sheets, the child does not see them." Mr. Alexander thinks, too, that the league is going about its purpose in the wrong way when it tries to educate editors. Of course he bases this judgment on the hoary fallacy that editors know the public wants and will change their tactics when the public demands it.

By strange coincidence almost on the day of the New York conference there was held in Munich, Bavaria; an enthusiastic mass meeting of men, mainly heads of families. It, too, was called by a recently established league—a strong interconfessional society whose aim is to fight public vice and immorality—and during its course reference was made to the growing evil of the comic illustrated paper, and to the viciousness which their inartistic coarseness fosters. We have on other occasions made mention of the energetic efforts being made in Germany to suppress smutty and trashy literature, and the comic illustrated journals have naturally been condemned as its potent ancillaries. There, too, opposition cropped out when least expected. The artist folks, some of them at least, are up in arms. Like Mr. Alexander and Mr. Brush, strange to say, the alleged reason of their entering the field is their love of art and their desire to conserve its interests.

The folly of their stand was cleverly shown by one of the speakers at the Munich meeting. He very correctly affirmed that the fight against the hideous comic supplement in no wise touches literature or art, since it revolves about a simple question of morals. Every fair mind must grant, said the speaker, that the smut and trash of the colored supplement pander directly to what is vulgar, coarse and evil in human nature.

It is against this the fight is waged. Meantime vulgarity and coarseness are just as plainly hurtful to true art and literature as they are to morality. Very eloquently and very sympathetically did the speaker describe the destructive influence of these picture sheets, affirming their necessary effect to be to tear out of the heart of the child the correct impulses which careful training at home and at school thought to have rooted in it forever.

We would suggest that Mr. Alexander consult with those who have to do with the training of the child mind before he again affirms that a child does not see the vul-garities contained in the comic supplement. However clean the child mind be naturally, experienced teachers will assure him that it is unfortunately too ready a receptacle of what is vicious and depraved if it be not sedulously safeguarded by those of more trained sense and knowledge. And these teachers will point out to him the notably growing tendencies among young people to-day springing out of the vicious influence of these colored sheets. Perhaps in the face of their testimony Mr. Alexander will not deny four counts in their indictment: a tendency towards a disregard for constituted authority; a lack of respect for age and superior wisdom; a weak appreciation of the demands of duty; a disposition to follow pleasure and interest rather than obligation and order.

Editing Under Difficulties

In the chill of the morning, in the blaze of the mid-day sun, and until night throws her damp blanket over the porch on the opposite corner, lynx-eyed Luiz, Braga's detective, stands with his eyes glued on the modest office of a Portuguese newspaper. The editor has "accepted" the changed political conditions, for his paper still appears on the appointed days; otherwise, his, like so many others, would appear at irregular intervals or not at all. There is one exception. Some place in the country a tiny sheet keeps aloft the banner of the Legitimists, now represented by Miguel of Braganza, but it is too puny to be a danger even to the Braga republic; therefore it is suffered to exist.

But to come back to Luiz. The editor, lolling in the oriental magnificence of his sanctum, looks out and spies Luiz, the patriot of sleepless eyes and unwearied vigilance. The editor is sorry, for though he is safe from chill and heat, Luiz takes them by turn, with an occasional downpour of rain to vary the program. Luiz is watching, for sinister reports have been sent in about that editorial office, and the fate of the republic may hang on his alertness.

It is about 8 o'clock in the morning. He notices that three youths, rather shabbily dressed, are coming with bundles under their arms. Bombs, very likely, for the purpose of giving the patriots a taste of their own medicine. (Note by the editor: They are our apprentices; each brings his lunch from home.) Shortly after, Luiz observes the approach of a Jesuit in disguise; his pockets are bulging out; he is undoubtedly armed; more bombs, perhaps. (Note by the editor: That's our handy man, whom we sent to the jobber's; he shaves regularly.) Another Jesuit, even more deeply disguised! But he is so plainly a "highbrow" that Luiz is not deceived. (Note by the editor: Our manager comes in with the first mail from the post office; like all managers, he's very intellectual.)

Next, Luiz sees two Sisters of Charity who, notwithstanding the decree of expulsion, have remained in Portugal, and now, with their identity artfully concealed, are coming on some treasonable message to the office of the editor; but Luiz recognizes them and jots down a few items for the use of headquarters. (Note by the editor: Our honored spouse has sent the dishwasher for the keys of the cellar, which we didn't intend to carry to the office, yet did, and the maid to get the few milreis which we promised to leave on the breakfast table, yet didn't.) Another conspirator approaches! He looks like a medical student; he is pale and somewhat wan; he carries a bundle of documents; they may be commissions in the anti-republican army that is to be mustered. (Note by the editor: At last there is our secretary, Dan, with the second mail. Is he beginning to keep late hours? At times he looks at the wall and sighs; again, he gazes out of the window and whistles softly; he seems to be careful of his hair, but his color is fading; sometimes he is looking at nothing and doing about the same. We think he will recover.)

"Now, Luiz," concludes the editor of A Provincia, of Vizeu, Portugal, for he has given us these details, "go back to headquarters and report that we are here in the quiet possession of our rights, and we are too busy with our own affairs to meddle with those of others. You need not stand in cold and heat and rain by turns for the sake of ferreting out any conspiracy of ours, for we are not engaged in that line of public work. Our work is seen in our newspaper; read it and learn."

It is not surprising that those who rose to power as the result of a conspiracy should hear conspirators in every whispering breeze and see conspirators on every Monday; but that does not make their system of dogging and spying less vexatious.

German Catholics will not fail immediately to recognize an especial significance in the recent Reichstag debate regarding relations now developing with the Vatican. The first reading of the Cultus budget in the Prussian Diet brought evidence of an undue excitement among certain of its members as a result of the publication of the anti-modernist oath. Of course, there is no real reason for this; throughout the controversy that has followed that publication the Vatican has acted with moderation and with a praiseworthy discretion, and the matter in dispute is one pertaining entirely to Church discipline, and in no way affecting the interests of the State or of Evangelical bodies in Germany. A possible explanation of the trouble lies partly in the fact that German non-Catholics do not appreciate the nature of Catholic Church discipline, and partly, perhaps principally, in the systematic misrepresentations of an antagonistic press, which would gladly see the introduction of a new Kulturkampf. Representative leaders in the Reichstag disclaim all thought of such an outcome, but one may not ignore the undertone of hostility running through many of the speeches made during the heated debate. Even the fact that the Chancellor and the Minister of Worship acknowledge the conciliatory attitude of the Holy See in carrying out the disciplinary legislation involved in the requirement of the oath does not entirely quiet one's apprehension. This the more so, as the Chancellor announced that in future ecclesiastics who have taken the oath will find difficulty in securing appointments to gymnasien classes in German and in history, on the ground of possible prejudice in their teachings. The alleged reason is a silly one, and shows a complete misunderstanding of the purpose of the oath; as does, too, the claim made that insistence upon such an oath is to advocate a measure likely to disturb the peace existing among the Church organizations of the empire.

LITERATURE

THE PROFIT AND LOSS OF GREEK.

There is a difference between teaching and tutoring. The tutor has only one or two under his care and can and should fit his instructions to the needs of his students. A teacher must look to the good of many. Tutors can be electivists because they know needs and can reasonably prescribe means. Electivism, after all, is a prescribed course for one. Teachers cannot be electivists or specialists. They must choose for many, subordinate the private good to the public good, and so must look to the common interests in their work. In speaking of Greek studies we refer to teaching, not to tutoring. The teaching of Greek ought not to be archeological or philological or mythological, because those sciences are not of the greatest interest to the greatest number. They are for the tutor to elect; not for the teacher to prescribe.

The teaching of Greek may avail itself of the sure conclusions of all the sciences which swarm about the classics; it ought not to subordinate itself to the acquisition of any, because that would be to force upon the many what is of interest to the few. If Greek is to be saved, it must be taught with a view to bring out its abiding and universal interest. What was it that attracted and fascinated Italy at the Renaissance after seven hundred years of almost complete forgetfulness of Greek? It was Homer principally and the poetry of Homer. If the forerunners of the revival of Greek had to reach Homer through weary wastes of philology, through bewildering theories of authorship, through myriads of hideous myths, and the fragments of broken crockery and battered armor, then it is quite certain Greek would never have had a rebirth. Interest came before application; the love of the whole before concentration upon a part; the charm of art before the seriousness of science.

Happily there are many books which introduce readers to the wider appeal of literature. Such are the works of Professor Mackail, Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. His freshness of view, his restrained but sincere enthusiasm, the crystallization of characteristics into a sparkling phrase, are all admirably adapted to making Greek or Latin attractive. His edition of the "Anthology" is well known; his "History of Latin Literature" is a marvel of condensed and illuminating criticism; his "Lectures on Greek Poetry" (1910), the latest addition to the growing library of his works, is satisfyingly replete with the qualities found in earlier volumes. Noteworthy is the fresh use he makes of the device of parallel passages, a device which is likely to become hackneyed and conventional in less skilful hands. The Homeric epithet, the Homeric simile, and the Homeric "ethical line," each in turn is brought home to the reader with the novelty and charm of their original invention.

There is the ideal of the true commentator: to bring the reader into sympathy with the author, to touch up the colors which custom has dimmed and bring them to bear upon a receptive mind with their first brightness. No wonder Mr. Mackail has confidence in the cause of Greek. It lives so vigorously and buoyantly for him that he cannot conceive of it as anything else but immortal.

"The position of Greek," he writes in "Lectures on Greek Poetry," "as a factor in culture has never been more assured than it is now. It moves beyond reach of the attacks of those who fancy themselves its opponents, and the alarmed outcries of those who profess themselves its only friends. It exercises over the whole modern world an influence astonishingly potent and persuasive. The danger now is, not of Greek being studied too little, but of its being on the one hand pursued too hastily and carelessly, and, on the other hand, distorted under the pressure of a specialization which continually becomes more exacting in its demands."

It is encouraging to read this cheerful paragraph, which has been given here in an abridged form; and if our lot were cast among the learned shades of Oxford and not among the cries and feverish rushing of modern trade, it would be easier to share in this sanguine assurance of Mr. Mackail. The Mussulman and the barbarian have once before thrown Greek literature to the flames, and modern pleasure and modern greed will scarcely be more merciful. Yet if these monsters will ever be induced to spare, it will be because of writers such as Mr. Mackail, who by their illuminating enthusiasm for the author's message and ideal have made the pleasure and profit of the mind alluring to jaded sensualists and wearied money-makers.

Another writer who has been bringing out the artistic and better side of Greek study is Mr. W. Rhys Roberts. He has edited "Demetrius on Style" (1902), "Longinus on the Sublime" (1907), and now has added to "The Three Literary Letters" (1901) of Dionysius of Halicarnassus the same author's work on "Literary Composition" (1910). These are the writings of literary critics who read Greek as we read Shakespeare, who were not halted on their way to the author's meaning by endless notes on archeology and mythology. They went straight to the heart of their author, and if they paused upon his language, it was not apart from the full message he was bearing, but in order to understand that message better. They were Greeks reading Greek, and it is the happy and successful task of Professor Roberts to make us see and appreciate how they do it. When it is remembered how profoundly Professor Butcher's well-known work, "Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art" has influenced modern literary criticism, especially of poetry and drama, there is good reason to believe that the introduction to the modern world of these other Greek critics in an attractive and sympathetic edition will have no less wide or less effective an influence. If Professor Roberts does no more than prevent modern American rhetoricians from heralding as new discoveries what have been commonplaces in literary criticism from the beginning, his work will have amply justified itself. And there is all the more reason for wishing him success in this field of art, as Professor Butcher's recent death deprives Greek literature of a great scholar and a true friend.

There are two marked tendencies in the study of Greek, the scientific and the artistic. Which should find its place in education? Both, of course; but not in the same way. Confining the discussion to the classical languages and not entering into the wider question of what place science should occupy in the general scheme of education, we may safely assert that the earlier study in Greek and Latin should be predominantly artistic. Such it has ever been and such it should continue. In the study of literature as an art is its practical utility. Professor John J. Stevenson has, in one of the late numbers of the Popular Science Monthly, discharged several tremendous broadsides at classical education. When the smoke cleared away and the echoes died down, it was found that the esteemed Professor had aimed his artillery at the clouds.

His argument in brief amounts to this: the old pagans, from Homer down to Horace, had lax ideas on the marriage bond; the Greek and Latin scientists did not know the chemical constitution of water; therefore give up the classics and study the latest encyclopedia. How Professor Stevenson could have been so long on the faculty of New York University and not have discovered that Greek and Latin are not studied for their morals is a mystery. The practical utility of the classics is not in their information but in their formation. It is hard to have patience with people who speak of utilitarian studies and then sneer at the classics which are studied precisely because they are the most utilitarian of all studies.

We should certainly look upon that surgical operation as decidedly useful which made an eye see or an ear hear. It will be decidedly useless to put a piece of gold in my hand if my fingers have no power to grasp it. Now the classics are directed precisely to giving efficiency to man's whole mental equipment. The so-called utilitarian studies go looking around for landscapes and orchestras; the true utilitarian studies furnish the eyes and the ears. We do not take our morals from Latin and Greek authors or even from modern writers; we do not take our science either from the ancients unless they had all the data which we have to conclude from, and then the scientific conclusions of the ancients have not been surpassed, but we do go to Latin and Greek for efficiency, for the power of self-expression. An educated man has a memory that remembers and an imagination that sees clearly and with originality, and a taste which reasons logically; in a word, he has faculties which act, which serve him to express himself and to assimilate the expression of others. For each of these faculties there is an art. It is the profession of the classics to develop in the faculties of man efficiency or art, at least in its first stages.

The classical languages are the most perfect literary expression we have of man's faculties and so the most competent to teach the art of self-expression. The classical languages because they are foreign are for that very reason better suited for the purpose of teaching the art of expression. In our native tongue we run on with the sense; it is an effort to pause upon the expression. In a foreign tongue we are perpetually halted upon the words and sentences and larger elements of expression; we reflect upon them, we appraise their value, we criticise, in a word, we master the art. The earlier study of Greek, then, should lay stress upon the grammatical qualities, the imaginative force, the choiceness of vocabulary, the harmony of sentence, the truth, the beauty and power of language, all leading up to and centered upon the writer's full meaning.

FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.

Christian Art in China. By BERTHOLD LAUFER. Chicago. The Author, Field Museum.

It is, of course, a very well known fact that during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the Jesuit missionaries in China preached eloquently, suffered much, lived and died in a most heroic manner. Many people know that the Jesuits became prominent in the East as astronomers and scientists. But few know that among the Jesuits there were artists of distinction, who exerted a certain influence on the art of the Orient. Certainly very few people know that the followers of Saint Ignatius actually founded a school of painting at the court of the great Emperor K'ien-lung. Much less is it suspected that there are examples of this Jesuit art stored away in the American Museum of Natural History, at Seventy-seventh Street and Columbus Avenue, New York. Even the Curator of the department in which they are stored is ignorant of their historic interest.

All this and more we learn from this small book by Berthold Laufer, published at Berlin, Germany, in 1910. The author of this valuable contribution to modern learning records in a very modest and simple way many original researches and various important discoveries. On all doubtful points he compares his conclusions with similar statements of other scientists who have written in French and German as well as English. Sometimes the reader is even invited to consider the original Chinese text.

The pictorial illustrations are black and white reproductions of some twenty-two antique paintings and engravings of unequal artistic excellence, but of the greatest historic interest. The originals from which these illustrations were made are, as previously noted, in the American Museum of Natural History, and are packed away in a dark closet on the sixth floor, which is the attic.

These twenty-two pictures were made for the most part by or for the Jesuit missionaries, and were circulated among the Chinese people. They were discovered by Mr. Laufer during his first expedition to China in 1901-4. It was during his second journey to the Far East in 1908-10 that he discovered in Si-ngan-fu another early picture of great importance, which was probably painted by a Jesuit artist in China towards the end of the sixteenth century. The subject of this last picture is the Madonna and the Infant Jesus: it is now in the Field Museum of Natural History in Chicago.

All the illustrations in Mr. Laufer's book are very interesting, and as well printed as is possible on the kind of paper used. As for the text, it is crammed and packed with curious details and valuable facts.

Let us take a sample paragraph: "Although Jesuit art never exerted a fundamental influence on Chinese art, yet the efforts of these humble and modest workers were not altogether futile. Their imposing works of architecture and gardening left a deep impression upon the minds of the people; they introduced into China painting by means of enamel colors, after the method of Limoges; they perfected the Cloisonné process; they taught painting on glass; they widened the horizon of native artists by the introduction of new ornaments, patterns and subjects by which they greatly promoted the porcelain industry and secured to the Chinese were a larger market in Europe. 'Jesuit Porcelain' is still well known to collectors of China."

We see by this paragraph that the author confines himself to the scientific point of view, giving us nothing but plain facts, presented in the bluntest possible form. And while this little book on Christian Art in China is replete with very vital information, it has remained a scientific pamphlet little calculated to attract attention. Although appearing in English, it is a special reprint of the records of the Institute of Oriental Languages in Berlin, and makes Part I of the thirteenth volume of East-Asiatic studies.

Nevertheless all of us who are interested in the history of Art, and all who look with affection on the heroic lives of the early Jesuit missionaries are deeply indebted to Mr. Laufer. We are indebted for his erudite presentation of little known facts. We owe him a debt of gratitude for his original research and remarkable discoveries. His simple narrative gives us new ideas and opens up a vista of possibilities far beyond the bounds of its restricted pages. And let it be frankly admitted that it throws upon us a serious duty and a responsibility for the future of the twenty-two pictures in the attic of the Natural History Museum. They are precious mementoes from the hands of devoted artists who consecrated their lives to a noble cause. And, as Mr. Laufer points out, these frail works of art are valuable links in the building up of artistic history. WILLIAM LAUREL HARRIS.

Father Tim. By ROSA MULHOLLAND. London: Sands & Co. 90 cents.

The opening of Chapter XXV will give an insight into several characteristics of this charming story.

"The bell of Christ Church Cathedral was booming midnight over the city, its deep vibrations beating the air around St. Brendan's Parish, drowning all other sounds with its mellow music, the roll of its solemn drum. Father Tim was still in the church, prostrate on the steps of the sanctuary, pleading for a soul. The place was empty of all other life, and dark, except for the sanctuary lamp; the silence rustling with the prayers of centuries; the vacancy filled with the spirits of those who, from their places of light and sweetness, visit with joy the scenes of faithful struggles, once so penal, but now ended in bliss."

In these few lines we have a style, not untouched by magic, and the evidence of lively faith. The two together—up to the time of Newman an unusual conjunction—make marvelously for religion and literature.

"Father Tim" is the simple story of an Irish priest doing successively in towns and country the work of Christ. The plot is of the slightest texture, but incidents and events crowd one upon the heels of another so rapidly as to hold the reader absorbed. What marvelous, what living faith Miss Mulholland possesses! It will interest organizations enlisted against the drink evil to know that the book deserves to be ranked amongst temperance stories. "Father Tim" is in interest fully up to the ordinary successful novel of the day; in style, vastly superior; in faith—but here comparisons fail.

FRANCIS S. FINN, S.J.

The Idea of Development. By Rev. P. M. NORTHCOTE. New York, etc.: Benziger Brothers. 70 cents net.

One beginning this book is rather puzzled. Why should its author seek to show that Darwin's theory of Natural Selection, of which modern Evolution makes so little account, is not contrary to scholastic philosophy? The answer seems to be found in the third part, where the author, turning to the question, "whether there is anything analogous to Evolution in the development of dogma," takes up the defence of Newman's theory of the development of Christian doctrine. In this he finds the analogue of the Darwinian natural selection, like it reconcilable with sound principles, and like it abused by false disciples. Newman is the victim of the Modernist, as Darwin is of the Materialist. He confesses that the latter gave occasion to such abuse; indeed, in "The Descent of Man," he went a long way in the materialistic direction and ended as an Agnostic. He denies that Newman, properly understood, gave any handle to the Modernists. Whether his apology for the two will convince his readers, Catholic or heretical, is, we think, doubtful. "Properly understood" too often indicates stumbling blocks.

H. W.

The Observatory of the Ebro, in Spain, has begun to issue a new series of "Monthly Bulletins," which are the best that have come under our notice. The first number, which was received last December, contained the observed data for January 1910, with an introduction explaining the method in which these data were observed and computed. The work is divided into three parts, heliophysics, meteorology and geophysics. The first treats of the sun, the number, location, size and character of its spots, the faculae, spectroheliograms and the like. The second refers to the various elements of the weather, such as the air pressure, the temperature, rainfall, and clouds, and also to the electricity of the atmosphere. The third treats of the earth's magnetism and of its quakes.

After this introduction, which is at the beginning of the first or January number only, there follow many pages full of numerical data of the observations, and after them three double-pages contain these same data in graphic form, each for ten days of the month. The curves are printed in black upon a network of small light blue squares properly spaced with heavier lines, so that the eye can see at a glance, and compare all the various observed data and follow them from hour to hour throughout the whole month. This is the best feature of the "Bulletin." This graphic presentation must entail very much labor and expense, but it is invaluable for testing theories, studying the connection and causes and effects of the various phenomena, and ultimately making it possible to forecast them with certainty.

The Observatory of the Ebro, as may be known, is situated in Spain, near the mouth of the river Ebro, not far from Tortosa. It is under Jesuit direction, and has been declared to be a public utility by the government. WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The Legends of the Jews. By LOUIS GINZBERG.—II. Bible Times and Characters from Joseph to Exodus. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

This is the second volume of Mr. L. Ginzberg's collection of Jewish legends dealing with Biblical personages and events. It contains stories about the sons of Jacob, Job and Moses up to the Exodus. The sources of these stories are not indicated. This information, as well as the explanatory notes to which the reader is referred in the course of the work, the editor reserves for the third volume. In the meanwhile the reader must patiently await the appearance of this future volume for the answer to any question that he may ask.

The narrators of these naïve stories are intent only on two things—to glorify their heroes by marvelous tales, and to moralize. All else is of little or no importance in their eyes. Imagination is given free rein, and is allowed to career at its own sweet will. There is an abundance of fantastic episodes which at times degenerate into the grotesque. That air of naturalness which almost beguiles us into believing the most extraordinary tales, is wholly absent. Hence there is none of the charm that attaches to so many fantastic popular legends. Still, during the Middle Ages, when popular taste craved for the marvelous, these stories were, no doubt, read and listened to with pleasure by the pious sons of Israel, and they will probably be enjoyed even now by Jewish children. Some of them, however, it should be said, are not intended for children. F. BECHTEL, S.J.

Non-Catholic Denominations. By Rev. R. H. BENSON, M.A. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

This is a valuable contribution to the Westminster Library, a series intended to supplement and illustrate from practical experience the moral, dogmatic and liturgical studies preliminary to the priesthood. Starting with the proposition that the day has passed in which the preservation of the Faith was the main duty of Catholics, Father Benson insists that the supreme commission of Christ to His Apostles to spread the Truths He entrusted to them is equally binding in these days of mutual toleration and comparative freedom. It no longer suffices to keep the fire alive in the domestic hearth; it must be fanned into a conflagration abroad. Missionary endeavor without the fold is as imperative on priests, and to a certain extent on the laity, as pastoral work within.

But the worker must be acquainted with the material on which he operates. "We must be able," said Cardinal Manning, "to play dominoes with those with whom we argue."

The ecclesiastical course supplies the principles on which heresies must be combated, but a knowledge of their various details, the amount of truth intermingled with them and the temper, tendency and view-point of each, is not within its province. Moreover, our text books often attack positions that have been abandoned. Protestantism has swung around from "Justification by faith alone" to "Justification by works alone," and the Bible has ceased to be its sole rule of faith. Even the argument from authority will have no weight with the Ritualist who, by an ingenious or ingenuous mental process, claims it as his own. Every sect contains a measure of truth as well as error, and an understanding of both is necessary in order that an exposition of Catholic doctrine should find lodgment in Protestant minds. To provide this knowledge is the purpose of the book:—

"To set forth sympathetically the broad outlines of the various religious systems that flourish in England outside the borders of the Catholic Church; to lay stress on what is true in them rather than what is false; and to indicate as far as possible in each instance the corrective Catholic principle that is lacking."

The Church of England being more definite in its formularies and containing in microcosm English religion as a whole, nearly half the 217 pages are devoted to its principles and parties; most of the remainder to the Presbyterians, Non-conformists, Congregationalists, Baptists and Wesleyans, with their principal subdivisions. To include all the multitudinous sects that sprang out of these bodies was found impossible and also unnecessary, as their ruling principles are sufficiently indicated in treating of the main divisions. The same will hold for their development in the United States, except, perhaps, in regard to Presbyterianism, which has been more tenacious of its original creed in Scotland and England than with us. A very useful chapter is added on Theosophy, Christian Science, Mind Healing and Spiritualism, which will be found as applicable to conditions here as in England.

The book is a model of its kind, and both for its manner and matter should be in the hands of all who are interested in restoring the stray sheep to the fold. Its exposition of Protestant errors is free from polemical bitterness, and full credit is given wherever truth or sincerity is discernible. The author had found the sympathetic unfolding of Catholic truth more effective of conversions than the most masterly destructive criticism; his own plain statement of the Protestant position, commended by fairness and tempered by charity, should prove more fruitful than the most brilliant denunciatory methods. M. K.

Loi d'Exil. Par EDMOND THIRIET. 3ième Edition. Paris: Tequi.

This book is a romance whose plot is interwoven with the suppression of the religious houses in France. Paul Maillet, the arch-villain of the story, is one of the conspicuous members of the Ministry, and sets out to crush the Church, but he happens at the same time to be in love with Isabel de Valois, who intends to become a Carmelite nun. Maillet, who is incidentally dreaming of becoming the savior of France by making himself a dictator, fails to convince the lady of the foolishness of her resolution. In his rage he proposes to revenge himself on her and her father by seizing their vast possessions. The whole story is very fanciful, but what strikes the foreigner is the extraordinary eloquence and elegance of language at the disposal of every one of the actors in the drama. The same peculiarity manifests itself in the parliamentary discourses of most of the speakers who ascend the tribune of the Palais Bourbon to assail or defend the Church. France seems to have exaggerated her polish. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Saint Charles Borromeo. A Sketch of the Reforming Cardinal. By Louise M. Stacpoole-Kenny. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $1.10.
- The Story of the Old Faith in Manchester. By John O'Dea. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $1.50.
- The Life of Blessed John Eudes. By the Rev. Matthew Russell, S.J. (Reviewed in Vol. IV, page 69.) New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 90c.
- Three Fundamental Principles of the Spiritual Life. By Rev. Moritz Meschler, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.00.
- Catholics and the American Revolution. By Martin I. J. Griffin. Vol. III. Philadelphia: The Author, 1935 North Eleventh Street.
- Short Catechism for Those About to Marry. By the Rev. Andrew Byrne. Rochester, N. Y.: St. Bernard's Seminary. Net 15c.
- The Little Girl from Back East. By Isabel J. Roberts. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 45c.

EDUCATION

Representative Hebrews are among the latest recruits to the rapidly growing movement in favor of religious training in schools. A largely attended meeting was held by them at the Hotel Astor, in New York, early this month to discuss "The Problem of Religious Education for Jewish Children." The discussion called forth strong expressions in favor of immediate steps to solve the problem properly. It was affirmed, by speakers representing the orthodox Jewish churches of the city, that the only method of instructing Jewish children in religion was in special schools by properly qualified teachers of their own faith. The teaching of Hebrew was declared an essential in these schools, both for the study of the ancient scriptures and as a means of communication among the Jews all over the world.

The Princeton Theological Review for April has an article attacking the policy and practice of the Carnegie Foundation in its dealings with colleges originally founded by Christian bodies. The author, Rev. Dr. William S. Plummer Bryan, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church of the Covenant, Chicago, sharply assails President Pritchett of the Foundation for his own theological views and for what is quite candidly affirmed to be his presumption in defining the theology of the churches. It was predicted in the early days of the Carnegie Foundation that orthodox Protestants would speedily open their eyes to the vicious consequences sure to result from the compliance of Christian colleges with the conditions of sharing in the fund imposed. Dr. Bryan relates the story of a dozen or more colleges in its relation with the Foundation, and sounds a note of alarm for the Christian religion if such money power is to govern in the education of young men who are to enter the Christian ministry and sit in pews of Christian churches. The Chicago pastor has a plan to counteract the influence of the Carnegie Fund. He proposes the raising by all Protestant bodies of a rival fund to the Carnegie for the pensioning of professors. And in urging united action to this end, Dr. Bryan makes an admission, which, if true, is a rather sorry comment on the loyalty to Christian principles on the part of the colleges he has in mind. "Many colleges now in the Carnegie Foundation parted from the Church with great reluctance," he writes. "Their attachment to the Church remains. The establishment of the Christian rather than the Carnegie Foundation might mark the glad day of their return."

The Austral Light, a monthly review published in Melbourne (Victoria), Australia, in its February issue of the current year contains an editorial reply to a correspondent, which might have been written for American Catholics. The correspondent had written to advocate political action on the part of Victorian Catholics to win State aid for Catholic schools. "Considering that we are well organized and well informed on the educational question," he wrote, "considering that Catholics do not want the secular system any more than they want the non-Catholic sectarian system, and considering that we are entitled to State aid in justice to our schools, why not go straight for it?" The wise and prudent answer made by the editor to this query may be thus summarized: It is well understood by all parties that the Catholics of this State, in submitting to the present education system, are submitting to force, that they do not acquiesce in the system, and that they protest against having to pay twice over for education. It is an unfortunate position that sectarian and secularist combine to prevent the Catholic body from obtaining justice, and that a combination of Catholic and secularist votes is necessary to defeat the designs of the sectarianist. We have to choose between a great injustice and a greater, and the practical difficulty in the way of the correspondent's suggestion lies in just this. We may be sure that when the time comes for an appeal, with a reasonable prospect of success, or even of usefulness, to the public and to Parliament, the opportunity will not be passed over, and in the meantime the education of public opinion is not being neglected. The defensive work against sectarianism is not altogether negative, for as the lesson becomes deeply impressed on the Protestant party that it cannot encompass religious education by its present unjust tactics, the more religious-minded and less fanatically anti-Catholic of its members may be led to consider the advisability of a policy of reciprocity with the Catholics. It is only along such lines that they can hope to succeed, and it is only along such lines that justice is likely to come our way.

From the secularist there is nothing to expect in the way of recognition of the educative work performed by our schools. In the meantime he stands between us and further injustice. Moreover, by his public contention that the introduction of the Bible into State schools involves, in strict justice, a State subsidy for Catholic schools, the secularist, without intending it, is fighting our battle. For he is suggesting to moderate men, who desire both religious training for the young and educational peace, the only means by which they can be secured. The present State policy suits none but pure secularists; it is unfortunately due to sectarian bigotry that the establishment of a system just to Protestant, Catholic and secularist is prevented. The editorial closes with a paragraph that deserves to be quoted:

"It is rather pessimistic to prophesy that the State will always be secularist in education, and forever perpetrator of a colossal injustice against its Catholic citizens. The immediate prospect of relief from burdens unjustly borne is not bright, but we are not without hope that sounder principles of education and a clearer conscience will yet prevail among non-Catholic citizens of the State. The State must abandon the secular system, or the secular system will, in the long run, destroy the State."

The New York University will hold to the Group System in its arrangement of courses of study. Students registering for work will not be permitted complete freedom of choice in the matter of class subjects, but will be restricted to an election from certain determined groups of subjects fixed by the Committee on Studies. This body is made up of professors named by the University faculty. The System, introduced into the University in 1894, was referred, some months ago, to a special committee of the faculty, who were told to report on changes they might deem necessary. It may be that some who suggested the reference desired a wider measure of electivism in the school's methods. If so, the report just handed in will scarcely prove gratifying.

The committee declared that no substantial changes are needed in the University's course of studies; they recommend merely some slight revision of the groupings of subjects suggested by the experience of professors during the years the present course has been in use. Its members have a word to say regarding the free play of electivism among students, and they say it quite frankly. They affirm that the complete freedom of choice in the matter of study subjects to be taken up by students, such as the well-known policy of Dr. Eliot seems to favor, is based upon pedagogically false principles.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

BABYLON AND CHRISTIANITY.

An instructive paper on Christ and the Critics, by the Rev. C. C. Martindale, S.J., appears in the Liverpool Catholic Times and Catholic Opinion of March 31. We give here only one extract, but the whole essay is well worthy of perusal. "Many will remember," says Father Martindale, "the bomb which Professor Friedrich Delitzsch exploded on January 13, 1902, at Berlin, when, in his famous lecture, 'Babel und Bibel, Babylon and the Bible,' he tried to prove that Old Testament religion was, in gross and in detail, no more than watered-down Babylonian religion." A more recent lecture of Delitzsch, at Königsberg, "significantly entitled, no longer Babylon and the Bible, but Babylon and Christendom," is subjected to Father Martindale's keen criticism and disposed of in the following manner:

"Briefly, what does Dr. Delitzsch contend? That when Christianity was born, the whole world into which it came was soaked with Babylonian myth, tradition, science, art. The Church, always ready to welcome pagan customs and ideas [St. Paul, for instance!], borrowed forthwith from Babylon, and overlaid the pure teaching of Christ (for Delitzsch at least admits that Christ really lived) with an armor of Assyrian oddities. But, argues he, the Church is doubly Babylonianized, for Christ's teaching itself was Jewish, and therefore already Babylonian. From the time they emigrated from Babylonia, the Hebrews are to have carried thence the myths of Creation and of Flood; the story of the Fall, and the notion of Death as penalty for sin; of the serpent as Adversary of God; of angel and of demon; of paradise and of hell. Their captivity in Babylon is to have emphasized all this; and the Babylonian settlers transplanted into Samaria are to have developed it, so that it is no wonder that such notions 'play so prominent a part' in the preaching of the Prophet of Nazareth and of His disciples.

"Now this theory of 'Panbabylonianism,' of seeing Babylon everywhere, is, in parenthesis, a wild theory, unshared by most reputable scholars, denied by facts, and doomed to essential modification at the hands of its creators themselves, and to speedy extinction in its present form. When the foundation is worthless, what is built upon it will not stand. Even Delitzsch has to confess that the Hebrews 'translated' the Babylonian myths into monotheistic shape—'merely monotheized' them, he argues. Mercy! But that is a gigantic step already, even allowing the original contention, that the Hebrews had 'borrowed' myths at all! It is a step no other nation of antiquity had taken, or ever was to take. It was the very step Babylonia herself could never succeed in taking. Here already is the essential feature of Israel's religion, not borrowed from Babylonia. That the Assyrians had their story of a Flood, and so had the Hebrews, that does not prove that the Flood never happened! Because the Berliner Tageblatt contains a long report of Professor Delitzsch's lecture, and I, as a matter of fact, have drawn my information thence and also from other sources, that does not prove that Professor Delitzsch never lectured at all! Yet such would seem the argument. As for the Babylonian Fall story, its divergencies from the Hebrew are certain, its similarities conjectural. Its hero is called 'Adapa': only a false etymology connects this name with 'Adam.' He was not the first man; he committed no sin, and in consequence could not die because of one; he was tricked by one god into not eating some food another god offered him; the poem ends with his glorification. Add to this one defaced cylinder in the British Museum. On it are seen two fully clothed personages, probably gods (nothing suggests that one is a woman), seated under a tree. Behind one of them is a zigzag device which quite possibly is not a serpent, and, if it is, probably their protector. And in this the 'origin' of the sublime narrative in Genesis is sought! And so for the rest. Finally, if one thing is more certain than another, it is that the Jews came back from their captivity more rigidly monotheist than ever, and that with the partly paganized Samaritans they refused all association. No: Christ preached no diluted Babylonian mythology. 'What was false in 1902, when it was labelled "Babylon and Bible,"' pithily remarks the Deutsche Israelitische Zeitung, 'does not become true in 1911 because it is ticketed "Babylon and Christ."'"

SCIENCE

PHOTOGRAPHING STARS NEAR THE MOON.

The moon's light, especially when at the full, is so bright that it dazzles the eye and fogs the photographic plate, when one attempts to see or photograph stars in its neighborhood. It is so intense and so much diffused in the air that the photography of faint objects anywhere in the sky, as well as the study of their spectra and their light variation, become impossible when the moon is full. It is therefore with much interest that astronomers will watch the experiments in this line that King is conducting at Harvard, as we read in The Observatory for February. He thinks that the fogging of the plates is chiefly due to the moonlight that falls on the object glass. To obviate this he suspends a disk of the exact size of the glass at some distance in front of it so that its shadow will fall on the glass and keep the moonlight out of the telescope. He was thus enabled to photograph stars very close to the moon, and without any signs of fog on the plate. The disk was then removed and an exposure of a fraction of a second made on the moon. The plate then showed the moon in the midst of many stars.

The method is not yet perfected, but it holds out great promises, since it will enable astronomers to measure the moon's position with the same accuracy as that of a star, and thus eliminate all the troublesome errors due to irradiation, semidiameter, phase and personal equation.

THE SIMULTANEITY OF MAGNETIC STORMS.

A fierce controversy, which we have already referred to several times in AMERICA, IV, 13, 20, 22, is waging in Nature as to whether magnetic storms occur simultaneously all over the earth, or require several minutes to make the circuit of the globe. Dr. Bauer, who had advanced the latter theory, has made another reply to Krogness on March 2. On March 16 he was attacked by Chree. Birkeland says, on the same date, that he is on his way with Krogness to Khartoum, and intends to make observations on the point in dispute with very sensitive apparatus in cooperation with Scandinavian observers.

OFFICIAL TIME IN FRANCE.

France has at last fallen into line with the international method of reckoning time. As we all well know in the United States, we have several standard times, called Eastern, Central, Mountain and Pacific, being respectively 5, 6, 7 and 8 hours slow of Greenwich, the minutes and seconds being everywhere the same. This system is an eminently practical one for our railroads, its only inconvenience being in those cities where two times meet.

Twenty-five nations have conformed to this system since 1884. While Russia, Portugal and Ireland are still outside it, France was very conspicuous in its refusal to adopt it. However, it also has finally yielded, and on midnight of March 10 its clocks were set back 9 minutes and 21 seconds, so that henceforth, instead of Paris, Greenwich time is now the standard.

* * *

When is a star defined to be a double star? is the question T. Lewis asks in the March Observatory. He says that many observers will not measure certain doubles, either because they are too bright, or because they are farther apart than the arbitrary distance they have themselves assigned. He then gives several instances of how some pairs have closed up and some have separated, and shows that if the arbitrary limit system were in force, the first would not have been observed in the past, and the second should be dropped for the future. It is difficult, of course, to know what to do in these cases, because stars beyond the range of the micrometer cannot be measured with precision, and stars that are separating very much may happen to have been only accidentally in the same line of sight; that is, they may be only optically and not physically double. The problem seems to be insoluble, and the writer himself offers no solution.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

Hereafter the midnight burglar will have to ply his handicraft in darkness or find himself tight within the clutches of the law. An alarm, dependent upon the extreme sensitiveness of the selenium cell to light, as devised by Mr. E. Dafal, a French engineer, has made this imperative. The apparatus consists of two essential parts, a transmitter and receiver joined by an electric wire. The former is a selenium cell, of cylindrical pattern, the latter a specially-wound magnetic relay for actuating the alarm. The alarm itself is of the galvanometer type, the coil of which swings through an angle of 90°, and which is adjusted in the magnetic field by a milled knob. The circuit is closed through the coil and a horizontal contact-piece of platinum inserted perpendicularly between the two terminals. The most commendable feature of this new device is that once actuated, no amount of tampering either with the transmitter or the line can cause the alarm to stop. The alarm may also be installed for signaling incipient fires.

* * *

The latest quotation for radium is $2,-100,000 per ounce against $3,000,000 a year ago. This depreciation is the more striking in lieu of the increasing demand for the rare earth, and is attributable to the large number of mines of radio-active minerals that have been rendered workable during the past year. London and Paris banks are renting out this precious agent at the rate of $200 per 100 milligrams per year.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

PERSONAL

We learn through the London Tablet that the little Catholic colony in Kingston has received an accession by the arrival of the newly appointed Chief Justice of Jamaica, the Hon. Anthony Michael Coll, who had previously held the office of Attorney-General of Gibraltar.

Miss Ellen Haggerty, nearly ninety years old, died at her home in Brooklyn on March 26. For many years she was employed in a Brooklyn department store as a hat trimmer, and no one suspected until her will was filed in the Surrogate's office on April 13 that she had been garnering her little savings. The aged toiler left nearly $50,000 to charities. Under the will St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn, gets $12,000, St. Michael's Monastery, Hoboken, $2,000, the bishoprics of Louisville, Cheyenne and Natchez $1,000 each, and the bishop of Fargo $500. Bishop McDonnell of Brooklyn is bequeathed $1,000 for the education of boys for the priesthood, and the Marquette League $1,000 for the erection of a new chapel. The remaining bequests, ranging from $1,000 to $500, are to cousins and Brooklyn charitable organizations.

SOCIOLOGY

Cold water and fresh air are in high favor as protectors of health, and are going, it is believed, to conquer tuberculosis. Sir Almroth Wright, a very distinguished English physician, is of the contrary opinion. Too much washing, he says, destroys the protective outer skin. A laborer can contract all sorts of diseases, but he will catch none of them through a microbe penetrating his horny hand. One horny from head to foot, like a tortoise, would be the ideal microbe-proof man. As for the fresh air doctrine, he asks: why is it applied to tuberculosis only? If he came to America, where we are nothing if not thorough, even in our fads, he would find it applied more extensively than he thinks. Anyhow, he finds it a dreadful superstition.

"Who will decide when doctors disagree?" One of life's miseries is that often the same house holds violent partisans of contrary theories, the devotee of fresh air, no matter how cold, and the one who thinks it to be, like Achilles' wrath, the source of countless woes. For the happiness of the fresh-air school, we must say that Sir Almroth is an out-and-out microbist. But perhaps we shall find that in this, as in so many other things, "Virtus est medium vitiorum et utrimque reductum."

ECONOMICS

Cheap labor is an important matter, especially in the West. There are certain things a white man will not do, and it is necessary that these things should be done cheaply. One cannot pay three dollars a day for picking strawberries, nor without cheap labor the transcontinental roads could not have been built. White men cannot work in a sugar plantation, and so Asiatic labor is absolutely necessary in the Hawaiian Islands. The Alaskan fish packers are finding difficulty in the matter of labor. Business is increasing, and the supply of workmen is even diminishing. These have been obtained hitherto from the natives who come to the canneries during the season, and from the Chinese and Japanese of San Francisco. But the immigration laws are lessening the number of the latter; and so the packing companies are looking to Hawaii. A steamer left San Francisco to engage a thousand plantation hands for the canning season.

We hear that the Spinners' Association of Manchester, England, have bought 32,000 acres of land at Rosedale, Mississippi, where they propose to grow long staple cotton, using the most scientific methods of cultivation. They expect to produce it at 7 cents a pound, and ask why they should pay 15 cents to support the gambling in the cotton exchange. Theoretically the plan is excellent; we are doubtful as to how it will work out in practice. The division of functions seems to be a natural law of trade; probably because to do one thing well is all that one man can do. However, time will show how the undertaking will fare.

The Copper River and Northwestern Railway has been completed from Cordova, Alaska, to Kenneicott, where the Bonanza Copper mountain is situated. The road is 197 miles long and cost 20 million dollars, about $100,000 a mile. The Alaska Central Railway, beginning at Seward, about 150 miles west of Cordova, across Prince William Sound, is in course of construction, and will tap the rich coal fields of the Natanuska River, about a hundred miles to the north.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The thirty-seventh presentation of Bibles to the successive graduates of the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland, took place on Sunday, April 9. One hundred and fifty-three, we are informed, accepted a copy of the Revised Version, five, presumably Catholics, copies of the Douay version. The presentation was made on behalf of the American Seaman's Friend Society. It appears that when the original gift of a fund was made thirty-seven years ago, the classes were much smaller than they are now and the interest from the fund easily covered the cost of the books. The society is now undergoing a strain to give Bibles to all, and an effort is being made to increase the fund.

Bishop Shaw, of San Antonio, has invited the Franciscans to return to his diocese, and it is expected that early in June a community of the Friars will reoccupy the old Mission of the Immaculate Conception, which was founded in 1731.

The West Presbyterian Church, Toronto, was purchased two weeks ago for the use of a Polish Catholic congregation, the purchase money, $28,000, being paid by one generous Catholic residing in Toronto.

That city now has, in addition to the English speaking churches, congregations of French, Syrian, Italian, Polish and Ruthenian Catholics. A Lenten mission has also developed about 500 Ruthenians in Ottawa and 1,500 in Montreal. In the latter city Archbishop Bruchesi, who gave the solemn Benediction at the close of the mission, declared that he would get these Catholics a priest of their own race as soon as possible.

On Sunday afternoon, April 23, the Sixty-ninth regiment, as part of its celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the departure of the organization for the civil war, will attend solemn pontifical Vespers at 4 o'clock in St. Patrick's Cathedral. Archbishop Farley will preside.

Archbishop Stagni, the new Apostolic delegate to Canada, has already made a most favorable impression on the Catholics of the Dominion. Bishop Fallon is quoted as saying that "Mgr. Stagni is a very lovable prelate, and speaks English with greater ease and fluency than any other Delegate thus far sent out."

OBITUARY

The Rev. James Doonan, former President of Georgetown University, passed away on April 12. Ten years ago he had a paralytic stroke, from which he never fully recovered. However, he was able until recently to say Mass and to give retreats to religious communities as well as to fulfil the duties of Chaplain of the University, over which he had presided from 1882 to 1888. His prominence as an educator brought him into contact with men of note in various walks of life and enabled him to wield a wide influence in many directions. He was well known to the priests and religious in the Eastern dioceses through his retreats, in which important work he was actively engaged for many years.

A man of rare gifts and accomplishments, Father Doonan endeared himself to his brethren in religion and to hosts of friends by an exceptional kindness of manner. He recognized no distinction of class, and was as accessible to the poor as to the rich, to the simple as to the exalted and the learned. His declining years were spent in comparative rest and seclusion at the College where he had received his early training, and where from a member of the staff in the later University he became President, and in that office attained distinction in a long line of distinguished men. At the time of his death Father Doonan was in his seventieth year. He celebrated his golden jubilee as a Jesuit in 1907.

The Rev. Patrick J. McGinney, S.J., well known in New England and the Middle Atlantic States, died at St. Agnes' Hospital, Baltimore, on April 6. For several years he was a member of the missionary band of the Maryland-New York Province, and had preached in nearly all the large cities of the Eastern States. He was born in Providence, October 24, 1850, was educated at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., and was ordained by Cardinal Gibbons at Woodstock, Md., in 1880.

The Rev. John J. Rodock, S.J., for the past nine years an active missionary in the Island of Jamaica, died recently at Kingston. Father Rodock entered the novitiate of the society of Jesus at Frederick, Maryland, on August 8, 1874, in his nineteenth year. His work in the missionary field was most fruitful, his winning personality making him a great favorite, especially with children. He was the first of the American missionaries to Jamaica to end his meritorious life in the midst of his labors.

The Rev. John Price, pastor of St. James' Church, Pittsburg, Penn., died on April 11, in his fifty-ninth year. He was a native of New York and was ordained priest in 1877, after the usual course of studies at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore. For the past seven years he conducted the "Questions Answered" Department in the Pittsburg Observer, and the useful information on religious subjects he there supplied was copied into many of the Catholic papers not only in the United States, but all over the English speaking world. His success as a zealous pastor was equally notable.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The admirable letter of M. J. Riordan, of Flagstaff, Arizona, in this week's AMERICA, gives some very practical information, for those who will take the trouble to learn, concerning the real status of the Young Men's Christian Association. Here in Brooklyn we have a very aggressive branch of the organization which, just at present, is engaged, with the usual methods, in an effort to extend its operations. In the course of these efforts a correspondent wrote to one of the local papers saying that the Young Men's Christian Association should omit the word Christian, saying further that it is a big club devoted to gymnastics and athletic sports, baseball playing, etc.

In answer to this an official replied, and gave this writer some important facts of the history of the Y. M. C. A. organization, the following extracts from which are pertinent:—

"The Y. M. C. A. was founded by Sir George Williams in London, England, in 1844. It was originally a Bible class for drapers' assistants and others who had come to London from the provinces, and was intended to be a home for strangers in the metropolis.

"Naturally enough the Y. M. C. A., although it had its inception in a Bible class, rapidly developed numerous agencies or departments which have proved a great boon to young men: in the same ratio as the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement, starting as a Bible class to reach the 'unchurched,' has various agencies or branches in connection with it, such as tontine societies, sick benefits, book clubs, etc.

"A statement issued in the report of the jubilee convention in Boston, 1901, is not without significance, thus:

"The distinctly religious character of the movement more than anything else has contributed to its permanence."

"If not trespassing unduly on your valuable space would like to enumerate some of the agencies of the Y. M. C. A.

"Religious—Devotional meetings, workers' prayer unions, gospel addresses, meetings for men only, Bible classes, cottage meetings, tract distribution, etc.

"Outside Missionary Effort—Open-air preaching, service, missions to working-men, railway men, soldiers and sailors, services in mission halls, Sunday schools, hospital, workhouse, prison and lodging house visitation, tract distribution at theatres, mission halls, saloons and race meetings, factory and warehouse meetings, tent missions, etc.

"Importance of the Association—International jubilee of the Y. M. C. A. celebrated in London, 1894; the Corporation of the City of London conferred upon its founder, Sir George Williams, the freedom of the city.

"Archbishop of Canterbury preached specially upon the occasion in the Westminster Abbey.

"Bishop of Ripon preached at great thanksgiving service in St. Paul's Cathedral.

"The Y. M. C. A. had its inception in America at Cleveland in 1872."

These official facts, added to what was printed in AMERICA of April 8, make excellent arguments to meet the "non-sectarian" twaddle about the Y. M. C. A., so frequently offered when there is objection from Catholics to the encouragement of the Association among others than the "members of the Evangelical churches," to which its constitution limits its membership.

BEDFORD AVENUE.

Brooklyn, April 11.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 3

(Price 10 Cents)

APRIL 29, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 107

CHRONICLE

House Approves Reciprocity—Federal Income Tax Nearer—Sixty-Ninth Regiment Celebration—French Heroes Honored—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Italy—Spain—Portugal—France—Germany—Austria—Hungary49-52

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Non-Catholic Americans and Religion—The National Charity Conference—A Work of Providence53-57

IN MISSION FIELDS

Condition of the Church in the Chinese Empire 57-58

CORRESPONDENCE

Spanish Liberalism, Illiteracy and the Church—Famine in Central China—"The Crimes of a Convent"—Guatemala To-day58-61

EDITORIAL

Important Official Decrees—Peace—St. John the Divine—Freethought Federation—Adios, Diaz. 62-65

LITERATURE

The Hill o' Dreams and Other Verses—Later Lyrics—The Doorkeeper and Other Poems—Heart Songs—The Unfading Light—The King's Bell and Other Verses—Little Rhymes for Little Folks—Adventure—A Romance of Old Jerusalem—Marriage and Parenthood—Love and Marriage—The Story of the Mountain—Her Journey's End—Geschichte der Verehrung Marias im XVI und XVII Jahrhundert—"Lives of the Friar Saints"—Books Received.....66-69

EDUCATION

Mr. Balfour on Education—Statistics of Holy Cross College69-70

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Catholic Church and the Bible Centenary 70-71

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The Next Eucharistic Congress—Knights of Columbus in Massachusetts—The Gibbons Memorial Hall—Reunion of Maynooth Union—Eleventh National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies—Annual National Conference St. Vincent de Paul Society—A Generous Catholic Congregation.....71-72

SOCIOLOGY

The Gaelic League Delegates—What "Bargains" in Shirt Waists Mean—The Propagation of Rationalism in Japan.....72

OBITUARY

Rev. Louis A. Campbell—Right Hon Sir Elzéar Taschereau—Mother Mary Agnes—Rev. Edmund Buckler, O.P.....72

CHRONICLE

House Approves Reciprocity.—The Canadian Reciprocity bill, to secure the passage of which Congress was called in special session, passed the House by a vote of 265 to 89. Ten Democrats and seventy-eight Republicans voted in the negative. The bill was adopted with no amendments and in almost the same form in which it passed the House in the last session of the preceding Congress. More than thirty amendments were offered by Republican members when the reading of the bill by sections was taken up. Each amendment was defeated, generally on a viva voce vote, the practically solid Democracy and half of the Republican membership sweeping everything before it. House leaders on both sides of the chamber had warned the body that the President's reciprocity agreement must stand or fall as introduced, and that any change would nullify the work of the negotiators. The amendments proposed were designed chiefly to put various articles on the free list, the opponents of the measure apparently hoping thus to defeat it and also to put the Democrats in an embarrassing position by moving to insert various articles from the Democratic "free list bill," which is to be taken up this week. Representative Lenroot, of Wisconsin, finally moved to append the entire Democratic "free list bill," but this plan, too, was overwhelmingly defeated.

Federal Income Tax Nearer.—The adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States embodying a federal income tax seems likely in the immediate future. By a vote of 35 to 16 the Senate of New York passed a resolution indorsing the measure. It was ratified also in the Massachusetts House of Representatives by a vote of 130 to 69. Arkansas is now added to the States voting in the affirmative, as the previous endorsement of the House has now been ratified by the State Senate. The Florida House of Representatives adopted the proposed amendment by a vote of 61 to 4. To date the amendment has been approved by the legislatures of thirty states, and only five more are needed to make the requisite three-fourths of the forty-six states. The names of the States which have voted in favor of the amendment and of those that have voted against it are as follows: Affirmative—Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, Wisconsin. Negative—Louisiana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, West Virginia.

Sixty-ninth Regiment Celebration.—The Sixty-ninth Regiment of New York began on Sunday, April 23, the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the regiment's departure for the Civil War. There was a commemorative service in St. Patrick's Cathedral in the afternoon, at which Archbishop Farley presided, and the Rev. Matthew Gleason, chaplain in the United States Navy, delivered the sermon. Only twenty of the fourteen hundred in the regiment who answered Lincoln's first call for volunteers still survive, and these honored veterans accompanied the column to the cathedral on Sunday. An added touch of sentiment was found in the fact that when the Sixty-ninth assembled fifty years ago to start for the seat of war it was Archbishop Hughes who pronounced the benediction on the men who assembled in and about old St. Patrick's. On Monday night there was a review at the armory, at which the veteran corps acted as reviewing officers. The Sixty-ninth participated in many of the great battles of the Civil War, preserving its organization as the first regiment in the Irish Brigade, which was under the command of General Thomas Francis Meagher.

French Heroes Honored.—A granite shaft, erected by the general Society of the Sons of the Revolution to the memory of the French soldiers and sailors who, in 1781, laid down their lives in the cause of American independence, was unveiled at Annapolis, Md., on April 18. President Taft and Ambassador Jusserand both made formal addresses. Representatives of the Sons of the Revolution from all parts of the country, the Society of the Cincinnati, the Maryland Historical Society and the Daughters of the American Revolution, were in attendance. Among the guests were Miss Amélie de Pau Fowler, a descendant of the Count de Grasse, and the Count de Chambrun, attaché of the French embassy and a descendant of the Marquis de Lafayette. The monument memorializes in particular those French troops under Lafayette and Rochambeau, who were encamped at Annapolis, and by their presence, in March, 1781, prevented the capture and sacking of that city. A number of French soldiers and sailors died from their wounds or from disease, and were buried on the site of the present monument.

Mexico.—Minister of Foreign Relations de la Barra, in an address to the Mexican Congress, declared that the mobilized American troops on the border were a constant menace to Mexico, for if at any moment the Washington authorities became dissatisfied with the turn of affairs they could order an invasion. He thus implied that the dissatisfaction might be unreasonable and founded on a mere pretext. —A Mexican traveler has commented severely on the shabby and outlandish appearance of the Mexican regulars. Cavalrymen are being recruited, but there seems to be no great effort to add to other branches of the service. The apathy of the government in enlisting troops is one of the most significant features of the revolution. —Two young American filibusters, Blatt and Converse, who were in jail at Ciudad Juarez, have been released as an act of grace by President Diaz. There was some doubt whether they were on Mexican territory when seized and whether they had not been conveyed as prisoners across American territory on their way to jail. The Chamizal dispute, which is still under discussion, gave rise to the uncertainty. —The students of the government agricultural, medical and mining schools in the capital went on a strike and refused to attend the lectures. The first complained of their building; the second, of their professors, and the third chimed in through sympathy. They gathered in threatening groups on the streets and were dispersed by the troops, some students being slightly injured. These same students made a patriotic demonstration when it was supposed that a Mexican citizen had been lynched in Texas; this counter demonstration points to a great change in their attitude towards their own government in its present difficulties. —The Maderist attack on Ciudad Juarez was postponed while peace terms were being considered. Had it occurred, fatalities in El Paso, Texas, from stray bullets might have started a riotous demonstration against Mexico that the United States troops stationed there might not have been able to control without much bloodshed. It is hoped that Madero has received assurances that will soon restore peace in Mexico.

Canada.—Sears, the master of the Iroquois, lost off Vancouver, has been indicted for manslaughter. It appears that the vessel's decks were encumbered with freight and that nothing had been put in the hold. Moreover, it is said that Sears left the ship, abandoning his passengers to their fate. —For some time there has been a dispute between Manitoba and the Federal Government regarding the province's boundaries. The latter proposes to give the former 6,000,000 acres of land and a yearly subsidy of $300,000 to settle it. —The Harbor Commissioners of Montreal have contracted with Vickers Sons and Maxim for a floating dry dock of the first-class, with a lifting capacity of 25,000 tons. It is to cost $3,000,000, on which the Dominion Government guarantees 3½ per cent. for 35 years. The Harbor Commissioners give 30 acres of reclaimed land. The contract for the Quebec bridge has been let to the St. Lawrence Bridge Co., composed of stockholders of the Dominion Bridge Co. and the Canadian Bridge Co., for $8,650,000. —A parliamentary paper shows that Canadian railways own or control 6,755 miles of line in the United States and American railways, 1,473 miles in Canada. —The Quebec courts having decreed the nullity of a marriage of Catholics before a Protestant minister, according to Article 127 of the Code, which recognizes the marriage regulations of all denominations, Protestants, as usual, are busying themselves in this matter exclusively Catholic, and the Protestant Bishop Farthing preached a violent sermon calling for an appeal to the Privy Council. The lawyers, therefore, got to work next day and looked for the aggrieved party or parties, in whose behalf they might appeal. To their chagrin and the mortification of the Bishop, who seems to have spoken before he was sure of his facts, they found that both parties were satisfied with their condition under the law; and so the appeal fizzled out.

Great Britain.—Four by-elections are about to take place in Liberal constituencies and one for a Unionist seat. The results will be watched with great interest as indicating the present feeling of the nation regarding the Government.—The decision of Justices Ridley and Channell in the Exeter election case has irritated the Liberals considerably. An attempt to override it in Parliament failed, since the Speaker decided that the House should not interfere. Mr. Justice Channell followed the decisions of his brother judge, but declared that he had not his confidence that they were right. On the other hand he did not see that they were wrong.—Mr. Athelstan Riley's treasure trove amounts to no more than a dozen guineas or so. Another sensational find, reported at the same time from the Norfolk coast, has been reduced to similar insignificance.—Winston Churchill brought suit for libel lately against a Unionist campaign speaker, who had repeated the rumor, often circulated, that Churchill had shown cowardice during the South African War, and had broken his parole. The action was undefended, and, as the plaintiff sought no damages, it was settled by an acknowledgment of the baselessness of the charge.—The plague in India still increases in the United Provinces. It may interfere with the royal visit and the Coronation Durbar next December.—The battleship Monarch has just been launched in two days less than a year from the laying of the keel. As the boilers, funnels, a large part of the auxiliary machinery were in place, as well as much of the armor, the builders have outdone all previous feats in the way of quick building. Not so long ago such a vessel would have required three or four years to build.—The direct line to Jamaica is to be restored. The colony abandons reduction of duty on foodstuffs to provide its share of the subsidy. Since the taking off of other direct steamers the banana trade with England has been interrupted almost entirely.

Ireland.—An effort is being made to have the Customs and Excise under the control of the proposed Irish Parliament and not, as under the Home Rule bills of 1886 and 1893, "imposed and levied by the Imperial Parliament only." Out of a total revenue in 1908-'09 of $46,250,000, the Customs and Excise Duties, nearly altogether indirect taxes, amounted to $28,105,000, or about 70 per cent. of the whole, so that if these are retained by the British government, Ireland would have no control over seven-tenths of its own revenue. Mr. Lough, M. P., who is supposed to know the mind of the Government, declared recently there could be no peace or progress in Ireland without financial autonomy. The Actuarial Committee would, he believed, in settling her financial problems, have regard to her present poverty and the great financial wrongs inflicted on her in the past.—Emigration in 1910 reached 32,457, an increase over the previous year of 3,693, and equivalent to 7.4 per 1,000 of the population. Nearly 90 per cent. were between the ages of 15 and 35. The largest number was from Ulster, 12,271, and the smallest from Leinster, 4,258. The total emigration from Ireland since 1851 was 4,187,433. The highest for any one year was 190,322, in 1851, and the lowest 23,295, in 1908.—Mr. Birrell stated in the House of Commons that $36,000,000 had been advanced under the Land Purchase acts during the year, and over $160,000,000 since 1907. Some four hundred millions were advanced from 1903 to 1907.—Mr. Asquith gave no information and promised none to the member who wanted to know whether Mr. Bryce had joined the Ancient Order of Hibernians. Mr. Bryce being a Protestant, is ineligible to the A. O. H., but being an Irishman is qualified for membership in the Hibernian Society of Baltimore, in which men of any denomination who are Irish by blood or birth are eligible.—The department of Industrial Development has sent a Commission to Ireland to foster the tobacco industry which, in a limited area, has prospered beyond expectation.

Italy.—The man who attempted murder in St. Peter's, when interrogated about his motive, simply replied that he was an anti-clerical. He wanted to kill the Pope, but that not being possible, he fired at the first priest he saw. To do away with the bad impression in the public mind, the authorities are giving out that the man is crazy.—On April 20, Prince Arthur, of Connaught, arrived at Rome, as the representative of King George and the British people at the Italian Jubilee. A letter from the King congratulated Victor Emmanuel on the attainment of Italian Unity, and expressed the friendship of the British nation for the royal house and people of Italy.—It is proposed to have the Peace Congress meet next autumn in Rome. Against this, Count Michel Tyszkiewicz, the President of the Society of the Friends of Peace of Kiew, protests. He bases his action on the fact that it will be insulting to Catholics to make the meeting an appendage to the Italian festivities, and would be ridiculous to assemble in a city that has been seized so recently by an armed force.—The farcical trial of the Camorristi still continues to shock the world, and meantime a murderous vendetta, in which several people were killed, one of them in a church, is raging in the hamlet of Senerchia.—At the Exposition in Rome, a fire broke out on the summit of Mount Mario, where the Ethnographical Section was making its display. The flames were communicated to the adjoining woods.

Spain.—Some uneasiness has been caused in government circles by the news that the secret treaty between Spain and France on the Morocco question has been stolen from the French archives.—The disorders in Morocco and the possible need of dispatching Spanish troops thither at an early date arouse gloomy forebodings about Spain's immediate future.—The Cortes have been prorogued until May 8, when President Canalejas will present his projected associations law for consideration and adoption, or rejection.

Portugal.—Since the proclamation of the republic the public debt has increased by four million dollars.—The Minister of Justice, Affonso Costa, in addressing the Grand Orient of Portugal, regretted that all people did not appreciate the justice with which the Braga administration was acting, and declared that the provisional government was endeavoring to establish the principles of Freemasonry; he said that its action was not against religion, but against the Catholic Church, and was of the opinion that after the lapse of three generations Catholicism would cease to exist in Portugal.—The administration has already published nearly two hundred decrees with the force of laws. One of the most important is that determining the qualifications for registering and voting at the approaching election of members of the Constitutional Convention. Voters must be twenty-one years of age; the conditions for enjoying the suffrage are that they shall know how to read and write, or shall be heads of families. Among the disfranchised are all Portuguese by naturalization only; spendthrifts under guardianship; defendants in a criminal case; convicts and paupers, and those actually with the colors. A petition for extending the suffrage to women was received and taken under consideration. The judges of election and the members of the returning boards will be named by the administration, which is confident of being sustained at the polls. With such precautions, its confidence seems well placed.—The decree of separation between Church and State was published on April 21. The administration expects to obtain $30,000,000 by the seizure of Church property. The French liquidation scandals are too recent to warrant such an assertion. Though details have not appeared, it is said that the Portuguese bishops, with the exception of the Bishop of Oporto, who has already been deposed and dispossessed, will receive life pensions.

France.—Anarchy reigns in Morocco, and the French Government proposes to send four more battalions to reinforce the troops in Fez. The rebels are surrounding the capital. The Sultan's army, in command of Captain Bremond, is attempting to reach Fez; but on April 12 he telegraphed to Paris for more money and ammunition. Spain is planning to send troops. There are reports in France that the French and Spaniards are not in accord.—The census of Paris makes known to the world that the great city has 2,884,986 inhabitants, a growth of 124,225 since 1906. It is thus the third largest city in the world.—The Parliament gave no manifestation of sympathy for the Italian Jubilee, and the reason alleged was fear of a Catholic manifestation. The French Ambassador at Rome was consulted, and he advised the Government not to bring up the question unless they were sure of a unanimous vote.—On April 22, there was an unconfirmed rumor of the capture of Fez by the rebels.

Germany.—Emperor William expressed his gratification upon receiving word in Corfu, where he is at present resting, of the intended visit of an American fleet to German waters. He approved, too, of a tentative program for the reception and entertainment of the fleet submitted to him. Among others these details of the program are mentioned. His Majesty expects to arrive at Kiel on the Hohenzollern, the royal yacht, on June 21. During the festivities of the Kiel week a gala dinner will be given on the yacht in honor of the Americans, a formal banquet will be spread in the rooms of the Imperial Yacht Club, at which, as well as at the splendid ball in the Marine Academy, the Americans will be specially distinguished guests. Following the receipt of the Emperor's cordial note regarding the projected visit, the Foreign Office in Berlin addressed to the United States Embassy a formal note of welcome to the fleet, whose visit to Kiel during the last week of June the acting Ambassador has already announced. It is planned to have a squadron of German battleships sail from Wilhelmshaven to Kiel to meet the American fleet. This latter will be made up of the battleships Louisiana, Kansas, New Hampshire and South Carolina.—The efforts of prominent citizens of German Poland to be permitted to remove the remains of Cardinal Count Ledochowski from Rome and to inter them honorably in the princely churchman's native land have finally been approved by Emperor William. It will be remembered that the Cardinal died July 22, 1902, in Rome, whither he had gone to reside in 1876 after two years imprisonment to which the Prussian Government had condemned him, because of his energetic resistance to the anti-Catholic May laws. In mid-April 1874, the judges of the Court sitting in ecclesiastical cases in Gnesen-Posen had presumed to expel him from his office as Archbishop of that city, and in protest against this action, as well as because of his distinguished merits as an Archbishop, Rome had named the prelate, still in prison, a Cardinal of the Roman Church.—The Catholic Bishops of Prussia announce in a common note to their people their purpose to hold a conference, at which all the prelates of the kingdom will be present, in Mayence during the coming August. The date of the conference coincides with that of the meeting of the Catholic Congress of Germany.

Austria-Hungary.—Announcement is made that Emperor Francis Joseph will journey to Budapest early in May to take up his residence there for some weeks. During his stay in the Hungarian capital he will receive King Peter of Servia. The visit of this latter sovereign will be accepted by all as an evidence that normal relations have been restored between the Empire and Servia.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Non-Catholic Americans and Religion

Like Chesterton in "Orthodoxy," I have made a great discovery in the province of the obvious. I am amazed that so many trained observers and hard thinkers have overlooked it, and that I stumbled on it, as a wayfarer, tripped up by some obstacle, falls upon a ledge of gold.

For many years back the non-Catholic religious press and the ministers of all denominations have bewailed the supposed decay of religion among men. They have accounted for the devotion of Catholic men, as the effect of superstition, priest-control or fear, but as far as the men of the Protestant world are concerned, they are all but hopeless. It is said that they do not go to church, do not pray and that religion has ceased to be a living force in their lives.

If you seek evidence of this contention among non-Catholic men, you will find it plentiful—at least it looks like evidence at first sight. You will find scores, even hundreds who casually remark: "No, I don't go to church. I consider one religion about as good as another." You will find many who never read religious books, who are unfamiliar with the Bible, except by hearsay. There is one statement in which nearly all these men will agree—that they are not religious.

My discovery is this: The majority of these men are religious, though they are far from thinking so. They do more hard thinking about religion than do churchgoers. They are more concerned about it than anything else in the world, except the work that gains them bread. Their main difficulty is that they are in a maze. Like Stephen Blackpool in "Hard Times," they say: "It's a great muddle."

They may be divided roughly into two classes: those who were brought up in the strict discipline of some sect, and those who have grown up without definite religious training. In the first case, they have plumbed the shallows of the sect, and disgusted, have tried to put religion out of their lives, and failed. In the second, they have absorbed almost unconsciously an undigested mass of errors and ideas partly true and partly false. The printed matter which they read presents all sorts of objections to Christianity as a true and practical religious system, but the thesis for Christianity has never been demonstrated to them adequately. Their creed is short; they believe there is a Supreme Being.

These men, I am speaking now of serious and upright men who try to do their duty, are unhappy. As they grow older and the vision of death rises, they become more unhappy. I find that most of them formulate a sort of practical code: to do what they think is right and let the future take care of itself. But this is a sorry solution of life's problem and no one knows this better than themselves. They are morbid on this topic, like a man who has committed a crime and feels he must confess it to someone. When they are alone with you they want to talk religion. It is the great riddle and they hope to stumble on the answer. When a man is sure about his Faith, it is the last thing in the world he wants to talk about. But when a man is blundering here and there in his search for the Truth, it is hard to keep him from talking about it.

The startling fact is, that these men, though they display great ignorance of doctrine and history, have thought long and deeply on religion as a personal problem. In spite of all appearance to the contrary, the one burning topic among non-Catholic Americans, besides politics, is religion.

These hard-headed, successful men of the world cannot be fooled by sensational and posing preachers. They know that snatching the fag end of the latest fad or crime and ringing the changes on it, is not preaching the Gospel. They sense the falsity of the whole performance and are sick of it. Occasionally they will warm to some evangelist who seems to believe what he says, but they know it is emotion and not demonstration, and no real aid to them.

Protestantism logically tends to absolute individualism in religion. That is one principal reason why Protestant men have ceased going to church. According to its tenets, a man may remain at home on Sunday and do more solid thinking about his soul than if he went to some meeting-house and listened to a minister trying to say something new. Non-Catholic Americans are too honest to go to church when they consider the whole service a sham.

But to conclude from this that they have ceased to take an interest in religion, that it does not influence their minds and consciences, that they are contented materialists, would be a great mistake. They have come to see that what has been presented to them as religion is a fraud, but they have nothing to take its place. They are looking for light, but are rather hopeless about finding it. So far from believing that non-attendance at meeting denotes a decay of religion among non-Catholic men, I am inclined to think just the contrary. It is like a forest fire that burns beneath the surface, or a river that drops into a chasm and becomes subterranean.

They are frankly disgusted with Christianity as it has been presented to them: its lack of authority, its emptiness, its unpracticalness, and yet they cannot get it out of their heads that somewhere there is real Christianity. They know almost nothing about the Church, and Catholics are proverbially loath to inform them. Indeed, it requires a Catholic who knows human nature very well, especially Protestant human nature, to give them any real information.

Indeed, there is a great field here for the right sort of missionaries. When you think of it, what a tribute it is to the Church and what magnificent humility it evinces that men of no specific religious denomination will sit down and tell a priest things they would not tell their own brothers. Yet it is no uncommon experience. I imagine every priest recalls many such instances. They are interested in religion, and almost boyish in their curiosity and honesty. They delight in talking with a priest who meets them half-way, and only God knows what grace may be given on such occasions.

It is a great pity that so many are practically insulated from opportunities to quicken the promptings of their better nature: that the Church sweeps on in her great work and can do so little for them. I know of no class of men in the world who have finer traits than hundreds of non-Catholic Americans I have met. They are tied down by wives, families and work. They are sick and tired of chanticleer parsons, and the sort of thing that goes for religion with their acquaintances, and the burden of life is heavy.

I feel that many, if they were free to do so and had the courage, would call on some priest of their acquaintance, some priest who had taken the trouble to be friendly and patient with them, and say: "See here, Father, I am sick of these imitation religions and am getting old. I don't know much about the Catholic Church, but I know enough to see that it is worth all the others put together. I want to be a Catholic." You may call this far-fetched, if you will, but I think the average priest who has seen much of non-Catholics will agree with me.

However, this is not the question. It is: Are non-Catholic Americans as a class irreligious? Tired of Protestantism? Yes. Sick of cant? Yes. A bit cowardly about profession? Yes. But irreligious? Not a bit of it. There is more real religion and respect for the Catholic Church in the non-Catholics of any state in the Union than people imagine.

C. W. COLLINS.

The National Charity Conference*

Those who make the retreat of St. Ignatius (and their number is becoming large, thanks to the work of the Laymen's Retreats), know that it begins invariably with the consideration of the end of man, the end of creatures, the rule for the use of these and the need of indifference to carry out that rule. This exercise is called the foundation, and no one ever dreams of omitting it. Outside the Church the case is different. We read of retreats in which nothing is said of the foundation, of sin the result of ignoring it, of hell the punishment of sin. Beautiful things are brought out about the consecrated life, the social mission of the clergyman, etc., but to little purpose, since the foundation has not been laid. One of the essential differences between the Catholic Church and its imitators is in their view of the foundation. To the Church it is a reality. Resting immovably upon the Apostolic foundation with Christ the chief cornerstone, it refers continually to it in all its undertakings. The imitators, for whom it is only a word, follow their own ideas making them the measure of their works.

Instinctively then, the first National Conference of Catholic Charities busied itself with foundations. Its organizers chose most wisely as the subject of the first formal address, "The Ideals of Catholic Charity," which was handled most excellently by Judge O'Doherty, of Louisville. He brought out the fundamental distinction between charity and philanthropy, showing the former to be supernatural, the putting into execution of the great commandment of the love of God and of our neighbor, with God as its final term. He reminded his hearers that Catholic charity has no notion of abolishing poverty and suffering. Its duty is to mitigate and relieve these as far as possible, and above all to sanctify them.

Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock of New York spoke on the "Developing of the Social Conscience." Recognizing that the working-classes are discontented, that they have legitimate grievances, and that their power to apply some remedy is growing daily, he asked what should be the attitude of Catholic members of society towards these facts? Quoting Hilaire Belloc's address at the English Catholic Congress, held a few weeks before, he stated that outside the Church the relief proposed is either the exaggerated paternalism of the Servile State, in which public authority, directly or by compelling the great capitalists to it, would provide for the workingman's every need, thus making capital more and more powerful and reducing labor to pupillage; or else Collectivism, which would put both capital and labor into the hands of the Socialistic State. Both methods are unchristian, since both cramp man's individual development and abridge his natural dignity. Then, stating the obvious fact that the Church has no special economic theory for to-day any more than it had for the past, he concludes that it proposes as the remedy of all our evils the everlasting principles of justice which give everyone his due, and as the practical means of applying them, the religion revealed by Christ. He confirmed his argument by the words of the Bishop of Northampton to the English Congress, who called attention to this fundamental principle, that the bond between Christian faith and Christian charity is essential, not accidental, and that if it be severed, charity perishes, and with it all hope of social regeneration.

Fathers A. P. Doyle, C.S.P., John T. McNicholas, O.P., and a Franciscan Father discussed in special papers the most important question of the relation between poverty, and the loss of faith and the neglect of its practice. They had collected data on the subject, and their conclusion was, as was to be anticipated, that in itself poverty is never the cause of either the one or the other, but that, on the contrary, under the growing burden of poverty, faith becomes stronger and stronger to bear it. On the other hand, it is too often the occasion of both, inasmuch as the poor are peculiarly exposed to proselytizing, to the vices of the streets, to the attraction of unchristian social theories and of cheap infidel and immoral literature, to the neglect of Mass, through lack of decent clothes and of money for the collection. Hence the need of protecting them against all these dechristianizing agencies, or, in other words, of promoting practically the Catholic life among them.

*First National Conference of Catholic Charities. Proceedings published by direction of the Executive Committee. Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.

While discussing "The Problem of Dependency," Mr. Robert Biggs, of Baltimore, touched the grave question of methods, comparing those of the St. Vincent de Paul Society with those of organized secular humanitarianism. No one can deny that the question deserves most serious consideration, and Mr. Biggs gave thoughtful suggestions which will help in its solution. The audience seemed to feel that he put Catholic methods in the worst light and secular methods in the best. Since, however, he was not a hostile critic, but was laying the foundation of an inquiry into how we can improve our own system, that is not to be counted altogether a fault, as the contrary way might lead us to be satisfied that there is nothing to amend. The question has been started. The fact that our charities are being organized as they have not been hitherto, and the institution of the Conference will bring its solution. The supernatural principles laid down in this, to be the guide of all future meetings, will save us from falling into the disastrous error of all secular organizations, that charitable work is to be judged exclusively by its material results.

Mr. Bigg's paper raised another question, viz.: How far should Catholics cooperate with Protestants and secular humanitarian organizations. This has to be faced and decided. On the one hand, the danger of unrestricted cooperation is obvious. It may mean an implicit denial of Catholic principles by both workers and those for whom they work, leading to their explicit rejection. On the other hand, we live amongst men and women not of the Faith, and a policy of rigid abstention seems impossible. The regulations of the Holy See for other countries will be a safe guide in this difficult matter.

In 1909 the Italian Unione Economico-Sociale proposed to modify the open Catholicity of its statutes in order to draw to itself associations inspired with only the general notion of Christian justice. This the Pope would not tolerate. The Christian associations of Italy, he said, must be openly and decidedly Catholic, as becomes societies born and grown up under the shadow of the Church. His views with regard to France are clear from his condemnation of the Sillon; and any misunderstanding of them is made impossible by the formula he gave to a French pilgrimage (16 April, 1910): "Neither forsake the fellowship of our own, nor set foot in the camp of the adversary." In both countries these rules are being followed strictly.

Turning to Germany we find a difference. Some twelve years ago organizations of workingmen were formed to protect their rights in the economic order. According to the decision of the Congress of Mainz, they were interconfessional, including Catholics and Protestants on the general basis of Christianity, and to-day they number 260,000 Catholics and 40,000 Protestants. Unhappily some, on the pretext that economic questions are to be settled by natural law only, so reduced the influence of Christianity that their spirit became rather indifferentism. The bishops of Prussia condemned this error, pointing out that as the Christian religion introduces into the life of man special obligations which natural law can touch only in general; associations, even though directed to the solution of economic questions must be animated with Christianity. Consequently not a few turned against the interconfessional associations and formed others exclusively Catholic. Then came quarrels and recriminations. The report went abroad that the Holy See was on the point of condemning the interconfessional societies. But last December Cardinal Fischer on his return from Rome denied this, assuring his hearers that the Sovereign Pontiff's wish was to conserve them but to remove their defects. A letter from Pius X soon afterwards confirmed this. His idea was that both classes of associations should continue to do each its own work in its own territory in the interests of religious and civil life.

In Catholic countries, then, where what is not Catholic is hostile to religion, no cooperation is to be allowed: in mixed populations this same regulation does not hold. With regard to Germany, it must be noted that the interconfessional associations originated with Catholics, that their membership is overwhelmingly Catholic, and that the direction of them is efficaciously in Catholic hands. The contrary is the case with us. The associations with which there is question of our cooperating are, both as regards membership and administration, entirely in Protestant or secular hands. With us, too, social work is very widespread. There are associations for providing the poor with corporal goods, such as baths, playgrounds, summer outings, etc., and these may be administered in a purely philanthropic spirit, or they may be made the means of proselytism. In the latter case cooperation is impossible, but what of the former? The same is true of temperance societies, refuges for friendless girls, etc. Then there are associations for the removal of public evils, physical or moral, as the anti-tuberculosis societies, and societies for removing public scandals from the streets, which, on the one hand, give less occasion to a spirit contrary to Catholicity, and of which, on the other, the object can be obtained only by the united efforts of all good citizens. Evidently Catholics may join with Protestants and Infidels to drive away the purveyors of iniquity, though they may be obliged to refuse to cooperate with them in supporting refuges and gymnasiums, even though these are only negatively opposed to our religion. These matters must be considered by the Conference sooner or later. The decision in such vital questions belongs to those whom the Holy Ghost has set to rule the Church of God, without whose direction, or at least approval, neither individual nor association may undertake either alone or in cooperation with others any social work.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

A Work of Providence

I.

Every German Catholic who loves his religion and his fatherland can or rather should cry out: "Blessings on the heads of Ludwig Windhorst and Franz Brandts," the one because of his grand ideal, the other because he converted that ideal into a reality. These two men,—Windhorst with a marvelous gift to pierce the veil of the future and to know its needs; Brandts, with a supreme talent for organization, and a devotion as unselfish as it was tireless,—were in the hands of Providence to plan and to build an institution which should meet the dangers of the day as no other could. Windhorst was the architect, Brandts was the builder, and the institution is none other than "Der Volksverein für das Katholische Deutschland," and without it the Catholics of Germany might to-day be as helpless and as rudderless as are their coreligionists in neighboring France.

Even a superficial observer of affairs in modern Germany must come to the conclusion that Church and State are seriously threatened by a growing immorality and a spirit of revolution. Another fact that stands out prominently is that the Catholics with their splendid hierarchy and Church societies, and with their strongly intrenched party organization, are the only power in the empire that is making a vigorous resistance to the elements of moral and political disintegration. At the last national elections the Socialists polled the largest vote, over three and a quarter millions, and next to them in numbers was the Catholic Centrum, with one million less. The ten remaining parties or factions together counted about as many votes as the two leaders. On account of the opposition of the Socialists, the government can do next to nothing without the Catholic support in the German Parliament. From the religious point of view, the church-going Catholics easily outnumber the actual church members of all the sects together and, as in America, so in Germany, the Protestant pastors are protesting against empty pews.

Nevertheless, the position of Catholics is not without danger. They are systematically opposed—it might almost be said, persecuted,—by many powerful forces, which among themselves are at variance with one another, but like Herod and Pilate of old, they become friends again on this issue. The Conservative Protestants in the "Evangelical League" still dream dreams about Roman supremacy and German subjection. The Liberals and the Socialists alike attack, but from different angles, the very fundamentals of Christian dogma and morals, the Liberals scattering their poison among the cultured and better classes; the Socialists spreading doubt and hatred among the laborers and the poor. Just as in society and at the club, so in the factory and in the wirtshaus religion is discussed, which means in most cases, the Catholic Church condemned and the Roman Pontiffs reviled.

It will amaze Americans to know that it is not unusual for a Catholic workman to be attacked by his fellow-workmen on such involved questions as the Bull of Pope Boniface VIII, "Unam Sanctam," on the power of the Pope over temporal sovereigns, or the Syllabus of Pope Pius IX and the temporal power of the Church. The Inquisition, St. Bartholomew's Eve, papal infallibility and even predestination have been "settled" for all times and, of course, at the expense of the Catholic Church. As in the past, so at present, the Holy See is always in error—it cannot move or deliver an utterance that does not immediately attract the attention and consequently the condemnation of Liberals and Socialists of every degree.

The anti-Catholic press,—and its number is legion,—devotes column after column to such strictly Catholic topics as the First Communion decree, or the anti-Modernist oath, or again the rights of parish priests. As a consequence these become questions of the hour, and even find their way into the heated debates of the Reichstag. Plentifully fed by their press, the Liberal and Socialist "thinkers" sally forth with their "data and arguments," and the first inoffensive Catholic that crosses their way becomes the target of their abuse, as well as of their newly-acquired "history" or "theology," as the case may be. This unfortunate state of affairs has its effect on not a few Catholics, and the writer met more than one case where elderly and even pious ladies "regretted the Borromeo Encyclical," or thought that "perhaps the Pope went too far in his Frequent Communion decree," or wondered "how anyone could defend the order to exclude newspapers from the seminaries."

It is no exaggeration or pessimism to say that to-day a silent Kulturkampf is being waged in Germany, more insidious and therefore perhaps more dangerous than its predecessors of the seventies. Faith and morality are everywhere assailed from a thousand presses and from a thousand platforms, now in the form of a Socialist Calendar or of a scientific review, now from the improvised rostrum of a labor-meeting, or from the dazzling stage of the theatre. Faith is assailed by rationalism in all its forms and morality by all the powers together. The bookworld, with its avalanches of literature and science, history and criticism, is, for the most part, a disguised rationalism, or specifically anti-Christian and anti-Catholic. The watchword is "Ruin the morals and faith will follow." Verily the German Catholic of to-day must be made of stern stuff—loyal and true.

But God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, and so in due time He raised up a Windhorst and a Brandts and gave to the German Catholics a "Volksverein" to equip them for the war, to direct them in the battle and to teach them how to profit by the victory. Windhorst, towards the close of his life, following in the almost forgotten steps of Bishop Ketteler, was determined that a society should be founded, which should embrace every loyal Catholic in the Fatherland, with the purpose of bettering their social and economic conditions, and thereby effectively to strengthen their political and religious status among their fellow-countrymen. After many conferences and more difficulties, at Cologne, on October 24, 1890, in the shadow of the great cathedral, the "Volksverein," the pride of Germany and the admiration of the Catholic world, came into being.

At Windhorst's suggestion, Herr Franz Brandts was elected President of the new organization, and during the next month a call to action was sounded throughout the country. Brandts was a manufacturer of München-Gladbach, and naturally that place became the society's first headquarters. Though in an out of the way corner of the empire, M. Gladbach seemed not unworthy of the honor, for being the German Manchester, it offered a vast laboratory for every experiment in the modern "Sociale Frage" (social question). But it was another reason that made Brandts the first president of the Volksverein and München-Gladbach its first centre. Back in the seventies, Herr Brandts realized the need of social reform, and like a practical man, he began at home, in his own factories and with his own workmen. These efforts soon attracted attention and M. Gladbach was distinguished as the pioneer city of German cooperative industry welfare.

By degrees Brandts interested others in his work, and eventually organized the association "Arbeiterwohl"—a body of Catholic social thinkers and workers, which agitated for legislative reforms, for a better understanding between capital and labor, and as its name indicates, was especially active in introducing better conditions into workshops. Brandts' factories led the way; here were fair wages, protection of life and limb, health regulations, insurance and savings banks, and above all the personal service of Brandts himself. But that was not all; soon this model employer turned his private park into a playground for the children of his employees, converted the entire first floor of his own mansion, called "St. Joseph's House," into a day-nursery, a recreation hall and a dining room, where warm meals are served at very moderate prices. Closely associated with Brandts in these reforms and in the progress of "Arbeiterwohl" was its General Secretary, Dr. Franz Hitze, a priest and a practical sociologist of the first rank, who as a member of the Reichstag and of the Prussian Diet, has done more for labor laws than any other man in Germany. Thus Brandts and Hitze agitated for social reforms along sound Christian principles from the seventies to the nineties, when "Arbeiterwohl," tried with years of experience and strong with deserved success, formed the groundwork of the new and mightier "Volksverein."

"His Little Excellency," as Windhorst was affectionately called, knew the value of "Arbeiterwohl," and hence he turned to Brandts and to Hitze, counting on their experience and enthusiasm to lead the new enterprise to success. Events have proven that this confidence was not misplaced. Windhorst wished the "Volksverein" to be his last testament to the German people, and he was singularly fortunate in his executors. After twenty years Brandts is still at the head of the "Volksverein" and Hitze is still his counsellor and friend, his "fidus Achates." As the work grew, Brandts wisely gathered younger leaders around him, men trained in every phase of their work, such as Pieper, Hohn and Brauns, who are to-day the guiding spirits of the mighty organization.

FREDERICK SIEDENBURG, S.J

IN MISSION FIELDS

CONDITION OF THE CHURCH IN THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

After a voyage round the world, the Rev. Father M. Kennelly, Jesuit missionary in China and regular correspondent of AMERICA, has returned to Shanghai. Before leaving San Francisco he discussed freely the condition of the Church generally in the Chinese empire, and gave an interesting talk on the Catholic missions and the reform movement now going on in that country. For the following account we are indebted to the San Francisco Monitor:—

According to Father Kennelly the rapidly growing Catholic population of China is now ministered to spiritually by forty-five bishops and twenty-one hundred priests, nearly half of which number are native Chinese. One and a half million souls converted to the Faith is the record to date of the missionaries of the Church among the followers of Confucius. There are six thousand elementary schools conducted under Catholic auspices in the Flowery Kingdom, in which upwards of two hundred thousand pupils receive an industrial and manual training. The outlook for the Church in China is unusually bright, but even so, there is a tremendous task still ahead of her, and many sacrifices and much labor are yet to be endured.

Father Kennelly has been attached to the mission of Shanghai for a quarter of a century, and is the only English-speaking Catholic missionary in the province of Shanghai and one of the ten in the Chinese empire.

"We are frequently asked if we are making progress with our work among the Chinese," he said. "We have averaged 100,000 converts yearly for five years. In my own mission at Shanghai, we have 160 Jesuit priests aided by 40 native Chinese priests, and have about 200,000 Catholics, or as many as the total number of converts to other denominations in the whole empire.

"What may we hope for in the future as regards this great work? We have perceived that the Gospel is favorable to the Chinese, and that it was made for him as it was for the other nations. The truths of the Church will never disturb the peace of mind of the Chinaman. The 100,000 annual converts are pledges of the popularity of the Catholic faith among the Chinese. At present the missionaries are protected by a treaty with the government, but I think that the time will soon come when China will follow the example of other countries and grant full peace and toleration to our Faith."

Dealing with political, social and economic conditions in the Chinese empire, Father Kennelly declared that the great "reform" movement was the paramount issue in China at the present time. The fact that China has experienced an awakening is not to be doubted, he said, although the readjustment of a nation of the tremendous population of China, wedded, as it has been, to antiquity for centuries, must needs be a task that will occupy many years. However, it was Father Kennelly's belief that the next quarter of a century would witness a revolutionizing of Chinese ideas, so that the people would look toward the future instead of the past.

The establishment of a modern educational system is one of the most important of the means which the new China is employing toward erasing the effects of the ancient civilization. Up to the present time, however, there has been much difficulty in introducing the technical and higher forms of education through the lack of efficient teachers. To remedy this condition the imperial government is sending out annually hundreds of young Chinese students to the schools of other countries.

In building her railroads China has absolutely refused to accept foreign capital or submit to foreign control. She wishes to build her own transportation lines and accomplish other great enterprises all by herself. This is because she dreads foreign interference and the complications which she has experienced in the past. Two years ago China made the promise to exterminate the opium evil in ten years. She has proceeded, as far as possible, to prevent the cultivation of the opium poppy, and to stop the sale and the use of the drug throughout the empire.

Father Kennelly says that if there is a "Yellow Peril" it exists in the commercial competition of China in the future. He predicts that in time to come China will be the strongest rival of the United States as a commercial and manufacturing nation.

—•••—
In Holland every year there is a silent and solemn procession—it is called the stille omgang—which proceeds through the streets of Amsterdam, and after returning to the starting point disbands, the different divisions withdrawing to the various churches. This year the procession assumed enormous proportions. The participants assembled at 5 o'clock in the morning. It was made up exclusively of men, who first went to communion in the parish churches. In the afternoon a great meeting was held in the Paleis voor Volksvlijt, where vigorous speeches were made by distinguished men expressing their loyalty to the Pope and protesting against the spoliation of which he was the victim.

CORRESPONDENCE

Spanish Liberalism, Illiteracy and the Church

TORTOSA, SPAIN, April 8, 1911.

The religious question is again growing acute in Spain. At the same time the versatile anti-Catholic press agents continue to inform the foreign newspaper world that the Radical Liberal programme, and especially the borrowed French Association Law, is a move to weaken Catholic Church influence, which in Spain, they say, is opposed both to primary education and to solid secondary educational work. These writers give to the foreign press the high figure of 63.78 per cent. of the 1900 census of illiteracy in Spain, and, without explanation of figures or facts, cast the blame upon the Church.

The second volume of the official census of Spain informs us that this 63.78 per cent. includes as illiterates even babies in their mothers' arms. In other words, Spanish official illiteracy begins at birth. Hence, the injustice of offering this 63.78 per cent. as a basis for comparison with countries where official illiteracy begins only at ten or eleven years of age. That the figures of the 1900 census of illiteracy were high, no Catholic Spaniard denies. However, they may reasonably object that the facts in regard to this illiteracy are deliberately misrepresented; that a school census of approximately 2,000,000 children in municipal schools and 350,000 in the private schools of the country during the late Conservative administration should be entirely ignored or falsely attributed to Liberal, anti-Catholic zeal for education. All Catholic Spaniards admit that in some provinces the figures for illiteracy were appallingly high; in others, such as the fervently Catholic Basque country, with its difficult native language, they may well point to the low per cent. of illiteracy, especially since these low figures represent in general a mastery of two widely distinct languages, Basque and Castilian. That Catholic Church influence is responsible for the low figures in these latter provinces is undeniable; that it is not responsible for the high figures in other provinces is a truth easily confirmed by anyone who will read the ecclesiastical history of Spain during the past century.

It is a story of battles with unjust Liberal and Radical legislators, of confiscation of the Church's property, expulsions of her teaching orders and congregations, and of open violence and oppression. To save what was left from the wreck of years of unjust persecution, Pius IX. drew up, with the ministers of Queen Isabel, the Concordat of 1851. For the spiritual welfare and peace of the nation the Church relinquished her claims to confiscated ecclesiastical property sold by the government. The personal wealth of many of the Liberal party, which is again attempting to persecute the Church, had its beginning in this confiscated property. Though the Concordat promised peace, the years following were again years of sad trial for the Church, and 1855 brought new and strenuous anti-Catholic legislation. From then on to 1868 we find the Church passing through the first stages of the period which was to have its climax in the terrible days of the atheistical Republican uprising, with its murders of priests and destruction or confiscation of churches and Catholic schools. From 1868 to 1875 Spain was in turn ruled by every conceivable form of government, all hostile to the Church. It was during this period of civil wars that educational work in Spain was practically destroyed. The Spanish historian, La Fuente, tells us that "liberty of education was converted into the anarchy of ignorance." It was fully 1880 before affairs were back in their normal state. What the Church's influence did during the twenty years following the days of trial the above quoted census of 1900 tells us; what the Liberal group, which is now planning persecution for the Church, failed to do is also vividly told in the same census.

The figures which we give may be verified in the volumes of the official Spanish census of 1900. The detailed census of 1910 has not yet been published. In our test we limit ourselves to those provinces which afford an incontrovertible basis for comparison. That the hundreds of convent and private ecclesiastical schools in the provinces of Madrid and Barcelona, and the labors of parish priests and zealous sodalities in these provinces were greatly responsible for the reduction of illiteracy to 22.25 per cent. and 39.68 per cent., respectively, for all over six years, is undeniable. The three provinces Alava, Guipúzcoa and Vizcaya compose the Basque country, which with Navarra forms the most fervently Catholic part of Spain. It is of interest to note that Canalejas was the representative of Alicante in the Cortes; 61.22 per cent. is found in this electorate.

PERCENTAGE OF ILLITERATES OVER SIX YEARS OF AGE.

Province in which Catholic Church influence is strongest:	Provinces in which Liberal influence is strongest:
Alava19.79%	Jaén65.79%
Guipúzcoa31.75	Murcia62.91
Viscaya32.25	Málaga63.56
Navarra30.10	Granada65.62
Burgos26.36	Alicante61.22
Santander26.04	Almería64.27
Segovia28.18	Badajoz60.77
Soria32.42	Córdoba60.29
Salamanca36.43	Sevilla50.43
Palencia25.95	Cádiz51.90

Average.....28.93% Average.....60.68%

Who is responsible for illiteracy in Spain? Certainly, not the Church.

We will now take another interesting view of the case. In the capitals of these same provinces where educational opportunities should abound, we may examine with profit what the Church and the Liberals may each claim for their respective influence. We present data from the same 1900 census of the percentage of illiterates between ten and twenty years of age or, in other words, of those born since 1880, when the Church was again able to use her religious teachers and thus exercise to a greater extent her influence in the capitals of these fervent provinces. The percentage of illiterates over twenty years of age, which we place in the second column, will show more clearly what effort was made to educate the young:

Capitals of Above Catholic Provinces.	Capitals of above Liberal Provinces.
Illiterates. 10 to 20 Over	Illiterates. 10 to 20 Over
Yrs. 20 yrs.	Yrs. 20 yrs.
Vitoria 8.73% 16.58%	Jaén71.10% 57.69%
San Sebastian.. 7.36 27.43	Murcia70.63 65.53
Bilbao12.57 23.22	Málaga56.82 56.53
Pamplona11.29 23.87	Granada54.67 53.85
Burgos14.16 22.18	Alicante52.12 53.41
Santander15.02 26.54	Almería64.14 61.79
Segovia17.49 24.59	Badajoz50.49 53.51
Soria15.86 25.83	Córdoba52.49 49.07
Salamanca16.16 32.94	Sevilla*36.03 40.57
Palencia21.15 29.32	Cádiz*28.05 35.76

Average.....13.98% 25.25% Average.....53.64% 52.77%

*There are numerous convent schools in these two cities.

It is unnecessary to ask which influence, Catholic or Liberal, sent more children to school, and this long before the "clerical" Conservatives had drawn up their compulsory school law. The full significance of our second deadly parallel is realized when we learn that in the Liberal stronghold, Jaén, this 71.10 per cent. represents 4,039 illiterate boys and girls between ten and twenty years of age, and this in a city of 26,434! In Pamplona, in staunchly Catholic Navarra, there were but 738 illiterates between ten and twenty years of age among a population of 28,886. The photographs sent to the American press of "Pro-Canalejas Meetings," with thousands crying: "We want modern education," if not borrowed snap-shots of former great Catholic meetings against Moret and the lay schools, offer an amusing argument against the Radical Liberals of Spain. As meetings in defence of the Canalejas program have assumed importance only in those provinces where Liberal ideas have been predominant for more than fifty years and where the figures for illiteracy are appallingly high, it would seem that these followers of the Radical Liberals had just cause to cry for modern education, especially when they see what has been done in those provinces where the Church has not been hindered. That Madrid ministries are not responsible for the vigorous educational work done in these Catholic provinces is best shown by the fact that in the Catholic manifestation of October 2 we find in Navarra alone some 275 town councils assembled in Pamplona to protest against the Canalejas anti-Catholic program, and its planned interference with the educational work of their province (see AMERICA, October 29).

To those familiar with secondary educational work in Spain the attempt of anti-Catholic correspondents to present the Radical Liberal group as the only defenders of solid educational methods comes as an amusing surprise. For ten years Spanish educators have been protesting against the Romanones plan of studies. By this plan of the actual Liberal President of the House of Deputies, and Canalejas' rival in anti-clericalism, solid secondary educational work has become an impossibility. The law of April 12, 1901 deprived the rising generation of all hope of a broad liberal training in Spanish secondary schools.

The teaching of Greek became an impossibility; Latin had been declared by the shallow editorial writers of El Liberal and El Imparcial, of Madrid, as "a study for priests," and was consequently relegated to an obscure place. Latin is now studied for two years. The solid philosophical courses for which the Spanish colleges were always famous are now impossible for schools following the Government's plan of studies. Government examinations in Government institutes now give a boy of fifteen or sixteen years a bachelor's degree for a six years' course as follows: 1st year (usual age of pupil ten years): Spanish Grammar, General Geography, with special attention to Europe; General Study of Arithmetic and Geometry, Penmanship. 2nd year: Complete Arithmetic, Latin, Geography of Spain, Gymnastics. 3rd year: Geometry, Latin, History of Spain, French, Gymnastics. 4th year: Algebra and Trigonometry, Precepts of Literature, Universal History, French, Drawing. 5th year: Physics, History of Literature, Logic and Psychology, Physiology and Hygiene. 6th year: Chemistry, Ethics, Rudiments of Law, Natural History, Agriculture. It is against this enslavement of their schools that Catholic educators and writers are protesting. They demand higher standards for a bachelor's degree. They claim, and not without reason, that the Romanones educational law has destroyed all initiative in the colleges and institutes of the country; that it has saddled upon the schools a defective and badly arranged compulsory plan of studies entirely out of harmony with the experience of the past and of requirement of a broad, liberal culture, so necessary for those who are to continue their studies in the Spanish or European Universities. Such is the secondary educational situation in Spain. With these facts before them the readers of AMERICA may judge for themselves who are the defenders of solid secondary educational work in the country. Certainly, it is not the men who drew up the law of April 12, 1901.

The Spanish educational review, La Educación Hispano-Americana, for February, in reviewing the Report of the Commission of Education, Vol. I, 1909, and Vol. II, 1910, expresses surprise at the meagre information supplied by Mr. Elmer Ellsworth Brown's official United States Government statistics in regard to education in Spain. After stating that in AT LEAST this case Spaniards are not to blame for the scanty information offered, the Review says: "To speak frankly, as the School Census of Spain was published in 1904, by the Geographical and Statistical Institute (El Instituto Geográfico y Estadístico, Madrid) North Americans might in 1910 be more exactly informed in regard to our affairs." We recommend this excellent review to those wishing to keep in touch with educational work in Spain. It is published by Gili, Barcelona.

CHARLES J. MULLALY, S.J.

Famine in Central China

SHANGHAI, MARCH 12, 1911.

Central China is at present in the throes of a terrible famine. The area affected is the Northern part of the two provinces of Kiangsu and Anhwei, or an extent of territory of about 20,000 square miles, with a total population of from three and a half to five million inhabitants. The immediate cause of the disaster was a heavy and prolonged rainfall which took place in August last and was followed by floods and destruction of crops to an extent unparalleled in previous times.

Northern Anhwei is watered by the Hwai River, a large and capricious stream fed by several affluents and which often overflows and then spreads devastation throughout the low-lying plain. In the late flood as many as eight large cities and townships have suffered: Pochow, Koyang, Mengcheng, Nansuchow, Lingpi, Szechow, Wuho and Hwaiyuen. At Pochow, the crops were totally destroyed, thus reducing all of a sudden 300,000 persons to a state of destitution. At Koyang, there are 120,000 persons on the famine list and double that number at Mengcheng. The district that is most affected is Hwaiyuen, situated at the junction of the Ko river with the Hwai. More than half the country around is entirely flooded; the greater part of the population, numbering a million, is without any food.

The Shanghai Catholic Mission carries on work in all these places and reckons in the flooded district 10,000 converts, the increase last year being over 2,000, while 20,000 others prepare for baptism. In the distressed state of the country, little or no missionary work can be done at present, catechumens have to be dismissed and schools closed till better times dawn and help comes from outside. The next crop of wheat will not be gathered before June next. Till then how many will die of hunger and cold!

Rev. Father Perrin, S. J., head missionary at Yingchow-

fu, writes thus on the situation: "Rain fell during a whole week at Yingchowfu and created havoc at Koyang and Mengcheng. It is the worst disaster that befell the people since 40 years. Everywhere houses have collapsed, the harvest is ruined and foodstuffs unobtainable except at high prices. Hundreds die of starvation, exposure and cold. At Koyang, 10,000 people—mostly famine refugees—resort to robbery and plunder and scour the country, holding for ransom the well-to-do folks and any who appear to them to hoard a little rice, beans, millet or other eatables." Father Gauchet, whose centre is at Nansuchow, confirms the above sad story. "I have reached Suchow," he says, "by boat. Everywhere along the river banks wreckage floats on the waters, villages are ruined, the inhabitants in some places having taken refuge on the roofs. We were sorry we could not succour them in any way. At 8 p. m. I reached my church and presbytery. The church was still standing but the walls inclined and threatened to fall unless propped up without delay. The school is reduced to a single room occupied by the teacher; the others are still soaked with water and cannot be used till we are able to repair them. The outer wall has entirely collapsed and robbers and others can pilfer us day and night. We are, however, fortunate in escaping so well. In the city, the sub-prefect's official residence collapsed early and the houses of many others, rich and poor, have met with the same fate. The walls enclosing the city have partly fallen into the moat, thus leaving large breaches through which robbers can enter and ply their trade unmolested." Father Liu, a Chinese Jesuit, describes thus his own misery: "the people here are living on the bark of trees, leaves and some roots they procure in the ground. Women and children are sold like animals, mostly for a paltry sum, a dollar or two. Robbery is rife. Several of our converts have died of hunger and cold. If I could get $5,000, I would be able to help them till the harvest is gathered." North of the last mentioned place, the missionary and his flock are likewise in a sad plight. "Out of 300 families," he says, "140 have nothing to eat, 120 others have a little food for about a month. I have 200 families preparing for baptism; all are suffering from the disaster and I am unable to do much for them. In a well-to-do family nearby, every member gets a ration of 4 ounces per day and God knows what poor stuff it is! I have distributed a hundred weight of rice to 400 persons; it will not help beyond a few days. I have still 180 children in the school, but how long will it be possible to maintain them, I do not know."

The above tells its own sad story and bespeaks amply the widespread misery that prevails in North Anhwei.

As a sequel to the recent visit of representative American merchants and others to China, it has been decided that a return call will be made by a representative body of Chinese merchants. The two Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Commerce have voted the sum of 200,000 taels as their contribution towards the expenditure, and if insufficient, merchants of all the provinces are to make up the amount required.

M. KENNELLY, S.J.

"The Crimes of a Convent"

Moscow, March 25, 1911.

I don't know if the outcry of the Russian press against "convents" has reached your ears; it has well-nigh deafened ours. The enemies of the religious life have endeavored to befoul the immaculate mantle of the Church and have raised a savage cry against all religious institutions. Their theme has been "The Crimes of a Convent," and they have grown hoarse with its frequent repetition; but they have studiously kept back the fact that the occasion of their outburst was a monastery of Russian Monks under the jurisdiction of the Holy Synod, the body which is supposed to look after religion in the Russian State Church, and has nothing to do with Roman Catholic affairs.

What actually happened is as follows, and I guarantee the correctness of my statement, for I did not remain satisfied with what appeared in the papers unless I could confirm it from other sources. In the town of Cestochon there is a shrine of our Lady, which is served by monks of the Russian Church, who are more properly officials of the Russian government. When it was recently noticed that many precious jewels belonging to the shrine had been stolen, it was not hard to discover that the perpetrators of the sacrilege were some of the so-called monks under the leadership of one Damasus Macoch, of the same monastery, and that they had squandered their ill-gotten goods in a scandalous way in both Warsaw and Cracow. Macoch murdered his female friend's brother and, with the help of a servant in the monastery, threw the corpse into the river. The servant also confessed a share in other crimes of Macoch, including the murder of several monks of the establishment. The bodies were exhumed by the authorities, and it was found that poison in deadly quantities had been used, as the servant had said. Macoch was arrested and turned over to the Russian authorities.

The prior of the schismatical monastery was aware of many irregularities among his monks, but seems to have known nothing about the poisoning. An attempt was made two years ago to have him replaced by a more energetic man; but the Russian government would not hear of a change. In spite of his weakness, the prior had made some effort to better conditions in his monastery and had ordered the expulsion of Damasus Macoch; but the Russian government interfered and forbade him to undertake the reforms.

Macoch was charged with a long list of very heinous offences, yet shortly after he was in the power of the Russian government he broke jail, and is still at large. Indeed, it is the common belief that the officials themselves set him at liberty. The Jewish and Freethinking press have given the fullest details of his enormities, but they have not uttered a syllable to inform their readers that Macoch had no connection with the Catholic Church. They have satisfied themselves and their love of truth with the oft-repeated declaration that all monks are at heart murderers, traitors, lewd livers and poisoners. Their political influence may secure immunity for Macoch and his detestable band of ruffians, but their crimes are too well known to be denied.

(Rev.) JORDAN SIEDLISKA, O.P.

[NOTE.—The wide currency given in the United States to the first news of Macoch's sacrilege prompts the publication of the above clear statement of the facts.—ED. AMERICA.]

Guatemala To-day

GUATEMALA, C. A., MARCH 15th, 1911.

Manuel Estrada Cabrera has been elected for a third term President of Guatemala, in spite of a clause in the treaty of peace concluded between this republic and Salvador by the mediation of the United States, in which clause it was recommended that Estrada Cabrera should not be reelected.

At the time of the elections there was no other candidate but Estrada Cabrera, nobody would have dared mention another name in opposition, and much less would anyone have dared vote for another man. Men were morally forced to form clubs, whose object was to subvert the reelection. Unwilling, though they were, they went to work in dead earnest, and like so many Don Quixotes fighting an imaginary foe, they held meetings, spoke their speeches and paraded day and night, vigorously acclaiming their one and only candidate, as if there were a host of aspirants to the presidency.

The only real rivalry was that among the various political clubs to see which could rally the largest number of voters for its parades and for election day.

When the quite superfluous announcement was made that Manuel Estrada Cabrera had been elected for the third time by a more than unanimous vote (for there were many "repeaters," and he was the only candidate), there was no end to the rejoicing and feasting. To-day the whole country is given over to celebrating, for it is inauguration day. Any foreigner who might step in on us would undoubtedly think that our people are the happiest and most prosperous on earth; seeing the bunting, the flags and the flowers, the triumphal arches that would be a credit to New York City, the long lines of soldiers, and the enthusiastic citizens, he might say in his simplicity that the unfavorable reports about Estrada Cabrera are vile calumnies; but if he enters the private house of the man who in the torchlight parade made himself so conspicuous by his shouts and enthusiastic "vivas" and listens to the conversation that is carried on at a safe distance from eavesdroppers, he will come to the conclusion that tyranny has done its worst with these unfortunate people; for by terrorizing them it has succeeded in reducing them to the lowest depths of degradation; by breaking their spirit it has virtually blotted them out.

He will understand how one man or a few men can tyrannize over a whole country and be wildly acclaimed besides. The man who made such a display in the parade will tell his wife that he did so because his enemy was near at hand and ready to denounce him if he acted otherwise. The consequence would have been not only loss of position, if he had any, but continued molestation in his business or in the work of his plantation; he would have been from that time on a marked man. On the other hand, his present way of acting will make his person and property somewhat more secure. It is, in other words, by playing upon the fears of the people, who have become timid through constant oppression, that the man in the saddle keeps his seat.

Estrada Cabrera has become enormously rich, and is feared even by the ruffians, who do his bidding; but it is the fear not of just indignation, but of the lash, that holds them to his service. For months he has not set foot outside his house. Some say he fears assassination; others say he is slowly dying of an incurable malady. Certain it is that at the recent meeting of the national Congress it assembled in his house and not in the capitol. He has a large military force constantly under arms (it goes up well into the thousands) and employs hundreds of spies, and all this to safeguard his miserable person. He would do much more for himself, and for the welfare of Guatemala, if he would do something to check the abuses that have crept into the administration of the laws, for this would be a move towards restoring prosperity, which has long been unknown in the country.

TIO LOLOS.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 22 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Important Official Decrees

Apostolic Delegation, 1811 Biltmore Street,
United States of America, Washington, D. C.
No. 8422-d.

This No. should be prefixed to the answer.

18 APRIL, 1911.

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

Please to find enclosed for publication in AMERICA copies of two letters recently received from Rome.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

D. FALCONIO,
Apostolic Delegate.

APPLICATION OF THE DECREE "MAXIMA CURA," TO THE UNITED STATES.

SACRED CONGREGATION OF THE CONSISTORY.

ROME, 13 MARCH, 1911.

Number of Protocol 312/11.

To His Excellency, Monsignor Diomede Falconio, Apostolic Delegate to the United States,
YOUR EXCELLENCY:

In response to your letter of the 17th of February, it becomes my duty to inform you that the Decree, "Maxima Cura," in regard to the removal of parish priests has full force in the dioceses of the United States; it being, as the Bishops of that country have rightly held, a general law of the Church.

The decision of this Sacred Congregation given on the 23rd of February for the dioceses of England removes all doubt in this regard. The Holy Father, moreover, to whom I recalled the matter in an audience of the 3rd of March, expressly declared his mind; that is, that the prescriptions of the said Decree are in force for the United States also.

With sentiments of especial esteem, I subscribe myself

Cordially yours,
C. CARDINAL DE LAI, Secretary.

THE NATIONAL FLAG IN THE CHURCHES OF THE UNITED STATES.

SUPREME SACRED CONGREGATION
OF THE HOLY OFFICE.

ROME, 31 MARCH, 1911.

To His Excellency, Monsignor Diomede Falconio, Apostolic Delegate to the United States,
YOUR EXCELLENCY:

From the Sacred Penitentiaria there was sent to this Supreme Congregation the most valued communication of Your Excellency dated 17 February 1911, (No. 8012-d) in which there is the inquiry, "Whether, in the United States, the National Flag can be permitted in the church during religious ceremonies and on the occasion of funerals."

This inquiry having been set forth in a plenary meeting on the 22nd of the present month, the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Cardinals, Inquisitors General, my colleagues, the circumstances mentioned by Your Excellency having also been examined, promulgated the following conclusion: "Attentis expositis a R. P. D. Delegato Apostolico, quatenus absit omnino quilibet Ecclesiae vel Sacrae Liturgiae contemptus nihil ob stare." (Translation. In view of the considerations set forth by His Most Reverend Lordship, the Apostolic Delegate, in so far as there will be no disrespect resulting in regard to the Church or the Sacred Liturgy, there is no objection.)

Wishing, in the meantime, every good to Your Excellency,
I remain your devoted servant,

M. CARDINAL RAMPOLLA.

Peace

Sir Robert Perks, of London, who is heralded as "the foremost Methodist layman of the world," has crossed the ocean to enlist the sympathies of this country in the triumph of Methodism in Great Britain, and also to bind America and England with hooks of steel in an everlasting peace.

"The great foes of Methodism in England," he informs his audience, "are the liquor interests, the Catholic Church, and the Romanizing tendencies of Anglicanism." Unconsciously he repeated for his New York audience the famous war cry that was so fatal to the man who uttered it, and to the cause it was intended to assist. He has summoned Dr. Burchard from the grave.

With regard to the liquor interests, the New York Sun, in its issue of April 18, records as a fact that the "British Thirst" has not yet been slaked. The money spent last year for drink in the British Isles ran up to £157,604,658, an increase of more than two millions over the cost of libations during the year 1909. And, although this may be explained to some extent by the higher price for alcoholic beverages, yet the accusing fact rises up like a ghost before us that beer was guilty of an increase of 535,997 barrels, and wine of 1,268,812 gallons in last year's consumption. In that evil everyone will admit that Sir Robert has a foe every way worthy of his steel, and we sincerely hope he may become another St. George in slaying or maiming the dragon.

As for Romanism and Romanizing Anglicanism, the prospects are not so promising. In the first place this doughty paladin of Methodism admits that he has a very disorganized army behind him. "Unfortunately," he says, "Methodism in England is divided into Wesleyan, Primitive and United." Secondly, he bases his prognostications of success, not on the duly ordained clergy, but on laymen of all classes, "from bricklayers to members of Parliament." "Put a white tie on most of them," he continues, "and they come out all right with the confidence of everybody, and as they itinerate they come into public committee membership and political office." They are not to preach the Gospel, but to descant upon "temperance, peace, and social reform"— subjects about which it is not necessary to be a Methodist to judge correctly.

Thus a new dispensation is to take the place of the Gospel of Christ. It will depend on a white necktie and political offices. It discards the supernatural but will certainly not fill the empty churches.

The next obstacle to the triumph of Methodism in England is the Established Church, and Sir Robert wants its clergy to give up their livings or to be forced out of them, so as to fight Methodism on equal terms. That, of course, will not happen without a struggle, for Sir Robert hastens to say that the hostility between Methodism and Anglicanism is growing more bitter every day, though he throws all the blame on the other side. Of course, the Anglican lamb has an unconquerable hostility to being eaten, even by a Methodist. As a necessary preliminary, he insists, Simon pure Romanism must be destroyed. If it were not there Anglicanism would not imitate it. But there was a great English poet who told his countrymen, many years ago, that the Catholic Church was the "milk-white hind that was fated not to die." So Sir Robert had better abandon hope. Greater men than he have tried but failed.

All this is old stuff and one is wearied of repeating it. But the wonder is, how, if Sir Robert with his bricklayers and members of Parliament, cannot heal the wounds in the Wesleyan body, and cannot diminish the bitter hostility that exists between the religious sects of Little England, he nevertheless has the courage to attempt an everlasting peace between two such selfish nations as England and the United States. Better begin with the brethren first.

St. John the Divine

In consecrating a part of their cathedral on April 19 the Episcopalians of the United States gave a vivid illustration of the broadness of their creed. They paid no attention to St. Paul's injunction with regard to heretics, but effusively, and, indeed, anxiously, welcomed Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Lutherans and others beneath the lofty dome which will resound, sooner or later, if Episcopalianism be true to its traditions, with denunciations of the doctrines of those same denominations. Or has Episcopalianism added its voice to the general clamor that creeds no longer count? Surely, the indiscriminating hospitality of April 19 was very significant, and especially so because of the exquisite care that was taken to keep in the background any conflicting differences of dogma. Indeed, although Anglicans of the present day are so eager to claim the name "Catholic," yet Dr. Greer in his address sedulously avoided the expression. He told his audience of the Christian woman who established the first hospital, the Christian bishop who built the first asylum, the Christian monk who first cared for the blind, and the Christian Council of Nicea which established institutions for the poor. But he never once, according to the printed report, mentioned the name Catholic. Did he fear the Methodists and Lutherans and Calvinists who thronged around him? And why was it that he did not rise above the mere natural virtues of patriotism and philanthropy? Has he no message from the Gospel, and what did he mean by the tautology of "the Incarnate Jesus Christ"?

Of course, Catholics could not take part in the ceremonies. Their presence would be a public approval of what they know to be a fatal and reprehensible deviation from revealed truth; but possibly they found comfort in the fact that St. John's is a copy of the old Catholic cathedrals which the ancestors of the millionaire builders on the Heights had done their best in former times to destroy or deface. It was a partial atonement for the sins of the past.

Nevertheless one of our correspondents protests very vigorously against a notable feature of the celebration; or, rather, against a permanent fixture of the cathedral itself. This is his complaint:

"They have dedicated a chapel to Columba, a great Irish saint of the 6th century. That canonized Irishman will not thank them for the honor intended, for he will find himself among uncongenial surroundings. He will miss the Mass, the priest, and the bishop in his chapel, and he knows the origin of the schism and heresy imported to America from an island hostile to his race and faith. A very small percentage of the people who frequent his chapel will know anything about his life, and all of them will condemn as idolatry the faith he professed, and as superstition the vows of poverty, chastity and obedience which he and his brother monks practiced. However, the Episcopalians have a precedent elsewhere among their coreligionists for appropriating Irish saints to embellish heretical churches. In Dublin they misappropriated St. Patrick's, to use no harsher word, and in Cork St. Finbar's. If the saints in heaven could suffer they would grieve to see their ho'y names thus abused."

With this sentiment all Catholics agree. For, apart from the incongruity of the thing, devoting a chapel to a Catholic saint in a Protestant cathedral is perilously like what was done when the Presbyterians, to deceive a number of poor, ignorant and friendless Ruthenian immigrants, counterfeited the Mass in their meeting houses. Perhaps one day we may have a counterfeit Mass at Columba's shrine. It is only one step from the chapel to the altar.

But, apart from this, the uninitiated would like to know what prompted the choice of a monk to adorn this celebration? We ask the question because ever since England exchanged the Pope for Henry VIII as head of the Church monks have been held up to scorn and ridicule. They were lazy, and dirty, and ignorant, and licentious, and English literature from the outbreak of the Reformation has been reeking with abuse of them. It does not matter that they were among the most saintly and scholarly men of the kingdom; their vast domains, reclaimed mostly from the wilderness for the benefit of the poor, their splendid institutions of learning and their marvelous abbeys and churches, which are still the architectural glories of England, were looted, despoiled and expropriated to enrich the nobles of the realm or to fill the Government's exchequer, while all of them, black friars and white friars and gray friars, were flung into the fields to starve or led to the block to be executed. And now, lo! in distant New York the descendants of the men who did all these things assign a place of honor in their gorgeous cathedral to an arch representative of the helpless victims of English literature, history and political iniquity.

Then, again, why all this honor to an Irish monk? Were there no Englishmen to choose from, or is this another act of reparation for the wrongs of the past to the Sister Isle?

Was he selected for his alleged anti-papal proclivities? He was a great lover of the Bible, but so were all the monks. Was it because he clashed with Rome about Easter and the tonsure? There is no truth in either charge, and in any case chronology and the cut of one's hair do not determine one's faith. Nor did he set out to convert the heathens without a papal mandate. On the contrary, he was doing precisely what Rome wanted. For Pope Gregory was just then reprimanding the British clergy for refusing to convert the hated Anglo-Saxons, who, because of that, received their Christianity from the "Italian Mission." But, prescinding from all that, what had Columba to do at any moment of his life with either Britons or Anglo-Saxons? His work was exclusively with the Picts and Scots. He went among them in 563, and it was only in 634, viz., seventy years later, that Aidan, one of his successors, appeared in Northumbria, where Paulinus, the Roman, had already preceded him. It will be a difficult task to prove that the Anglicans of St. John the Divine derive their Christianity from the Irish monk who so long ago beached his coracle on the shore of Iona.

On the whole, now that all the splendor and excitement has passed, we cannot perceive that the consecration of St. John the Divine has been helpful to religion in general. It does not even connote any corresponding growth of Episcopalianism. It is not the work of a religious body eager to promote the knowledge of its doctrines, but of the few rich men who gave so lavishly of their possessions. Indeed, all doctrinal pronouncement was suppressed on that day of days, when a splendid opportunity presented itself of letting the world know what Episcopalianism stood for and new strength was given to the widespread and anti-Christian error of the day, viz., that the dogmas which differentiate the various religious bodies of Christians are really of no vital importance. St. John the Divine has been degraded into a meeting house of all sorts of jarring beliefs, from that of the ministers who deny the Divinity of Christ and who rejoiced in the silence about it in the very church of the Evangelist who made the Godhead of the Messiah his chief theme, down to the adoring reverence of the consecrated Irish monk, who was dragged from the dead past to make a Protestant holiday. Dr. De Costa, who was once an Anglican clergyman, used to say that the cathedral on the Heights would be the Cenotaph of Episcopalianism.

Freethought Federation •

There was a time when the words "freethought" and "freethinkers" did not contain the full viciousness of significance now generally conceded them. That was a time, however, when "freethought" had not come into its full development as a system, before "freethinkers" ventured boldly to proclaim their revolt against all that is comprehended in the traditional signification of the term religion. To-day a freethinker is one who scouts all belief in God and soul and immortality. Most wanton in its attacks on revealed religion the freethinking body has come to be recognized as a specially dangerous troop in the vast army of rationalism drawn up in hostile array before the Church of God, and the wish has been frequently expressed that a thorough study of the growth and life of the organization be made for the benefit of those who must meet and repel its attacks.

Father Otto Zimmermann, writing in the Stimmen aus Maria Laach (March, 1911), proposes to satisfy this desire, and if the promise contained in his opening article be realized in those which are to follow, his critical and historical dissection of freethought and its dangers will be a thoroughly fair and masterly one. In his initial paper Father Zimmermann gives a brief word of explanation regarding the early evolution of the system and passes at once to the consideration of freethought in its modern aspect.

As will be recalled, the International Federation was founded in 1880, in Brussels, the names of such Germans as Liebknecht, Büchner, Moleschott, and Carl Vogt figuring prominently in its inception. The history of its rapid spread, however, shows that its aims appealed most effectively to the Latin nations. France has proved to be its land of promise. Its connection with the Portuguese revolution last year, and its insidious influence in the current exploitation of revolutionary ideas in Spain are now denied by no one. Among the German peoples its progress is slower, though none the less marked. In Austria it seems to be only an incident in the socialistic movement.

Outside of Europe, if one neglects a branch of the Freethought World Federation, lately established in Yokohama, available statistics afford certain information only as to its progress in the United States. Here the "Freethought Federation and the American Secular Union" dates its rise from the discussion, in 1892, of the question whether or not the Chicago World's Fair should be thrown open on Sundays. The invitation to a general Congress, held in Chicago, November 25-27, 1910, declared the purpose of the Union to be: "to perfect the separation between Church and State, and to oppose all legislation that appears in any way to favor religion." A strong branch of the International exists in this country, made up of Germans, who support an organ, the Freethinker, regularly published in Milwaukee. The well-known leader, Carl Knortz, complains, however, in the Monist that, "with the exception of the societies of Turners and a few detached bodies, he finds few who are in full accord with the freethought world movement." The Bohemians here in the United States are affirmed to favor the Federation. In a convention of Czechs, assembled in Chicago, in 1907, two hundred and fifty organizations accepted its official program, and a factional split which occurred shortly thereafter among them throws light on the tendencies of the body in America. The older men wished the activities of the Federation to be directed solely against religion; the younger partisans, on the contrary, espoused the cause of a party pledged to work along political and social lines as well. Such is the purpose, they declared, of the freethought movement in Bohemia.

Europeans in close touch with the Federation have long affirmed that Continental Freemasonry was largely responsible for the rapidity with which Freethought has swept over that continent, and the Stimmen article has something to say regarding the intimate connection of the two organizations. Happily, neither this phase of the story of the Federation, nor the other one of its purpose to disturb the social peace by its revolutionary attacks on existing conditions, has as yet come into prominent play in the United States. Still it is well not to be over-assured. The principles of the advocates of freethought, if principles they may be said to have, are incompatible with American institutions. It were wise, then, to inform ourselves of the perils inseparably united with the spread of the movement, to be ready to meet them manfully.

Adios, Diaz

"The President of the republic, the Vice-President of the same, and the Governors of the States can never for any reason be reelected."

This is the proposed constitutional amendment laid before the Mexican Congress on the 4th inst., in the name of the delegation from Lower California. It is impressive in its bluntness, and the speech which accompanied its presentation was startling in its directness of statement.

The fact that any person should venture to suggest such an amendment is deeply significant; for, as the country has known but one President for a generation, so in some of the States there has been but one governor during about the same length of time. Some of these governmental "set pieces" have recently sent in their resignations, and the public are eagerly awaiting similar action on the part of others. "It has to come," comments El Tiempo, "for the law of circumstances, the most exacting of laws, demands it; and those venerable grandees, laden with years and merits, will go far away to live where the bustle of the world and its vanities will not reach them, where nothing will remind them of their quondam greatness, and where, with no risk of interruption, they can bewail to their hearts' content the ingratitude and forgetfulness with which their untiring watchfulness and zeal for the public weal are treated by the millions whose happiness they had sought." Thus it speaks of governors now in office. Could anything prove more clearly the change that has come over Mexico?

When Vice-President Corral's request for leave of absence was discussed in Congress, Deputy Peon del Valle said openly that he was against granting it; what he wanted was Corral's resignation. It was the first manifestation of freedom of utterance that the Congress had heard in years; for the deputies have long been no more than the manikins in a Punch and Judy show, whose one function was to squeak and wriggle in obedience to the wires. But whatever might be thought of frank utterance in the Congress, which, after all, is, theoretically, a coordinate branch of the Government, the matter is very different when we peruse what the licentiate Luis Cabrera gives to the press. After telling us in the columns of the very sedate and cautious El Tiempo that the recent cabinet changes signify no lessening of the preponderant influence of General Diaz in the government, he adds: "I exhort and conjure General Diaz and the whole administration to lay down their arms, to procure union, to put away the proud rebellion that hides itself behind the vague phrase of the 'preservation of the principles of authority,' and to treat frankly and patriotically with the revolutionists about the restoration of peace; and if that can be obtained only by the sacrifice of the political position of General Diaz himself, who has always declared that he sought nothing but the well-being of his country, he must lay the sacrifice of his feelings as a ruler and statesman on the altar of Mexican tranquillity and independence and must retire to private life."

These are bold words, bold even to the verge of rashness; yet the writer is not in prison, the newspaper in which they appeared has not been suppressed. It is sad that there was so much need of them.

As we noted in these columns over four months ago, (Dec. 3, 1910) it looked as if Diaz, who had been necessary, thought that he would always be necessary for Mexico; and therefore he did not step down and out when the proper hour struck. His faulty reading of the signs of the times, his insistence on the election of the unpopular Corral, and the physical decline consequent upon his advanced age, now cause him to be shoved off the stage, instead of retiring in a blaze of glory, as he might have done.

LITERATURE

SOME BOOKS OF VERSE.

The Hill O'Dreams and Other Verses. By HELEN LANYON. New York: John Lane Company. Price, $1.00.

Later Lyrics. By JOHN B. TABB. New York: John Lane Company. Price, $1.00.

The Doorkeeper and Other Poems. By JOHN W. TAYLOR. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Heart Songs. Verses. By MERCEDES. Beatty, Pa.: St. Xavier Academy.

The Unfading Light. By CAROLINE DAVENPORT SWAN. Boston: Sherman, French & Company. Price, $1.25.

The King's Bell and Other Verses. By WILLIAM F. POWER, S.J. Braine-Le-Compte (Belgium): Zech & Son.

Little Rhymes for Little Folks. By P. J. COLEMAN. Somerset, Ohio: The Rosary Press.

Only a very small part of the verses issuing from the houses of the publishers drifts to us. If poetry, as is rumored, is a drug upon the market, we witness the strange anomaly of continued activity in supply in the absence of any demand. The strangeness of such a phenomenon makes us doubt its reality. In any case, the large number of publications in verse at present is a certain sign that much energy and attention are being given to the art of song; and we can feel confident that the widespread forces thus directed may here and there send up blooms worthy of our high literary tradition.

Perhaps not more than one versifier in a hundred prints his verses; and, perhaps, not more than one in ten, of those who do print them, should do so, except for personal reasons. Still, we welcome the growing bulk of these publications as a kind of defiance of that rather raw and untutored judgment which places the "accomplishment of verse" below a strong man's notice. We have yet to learn that contempt or absence of special skill in anything, even in the arts, is in itself a proof of superior common sense. A man should humbly confess his incapacity; it is unfortunate, and often ridiculous, not to be aware of it; but,—to boast about it!

Two general observations occur to us in looking over the volumes whose titles appear at the head of this notice. The first is that there is a rather wide diversity of a certain kind among the authors. Of two we have no information outside of their names; of the remaining five two are Catholic clergymen and college professors; one, a president of a British Medical Society; one, a Catholic nun; and the last, the editor of a magazine. Add to this the general excellence of their work and we have a pleasant illustration of the functions and value of verse-making outside of strictly and exclusively professional literary careers.

Our second observation is that all these volumes are mostly lyrical in the character of their contents. They are, in this respect, quite in harmony with the spirit of the literary period through which we are passing. There seems to be abroad a want of power to make sustained flights of song. Epic, dramatic, and narrative poetry are languishing. The poets may be guiding themselves by the popular trait which finds it difficult to give serious and prolonged attention to anything. But we suspect that a certain nervous restlessness of the times has affected poets and readers alike; an age, which sees the stories of Sir Walter Scott published in abbreviated forms, cannot be considered "spacious" in the Elizabethan sense. It has little patience with slowly evolved effects, the stately progress of elaborate details whose importance is mainly cumulative; it wants its poignancies swift and sharp.

We are not finding fault with the poets or the times. The distinctive character of one age may be inferior to that of another; but, while it remains distinctive, it is worthy of our respect, and any attempt to ignore it in favor of a literary form, which was the natural expression of a by-gone day, is a serious defect of artistic vision. Vitality in art is derived from the living impulses of the hour.

Thus, the "Celtic Movement," the strongest contemporary influence in English poetry, has in our opinion achieved its greatest triumphs in lyric; its worst failures, in dramatic forms of verse. Helen Lanyon in "The Hill O' Dreams" seems to announce the arrival of a new and strong recruit to this remarkable movement which has enlisted in its service a large force of brilliant artistic talents. Her poems have the main characteristics of the school which she represents, plainness, elaborate simplicity, the delicate and subtle idealization of homely things. She has found her sources of inspiration in the natural traits of the Irish people; seldom in the supernatural life which gives them their distinctive charm both individually and as a nation. Beautiful, therefore, as the poems are, we cannot but regret that a higher beauty has been missed. Still, when the eccentricities of thought and mannered affectations of the Celtic revival have been discounted and its superabundant spirit of young enthusiasm has subsided, in the residue of silver silt may perhaps be found some of the sweet poems in this little volume.

It would be hard to discover a greater contrast to the soft, filmy mists of the Celtic manner than the lapidary style of Father Tabb. The magical light shines in both, but with the difference between the firefly of woodland hollows and the severely cut diamond. It is not so much a difference of thought or inspiration, as of form; and here lies the problem for the analyst of poetry. With the same metres, the same tendencies to brevity of expression, to mysticism and the spiritual symbolism of nature, the poetry of Father Tabb is almost as far removed from that of the Celtic revivalists as if it were written in another language. And yet both are characteristically modern. One must write about Father Tabb's poetry either very briefly or very elaborately. As our present space is limited, we shall content ourselves now with the former of the two methods, reserving a hope of treating it at the length which it deserves, on some other occasion.

With the growth of art in the poet, personal and subjective experiences become concealed more and more by immersion in a kind of universal consciousness. The greater poets, while telling us much about themselves, tell us very little of an intimately individual sort. This sharply engraved self-revelation gives to the work of minor poets an attractiveness which halting measures, hackneyed rhymes and phrases, and questionable taste, cannot always destroy. "The Doorkeeper," with its interesting biographical preface, has the personal note, with none of the disagreeable features sometimes too noticeable in the amateur's verses. It is a modest little volume, which, in spite of its unpretentious appearance, contrives to be a triumph of book-making. It is a pleasure to eye and hand and a fit shrine for its gentle and sincere verses. John W. Taylor, M. Sc., F.R.C.S., was a distinguished English physician, who died last year. Apart from its curious interest as coming from a non-Catholic, the following "Ave Maria" will give a fair idea of the author's art and religious spirit:

Blessed Mary, full of grace,
Gazing into Jesus' face,
Oh, that I His Face may see
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Blessed Mary, full of love,
All our greatest far above,
Oh, that I may love like thee;
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Blessed Mary, pure and white,
May my sleep be sweet to-night.
Clean and holy may I be!
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Blessed Mary, when I wake—
Thy work was for Jesus' sake -
For His dear ones may mine be!
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Blessed Mary, patient still,
Quiet under blame or ill,
Oh that I may silent be!
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Blessed Mary, borne on high,
After this life, oh, that I
In thy home with mine may be!
Mother Mary, pray for me.

Son of Mary, Who didst bless
Common life with holiness,
Dwell within this house, and be
Lord of life eternally.

Devotional also in a large measure are most of the remaining volumes. "Heart Songs" are verses redolent of the cloister's subdued fragrance. As we might expect from one, whose singing is a mere interlude between the high duties of the religious life, taking its motive from them and giving voice to their rich silences, the little book in lavender and gold is devout with a devotion not strained or over-fanciful. It is a very pleasing record of the peaceful processes of thought and feeling in Catholic convent-life.

"The Unfading Light," describes in a general way the faith which inspires most of the contents in the volume by Caroline Davenport Swan. In these days of slim brochures and generous margins, this collection is somewhat astonishing in its quantity. The quality, too, is of a high standard; so high indeed that one is tempted to set aside its claims for admiration on the score of its fine thoughtfulness and to judge it severely according to strictly artistic canons. The evidences of a nice sense in the use of epithets and phrases are abundant; and yet at critical junctures, the end of a rhyming line or the close of a sonnet, for instance, haste or something else makes the author careless. We think it must be haste; because in the sonnets and in the elaborately wrought and unrhymed lines of "Monotones," where the rapture has not been so careless, the adjectives and phrases have not been, so often as in the songs, those which happened to be closest to hand. Delicacy and strength, so manifest in poems like "The Soul's Withdrawal," make this volume worthy of attention and inspire the hope that the poet's criticism of her art will grow in stern and wise discontent. The binder did his worst to our copy of the poems by inserting one "form" twice and omitting another entirely. Thus we were disappointed when we turned to the page which should have contained "Vespers in New York."

Father Power has evidently spent much of his time in the college class-room and has conceived a high regard for the students' point of view:

"Moonlight and sham, in most fantastic dress,
Can ne'er make up for inward nothingness.
And 'tis a providential boon indeed
Most modern bards are parlous hard to read."

Thus, in his "Prelude" he takes the college youth into his confidence. Said youth ought to be disposed favorably by such marks of fellowship and community of ideas; and, if he ventures further into these pages, he will not be disappointed. The larger number of the poems are narrative and not too long, based on striking incidents in history and biography. "The King in Disguise," to mention only one and that not by any means superior to others in the volume, ought to be widely known.

For younger persons, as the title indicates, is Mr. Coleman's dainty, paper-covered gathering of verses. The writer has essayed a difficult task and one which inevitably suggests comparison with a master like Robert Louis Stevenson. It is harder to write rhymes for children than for adults; and, if we may say that grown up readers are apt to like these "Little Rhymes" better than are children, we doubt whether the criticism involved in the statement will be considered favorable. "To Dublin Town" has the true ring; the man is forgotten in the boy. "Portmanteau" words do not scare children nearly so much as oppressive condescension; and in some of these rhymes the bending down from superior heights will now and then arouse, we fear, some resentful suspicions on the part of democratic childhood. The "Crystal Pool" is a delightful child-poem: we hope that "crystal," "leaves like ivory," "embossed," "a night of June," will not hurt it in the eyes of youthful readers. The photographic reproductions are charming; but is there not a little incongruity in the combination of photographic realism with the imaginative atmosphere of verses? JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Adventure. By JACK LONDON. New York: The Macmillan Co. Price $1.50.

For the scenes of "Adventure" Mr. London chooses the Solomon Islands. His leading characters are a ladylike man, an Englishman, and a young American woman who is not lacking in gentlemanly accomplishments. A third character, an adventurer the world over, supplies the party of the second part for an extraordinary duel. In the background, there are a body of natives of the Sandwich Islands, who accompany the woman, and in the man's retinue a large following of lesser breeds, cannibal head-hunters.

There is, of course, plenty of adventure. The local coloring is good and the characterization of the two principal figures not wanting in skill. In Mr. London's lexicon there's no such word as dull. Neither is there such a word as supernatural. Why Mr. London's characters should "greatly dare," as they generally do, it is hard to say. Mark Twain has written a study of the ant's foolishness in the way of endeavor. The little creature carries heavy burdens, choosing the most difficult paths,—and all this to no purpose. When one reads of the tremendous toils and sacrifices achieved by Mr. London's people—one wonders why. They are living apparently only for this world. Wherefore, their achievements strike one as being "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Had the author faith, there would be less hardness, more sunshine, more humanity. "Adventure" is a clean story; but the author seems to be forcing his invention and is by no means at his best. FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

A Romance of Old Jerusalem. By FLORENCE GILMORE. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price 50 cents.

One of the favorable signs of the times is the striking multiplications of books having to do with Christ the Man-God. May not this fact be ascribed in great measure to the desire and persistent endeavor of our present Pope "to draw all things unto Christ"? If Miss Gilmore's booklet could be described in one word, that word would, I believe, be pretty. The story is pretty from the first page to the last. Having Christ for its central figure, and treating him in a tone of Catholic reverence and piety, mingling pleasing legend subtly but not confusingly with Gospel truth, the story will appeal alike to simple faith and Norman blood. Miss Gilmore should rejoice to think that in putting forth a story so simple and so charming, she is actually co-operating with the splendid endeavor of Pius X.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

Marriage and Parenthood. The Catholic Ideal. By the Rev. THOMAS J. GERRARD. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. Price, $1.00.

Love and Marriage. By ELLEN KEY. Translated from the Swedish by ARTHUR G. CHATER. With an introduction by HAVELOCK ELLIS. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price $1.50.

Both of these books deal with a vital question, the complex subjects of the relations of the sexes, of the obligations of the married state, and of the organization of the family as the foundation of society. The two writers, however, differ radically in their handling of the question. Miss Key's volume offers a striking example of the extreme views put forward by advocates of the recent exaggerated claims for woman's emancipation; it presents, as well, a capital illustration of the offensiveness to Christian modesty which a too candid thoroughness begets in studies dealing with sex problems and intended for popular reading. The conclusions and recommendations of the Swedish thinker will certainly not be accepted by the Christian moralist, who is guided by his recognition of God's rights in the matters discussed far more than he is influenced by a desire to safeguard the convenience and the well-being of the individual man or woman. The Christian moralist, too, no matter how painstaking and scholarly Miss Key may profess to have been in her investigation of her subject, will regret that her unhealthy probing into sexual relations has not permitted her to be more mindful of the Apostle's word regarding the mention of certain topics. Reticence in these matters has ever been considered an excellent quality in books for popular reading.

Unfortunately, false views of marriage and parenthood are growing common. These concern the most intimate, the most delicate, and the most sacred marriage relationships, and some knowledge and discussion of these topics are forced upon us lest false doctrine be permitted to make headway simply because the true is not present to resist it. Father Gerrard, we believe, meets the situation well. In simple, clear style, and with a delicacy which the protective modesty of a Christian conscience demands, he describes the Catholic ideals regarding marriage and parenthood. To promote and foster these ideals in the face of the loose later-day moral standards to the contrary is the aim the author has in mind in the carefully selected topics he discusses.

* * *

The Story of the Mountain; Mount St. Mary's College and Seminary, Emmitsburg, Maryland. Begun by MARY E. MELINE and continued by Rev. E. F. X. MCSWEENEY, S.T.D. Vol. I. I. Emmitsburg, Md.: The Weekly Chronicle.

As Dr. McSweeney, who took up the work after the death of Miss Meline, also died while writing this "Story of the Mountain," the frequent breaks in the narrative may be easily explained. They had not yet succeeded in arranging the vast amount of matter at their disposal. Thus, for instance, on one page we find a letter from Dubois to Bruté, the expenses incurred for a negro slave, a note from the father of one of the boys, a concession made to the college by the Legislature, etc. In spite of this, however, the book is a mine of information, and will be eagerly searched by future biographers for facts about the great men who from the very beginning shed such lustre on "the Mountain." All the old mountaineers will read with pleasure the interesting notes which the industrious compiler has gathered together.

* * *

Her Journey's End. By FRANCES CLARKE. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.25.

Pauline Faulkner, a wildish kind of a damsel, has been adopted by a rich woman who, strange to say, is an industrial magnate; a fiction which introduces a partial study of the labor question. Pauline's father had been obliged to disappear from public view for reasons that are not explained; nor are we enlightened about the nature of the occupation of the chief villain of the story, who appears under several names. All this makes the plot difficult to follow. Some of the scenes are very melodramatic, especially the rescue of Pauline in the desolate swamp to which she had been carried.

* * *

Geschichte der Verehrung Marias im XVI und XVII Jahrhundert. VON STEPHAN BEISSEL, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The first thing that strikes the reader of the "History of the Devotion to the Blessed Virgin in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries" is the wealth of information contained in this scholarly volume. Indeed, it would be difficult to give in a limited space a more satisfactory account of the history of the Ave Maria, the Angelus, the various forms of the Rosary, the House of Loreto and the Litany of the Blessed Virgin.

The numerous and well printed engravings, whilst they constitute a most attractive feature of the book, are given for the purpose of illustrating the modifications which the devotion to our Blessed Lady underwent under the influence of the ever-changing tastes and tendencies of the generations that inspired them. The author rightly considers the works of religious art the mirror of the life and faith of the men and countries that produced them. The statues and paintings tell us what people thought of the Mother of God, how they pictured her image to themselves, what spiritual favors they hoped to obtain through her intercession. Keeping this principle in view the author invariably explains the meaning and object of the pictures. To do this he deems all the more necessary, as the present generation is but too apt to overlook the religious ideas expressed in Christian art.

Even in a brief notice some of the author's conclusions deserve special mention. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, he says, sermons and poems are not always free from exaggeration. In them the Mother of God is styled "Goddess of angels, goddess of heaven." Such expressions, however, are no proof that Mary was considered equal to God. They must be attributed to an intemperate zeal for classical Latin. Sanctus not being classical in the meaning of "saint," diva and deû were used instead of it. Catholics, of course, need not be told that the Church never exalted the Mother of God above her Divine Son. It is for the benefit of the non-Catholic reader that the author states this elementary truth. Those accustomed to look at the bright side only of the Middle Ages will be surprised to learn that the devotion to our Blessed Lady has grown since the beginning of the Modern Age.

Among the announcements of Catholic books for early publication by Longmans, Green & Co. is noted the first volume of the new series of "Lives of the Friar Saints," entitled "The Life of St. Bonaventure," the second founder of the Franciscans. The lives of the greater number of the canonized Saints of the Orders of St. Francis and St. Dominic, are, comparatively speaking, little known to English-speaking Catholics. The publishers, therefore, hope to produce the books at a uniform and very moderate price to put them within the reach of all.

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Frederick Ozanam; Professor at Sarbonne. His Life and Works. By Kathleen O'Meara. Preface by His Eminence Cardinal Manning. Preface to this Edition by Thomas M. Mulry. New York: The Christian Press Association Publishing Co.
- Cases of Conscience for English Speaking Countries. Solved by the Rev. Thomas Slater, S.J., Vol. I. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $1.75.
- The War Upon Religion. Being an Account of the Rise and Progress of Anti-Christianism in Europe. By the Rev. Francis A. Cunningham. Boston: The Pilot Publishing Co.
- Little Cities of Italy. By André Maurel. With a Preface by Guglielmo Ferrero. 30 Illustrations. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.
- The Practical Catholic. Maxims suited to Catholics of the Day. By Rev. Gabriel Palau, S.J. Authorized American translation by Francis A. Ryan. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 60 cents.
- A Mediæval Mystic. A Short Account of the Life and Writings of Blessed John Ruysbroeck, Canon Regular of Groenendaal, A.D. 1293-1381. By Dom Vincent Scully, C.R.L. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 75 cents.
- A Conversion and a Vocation. Sister Mary of the Sacred Heart. Sophia Ryder. First Novice of the Order of the Good Shepherd in England. Second Edition. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 90 cents.
- An Anthology of Modern English Prose (1731-1892). By Annie Barnett and Lucy Dale. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

EDUCATION

MR. BALFOUR ON EDUCATION.

An Anglican society, established to assist the spread of Christian education, is this year celebrating its centenary. The history of the organization is a worthy record of achievement in its chosen field of effort. Twelve thousand schools have been founded during its hundred years' existence, and its executive body has paid out a sum of more than nine millions and a half pounds sterling in furthering the cause of religious instruction in schools. Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Conservative body in the British House of Commons, was the principal speaker at a recent public commemorative meeting of the society's anniversary. The school problem has long been a vital question in British politics; it has long played a part in the questions agitating the great political organizations in the empire, which, unless all signs fail, it will soon assume among the exigent politics of our own country. It will be of profitable interest, then, to weigh Mr. Balfour's declarations and to study his views regarding the possibility of conciliating the claims of freedom of conscience with the prescriptions of the legislation for public instruction.

We may note that lay, or non-religious education, has few supporters among the English; its partisans, where found at all, being usually identified with the Socialistic groups. In England the conflict is waged between the advocates of an educational system strictly confessional and those who favor the principles of the Bible League. This latter body contends for what Mr. Draper, of New York, has recently proposed, an unsectarian Christian system made up of the fundamental and elementary religious truths on which all religious bodies may be said to be in agreement. This minimum of Christian instruction is satisfactory to none save the non-conformist body, and its members would probably not accept it in theory. Still, in defect of schools conformable to their own ideals, they are satisfied to embrace it as practically sufficient.

* * *

On this point Mr. Balfour expressed himself with unmistakable clearness. In his opinion it is a folly to look upon education as made up of two phases, the religious and the secular, which are separable one from the other in the actual training of the child. Education, he affirms, is one whole process comprising a multitude of formative influences which may not and must not be looked upon as detached and disjointed. To attempt to isolate, as it were, in one compartment, the development of the child mind, rooting itself in the religious convictions of the child, and in another the opening up of its powers following the instruction it receives concerning the world and literature and science, is to completely misunderstand the psychology of the child and to neglect the best means to form and cultivate character.

* * *

In older generations educational work was usually entrusted to charitable and religious associations organized with a special aim to attend to it. Latterly, in our modern day, the State in its masterful pretension to supreme control of society has attempted to oust these bodies and to inject itself into the work. In consequence all over the Christian world discussion has arisen concerning the place the civil government has a right to fill in the education of children. Some believe they solve the problem by surrendering to the State the task of profane instruction. Mr. Balfour does not accept the solution, and he very plainly makes known to his hearers the reasons why he does not. To him this solution is disastrous, and for many reasons. He insists upon one. "If," he says, "instruction be made compulsory, as it has been made in most countries in western Europe, the impossibility of the plan is obvious. The State cannot say to the head of the family: 'You must entrust your child to me and I shall take care of his training. I shall leave to you his religious formation. I shall see that he is properly instructed in arithmetic, orthography, writing, and reading, but you must do what is required to give him proper religious instruction.' If the State chooses to take the child out of the influence of the home and to look to his training during many hours of the day, the State cannot avoid the responsibility of the child's integral formation and it cannot shift its accountability for all other details of that formation save those comprised in profane teaching."

* * *

The reason of this contention of the British statesman is easily understood. Certain words need to be clearly explained lest they lead one into error. To refrain from doing a thing is not always to assume a purely negative attitude, it frequently implies a positive act; an omission, in consequence, is at times itself a serious fault. The fact that the State refrains from touching religion in education is a dangerous attitude to adopt. To ignore the essential influence of religion in education is practically to condemn religion. And this practical condemnation of religion by the State is made a more heinous matter by the manner in which the State adapts itself to the plans of those who hold other views regarding religious training in schools.

* * *

This is the light in which Mr. Balfour views it. Speaking to the members of the association above referred to, he says: "And the State has ordinarily showed itself rather shabby in dealing with organizations like your own. It says to you: 'If you agree to replace the government in its special mission, the government will allow you to consecrate your activities to this spiritual mission. We will concede to you the right to teach religion, on one condition. You must spend enormous sums and you must put upon yourselves a heavy burden of sacrifice in order to build your schools, and impart public instruction.' In one word, in forcing you to assume the expenses which manifestly should be borne by itself, the State makes you pay dearly for the privilege of training children in their Christian faith."

* * *

Mr. Balfour has a word to say, too, regarding the poor sophism current among modern freethinkers, that instruction ought to be kept separate from dogma. He pointedly insists on the truth that elementary training is necessarily dogmatic, and that when one seeks to explain something to a child—he might very well have added to many a man and woman as well—one must use precise and accurate phrasings. "I am informed," he continued, "that mathematicians themselves confess that the fundamental truths of their science are full of difficulties in the logical and speculative order. When, however, they start to impart to their pupils the initial lessons regarding the four fundamental operations, they do not introduce them first of all to these difficulties. They teach them arithmetic, and they do it using decidedly dogmatic notions. In any other way they would impart no knowledge. Instruction, if it means anything, means the explanation of simple truth dogmatically professed by a master. Dogma is to be deemed an accurate synonym of instruction."

* * *

The distinguished English statesman went on to show the folly of another solution of the religious phase of the school problem. And this portion of his address merits the careful attention of quite a number of well-meaning educators here in America. Mr. Balfour holds to be absurd the proposition giving to State authorities the privilege of extracting from the deposit of Christian truth a common elementary symbol which will prove to be acceptable to all professing Christians, no matter how they may vary among themselves in the details of their belief. To suggest the teaching of such a symbol in State schools, as a satisfactory meeting of the requirements of religious instruction for all pupils is no way to settle the controversy. "As far as I am concerned," said England's Conservative leader, "I have always cherished the hope that our elementary State schools eventually would be so conducted as to secure to every child the kind of religious instruction his parents desire him to receive. Probably I should say, since no human system is perfect, to the large majority of our children. This is the sole solution which appeals to me as strictly compatible with our ideas of religious liberty, of parental responsibility, and of the primordial necessity of religious training in children's education. I hold it to be an evil, aye, the greatest of all evils, to permit children to be brought up in schools in which no provision is made for religious formation. And I solemnly express to-day my hope that England will never accept the responsibility of public instruction without religion. Let us then frankly face the situation; recognizing, as we must, the insistent demands of parents for the Christian education of their children, let us map out a public school program in which the legitimate claims of parents will be acceded to, and provision will be made to render possible religious instruction at the expense of the State, at least in the case of the large majority of the children of this land."

* * *

Mr. Balfour's concluding words may be quoted for the special benefit of the secularists among us: "We are all persuaded that the State which seeks by its legislation to effect a divorce between religion and the elementary teaching of children, is following the worst conceivable policy for the service of future generations."

* * *

Catholics will cordially approve the stand of Mr. Balfour. Were further declaration of their position in the question needed, it may be found in a recent statement made by Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee.

"We have founded our Schools," he says, "without the State, we have kept and supported them without the State, we have brought them up to the present high standard of efficiency without the State, and with the help of God we shall continue this glorious work without the State. Not that I would refuse the State support, justly due to us, for the results we furnish by the secular education given in our schools. But I would at the same time maintain the absolute independence of our schools as to their religious character and internal management. Let the State examine our children and if our work is up to the standard required by the State, then in the name of all that is fair and just, let the State pay its share towards the support of our schools. If our work is not satisfactory, we shall not ask for the state compensation. What American, be he Christian, Jew or infidel, can object to such a fair demand which will 'give to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's'?"

At a meeting of the Connecticut Valley Branch Alumni Association of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., the Rev. Thomas E. Murphy, S.J., president of Holy Cross, said that there are in the college 520 students following the classical course, a larger number than in any other Catholic College in the United States. He gave statistics showing the professions which alumni follow: clergymen, 380; physicians and surgeons, 178; lawyers, 172; teachers, 124; students of theology, 67; students of medicine, 34; students of law, 40; journalists, 16; miscellaneous, 41. The total number of alumni is 1,226.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

"The Catholic Church and the Bible Centenary" was the theme of a sermon preached in England recently by the Rev. Norbert Jones, C.R.L., the following abstract of which was printed in the Liverpool Catholic Times:

The Catholic Church not only created the Christian pulpit, she also gave the world the Holy Bible which she read and explained in her sermons from the pulpit. John Wycliffe tried to pervert the Bible from its lawful place and used it to uphold the anarchy and communism preached by the Lollards whom he founded. This abuse the Catholic Church rightly condemned. John Wycliffe did not give the people for the first time the whole Bible in English. History proves that the Catholic Church had given us the whole English Bible long before Wycliffe was born. We know this, continued Father Jones, from Protestant authorities such as Cranmer and John Foxe, and on the express testimony of Sir Thomas More, the Lord Chancellor of England. Even to those unable to read, the Catholic Church gave the "Poor Man's Bible," written in a language all could read and understand. It was unhistorical to assert, then, as certain speakers had done during the recent tercentenary, that Wycliffe was the first to give the people an English Bible. It was now abundantly clear that Wycliffe borrowed whole Books from the older English Catholic Bible, which he plagiarised and appropriated as though it were all his own, a clever but a very dishonest trick. Let them read the scholarly book on this subject by Abbot Gasquet, entitled "Wycliffe and the English Bible," in proof of this fact, supported by Protestant standard authorities. Much has been made of William Tyndale's so-called Bible, but we now know it was a corruption from a badly translated German one, partly Luther's Bible, but much more added by Tyndale himself to further Lutheranism. Words were put into it by him that were not in the original version at all in order to attack the fundamental doctrines of the Christian Church. Moreover, he added to God's Word long and copious footnotes and marginal references crammed with most abusive and inflammatory notes assailing all the sacred teachings and the worship of the Catholic Faith. No less than two thousand literary errors and mistranslations were found in Tyndale's so-called Bible. Nor did Tyndale translate the Bible as a whole, but only the New Testament and one or two Old Testament Books. Others had been falsely ascribed to him which history now has shown to be purely fabulous.

The Catholic Church had already the whole Bible in English and Englishmen did not want the spurious concoction of Tyndale's which, like English State Protestantism, was most un-English, nay, an inferior article not up to standard but "made in Germany." Tyndale was not burnt at the stake for anything to do with religion, but for fomenting by his writings, with confederates of his, political turmoil and fanaticism against the authorities of Church and State in Augsburg (Germany). It was done by the German Emperor, not by the Church. He had much to do with inciting the revolutionary horrors there which culminated in the thirty years' war. He and his party only used religion as a cloak for furthering their own political shibboleths. To call him a religious martyr is simply a perversion of historical facts.

As to the authorized version of the Protestant Bible, it certainly deserved the eulogiums bestowed upon it as to its pure and elegant English language and style. Here, however, a few significant facts to the credit of the Catholic Church should be supplied, which were omitted by the preachers and speakers during this Protestant tercentenary of the authorized Version. In the first place, the English Catholic Douay Bible was fully two years older than the authorized Protestant one. The Catholic Rheims version in English was nearly forty years older still. Those who made the authorized Protestant version, about which so much is being said of its originality, drew largely from the Catholic Rheims translation, so excellent an aid did they find it to be; in fact, as a Protestant writer says: "It represents a modification of a medieval Catholic version of the Vulgate, and represents the tongue of no historical epoch, but is an artificial product selected with exquisite care from the sacred felicities of two centuries and a half" (Edmund Gosse's "Modern English Literature").

"The influence of the Catholic Rheims version on the Protestant authorized version is very considerable, and the compilers of the latter borrowed largely from this older Catholic English version, with no other acknowledgment than a gibe" (Dr. Curleton (Protestant) on the Authorized Version). Then, with all that has been said, the Protestant Bibles of every version are seven Books short of the whole Bible as accepted by Christendom at large. There are seven more Books in the whole Bible, which the Catholic Church possesses, so hers is the Standard Bread of God's Written Word, while the authorized is below the standard quality in weight.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has no centenaries. It is but a century old. The oldest and the only Divinely-founded Bible Society is the Catholic Church, and her centenary counts two score already, for she started in the first year Anno Domini, and covers all the past centuries from then till now. The mass of Protestants to-day neither have, nor do they read, the Bible, nor do they care for it. Go round to the majority, one will find the cheap and suggestive penny-dreadful, the penny Sunday paper full of the week's unsavory crimes, and the rationalistic pamphlets sold on certain bookstalls, but in very few will one find the Bible. An Anglican vicar searched round his parish and found no Bible in any house except that of a devout Catholic family. The Catholic Church never put anyone to death for the Bible, but many of her priests and people were put to death for its defence and preservation during the persecution of Diocletian (fourth century). To her alone we owe the Bible to-day, and from her pulpit all who attend, both Catholic and Protestant, will hear to their great spiritual profit the doctrines of the Bible and the preaching of Christ Crucified.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The twenty-second International Eucharistic Congress will take place in Madrid, Spain, on June 24-29, 1911. There will be three general sessions: June 26 and 27, at half-past four o'clock, p.m., and June 28, at half-past ten o'clock, a.m. A special committee has undertaken to provide accommodations for workingmen who may assist at the Congress. In the list of subjects suggested for papers by the delegates to the Congress may be noted the Eucharistic Traditions of Spain, the Mozarabic Rite, a Eucharistic bibliography of Spain and Spanish-speaking countries, the Irish Colleges in Salamanca and Valladolid, Eucharistic Leagues, local, national and international, the work of the Tabernacle Societies for supplying vestments to poor churches, and a paper on the most notable musical productions in honor of the Holy Eucharist.

At the annual dinner of the Massachusetts State Council, Knights of Columbus, at the Hotel Somerset, Boston, on April 19, there were 500 Knights in attendance. State Deputy William J. O'Brien, who presided, stated that the order in Massachusetts has made greater advance in the past year than ever before. The Rev. P. J. Supple represented Archbishop O'Connell, who was unable to attend. Father Supple said in part: "This order will do well to preserve intact the feeling of brotherhood which the Church exemplifies as no other institution in the world. The needs of the Church are great at the present time, and the issues which confront her call for union of all her forces. The time for the organization of all Catholic forces has come." Supreme Knight James A. Flaherty said that "the question of affiliation with the Federation of Catholic Societies would be given consideration by the national body." Andrew J. Shipman, of New York, in an address on "A Vision of American Citizenship," urged all Catholics to take a most active part in all public questions and social activities. Mayor Fitzgerald told of the great possibilities of an organization such as the Knights of Columbus in Boston and the part it should play in the city's advancement. District Attorney Pelletier was chairman of a reception committee of one hundred members of the order.

Subscriptions for the Cardinal Gibbons Memorial Hall at the Catholic University, to commemorate the golden jubilee of his Eminence's ordination to the priesthood and his silver jubilee as Cardinal, are mounting rapidly. Mgr. George W. Devine, pastor of St. John's Catholic Church, Baltimore, heads the clergy with a donation of $2,000. Mr. Michael Jenkins leads the laymen with a total of $7,000, which is given as a memorial to his wife, who died recently. Archbishop Farley, of New York, sent in a check for $1,000 and Mgr. T. J. Shahan, Rector of the Catholic University, gave a like amount. Not only are Catholics contributing, but men of other denominations are helping. Mr. Theodore Marburg sent $1,000 and Mr. Ross W. Winans $500. From small towns throughout the State of Maryland have come donations ranging from $5 to $500, and now the fund has grown to about $45,000.

The annual reunion of the members of the Maynooth Union of the United States took place at the Hotel Astor, this city, on April 26, under the presidency of the Rev. D. L. Lavery, of St. Louis, Mo. The Right Rev. Mgr. Charles McCready, of New York, is the organizer of this union of old Maynooth students.

Bishop Hartley, of Columbus, has taken the lead in furthering the arrangements of the executive committee now engaged on the local details for the eleventh annual national convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, which will meet in his see city, August 20-23.

The annual national conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul has been called for June 4-7, at Boston, Mass. About 400 delegates, men and women from all parts of the United States, are expected to attend.

We take the following items from the Report of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul of Chicago, for 1910:

Number of conferences reporting	52
" " active members.....	889
" " visits made.....	14,408
" " situations procured..	290
Receipts	$24,600
Expenditures	17,935

Special work committees submit reports on their work in hospitals, public asylums and missions in four districts. Nearly ten new Conferences have been organized during the past year. Altogether, the impression conveyed by the interesting Report is one of consolation that so much Catholic charity has been exercised, mixed with a great deal of regret that more Catholic men in the large city of Chicago are not actively interested in the society of Saint Vincent de Paul.

Complaints that Catholics are not generous in subscribing notable amounts for Church purposes seem to be contradicted by the experience of Auxiliary Bishop Mundelein, of Brooklyn. He is pastor of St. John's Chapel, one of the smallest parishes in the Borough, the membership being about 3,500 souls. A new church and school are much needed, and the Bishop has taken up two collections for the building fund. In the first he received $48,000, and in the second $78,000. In this result of $126,000 for just two offerings, he is priding himself on holding the parish collection record for the United States.

SOCIOLOGY

The Gaelic League delegates, representing the Language and Industrial movements in Ireland, have addressed successful meetings and established organizations in New York, Boston, Springfield, Philadelphia, St. Louis and other centres, with the object of stimulating interest and obtaining financial support. They are armed with strong endorsements from the bishops, clergy and lay leaders of all classes, urging the moral and national advantages of reviving the language, music, industries, customs, and the intellectual and social life that were characteristic of Ireland at its best. In connection with the language movement and for its benefit four young ladies are giving an exhibition of industrial work and of the various kinds of Irish lace.

In his new book, "Idola Fori," W. S. Lilly tells how he met two ladies enraptured over a bargain. They had bought a dozen beautiful shirt-waists in Regent Street, London, at half a crown, that is sixty cents, each. They termed the bargain miraculous; and, to celebrate it, asked him to dine. The hostess gave a five pound note for the dinner, and did not get much change. Taking leave of his friends, Mr. Lilly walked towards Kensington. Seeing a girl in danger of being run down by a carriage, he caught her by the arm and saved her. She collapsed and was on the verge of hysterics. "No, sir," said a constable, "it is not drink, but hunger." Mr. Lilly questioned her and found that she was a shirt-waist worker, and worked for the shop of the miraculous bargain, making shirt-waists at four shillings a dozen, or fourpence each, to be sold for half a crown to ladies who did not scruple to pay five pounds for a dinner. It seemed incredible, but on investigation her story was found to be absolutely true.

Many things in Japan are admirable, and again many things are deplorable. Of these one of the most deplorable is the propaganda of Rationalism to which, with its fierce attacks on Christianity, such newspapers as the Japan Mail, surrender their columns. Sawayanagi Masataro, devoted to Old Japan, has published two volumes in which he laments the decay of filial piety, the foundation of Japanese morals, which he ascribes to the new spirit, the decline of Buddhism, Individualism, western education and the neglect of family etiquette. We may remark in passing, that he exaggerates filial piety so as to make it a vice, since he would have no other rule of right and wrong than the father's will. Of the five causes of the decay, the immediate one is individualism; and Inoue Tetsujiro, agreeing with him, puts down Christianity as the chief cause of this, as it teaches personal rights, of which Old Japan knew nothing.

Both Rationalist and Reactionist oppose Christianity; the former because it contradicts his exaggerated individualism, the latter because it contradicts his exaggerated self-effacement. To the thinking Japanese this should be a strong argument in its favor, since true virtue stands midway between the contrary exaggerations of vice. Moreover, if the Japanese know anything of western history they must have observed that Rationalism is essentially destructive. It has never made a patriot, it has led no nation to greatness, it is the enemy of what is noblest in man. As for exaggerated filial piety, it not only makes one man's arbitrary will the rule of another's conduct, but it also suddenly and violently transforms the same individual from a mere instrument of another into an irresponsible master of the actions of others. To-day he is his father's slave; to-morrow, a father, he is the despot of his children—an absurdity.

OBITUARY

On April 18, Rev. Louis A. Campbell, for nearly a quarter of a century the efficient pastor of St. Catherine's parish in Austin, a suburb of Chicago, died in Milwaukee, Wis. Father Campbell was born in La Salle, Ill., fifty-six years ago. Early in the 70's he went to Chicago, entering the business house of his uncle, Patrick Brennan, whom the old-timers of the Holy Family parish will recall as a leading member of that west side community in the days of its early greatness. In 1878 the deceased priest offered himself as a candidate for the priesthood to Bishop Thomas Foley and after the usual seminary studies he was ordained for the diocese of Chicago. The young priest's first charge was the Newsboys' Home, which he founded and conducted with signal success for three years. A brief service as curate in St. Jarlath's followed, after which he was named pastor and charged with the building of the new St. Catherine's in Austin.

The suburb was then sparsely settled and numbered but few Catholics within its limits, and Father Campbell had the gratification to live through the days marking the growth of a parish since become one of the most flourishing in the Archdiocese. Spending practically his entire life as a priest among them, he was known and loved by nearly every man, woman and child in Austin. For some years his health had been failing, and for the last few months he had been under treatment in the Sacred Heart Sanitarium in Milwaukee, where he passed peacefully away.

The Right Hon. Sir Elzéar Taschereau, former Chief Justice of Canada, died at his home in Ottawa on Good Friday. He had had a distinguished career at the bar and on the bench and was one of Canada's foremost judicial authorities. Born in Canada in 1836, Sir Elzéar was educated at the Quebec Seminary and called to the Bar in 1857. He was appointed a Judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec in 1871, and a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1878. He received the degree of LL.D from Laval University in 1890, and two years later was promoted to the position of Chief Justice of Canada. This office he resigned in 1906. His works on legal procedure are highly esteemed in Canada and "The Criminal Law for the Dominion of Canada" and "Le Code de Procédure Civile de Bas-Canada" have become handbooks for the profession. The Most Rev. S. G. Gauthier, Archbishop of Ottawa, presided at the funeral service, which took place in the new Church of the Sacred Heart.

On April 7, Mother Mary Agnes, of the Community of the Immaculate Conception, died at Mount St. Mary's Convent, Leeds, England, in her seventy-first year. She was the last survivor of those who founded the Community in Leeds fifty years ago. She helped also to establish the orphanage for girls attached to the convent and collected funds for this work in Ireland and the north of England.

On the same day occurred the death of the Rev. Edmund Buckler, O.P., at the age of seventy-seven. He was received into the Church by Father Faber in 1851 and became a Dominican a few years later. Honored by his brethren with the office of Prior which he held successively in several convents of his Order, he also endeared himself to the people by unfailing kindness of disposition and his fatherly interest in all who sought his counsel or aid. He celebrated the golden jubilee of his priesthood last September.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 4

(Price 10 Cents)

MAY 6, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 108

CHRONICLE

Senate Breach Wider—Senator Frye Resigns—House of Representatives—Philippine Question Revived—Held as Times Dynamiters—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Portugal—France—Belgium—Germany—Austria-Hungary—Turkey.....73-76

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The German Centre, Yesterday and To-day—The Pope and Europe—Who Exalted Braga?—A Work of Providence, II.....77-82

IN MISSION FIELDS

On the Fishery Coast.....82-83

CORRESPONDENCE

The Blight of Anti-Clericalism in Rome—Spanish Cabinet Changes—The Rising in Albania.....83-85

EDITORIAL

The $50,000 Bible—State Care of Children—Catholic Women's Colleges—Sunday Comic Supplements—The Dean of the Despots—Notes.....86-89

CONCERNING CARIBS.....89-90

LITERATURE

A Roman Diary and Other Documents Relating to the Papal Inquiry into English Ordinations MDCCCXCV—The Brownies' Whispers—The Siege of Boston—Frederick Ozanam—Books Received.....90-92

EDUCATION

Young Men in Old Men's Places—Sane Methods in College Work—University Specialization Encroaching on the Small College System—Defective American Educational Methods as Shown in Rhodes Scholars at Oxford—The School Question in England.....92-93

ECONOMICS

War on the Ocean Traffic Trust—Death Duties in England—Temperance and Diminished Beer Profits.....93

SOCIOLOGY

New Scheme for Simplifying the Calendar....93

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Apostate Priest Vardesi to be Sued for Libel.....93-94

SCIENCE

To Make Weather Forecasts Scientific and Reliable—New Method for Purifying Feed Water—New Substitute for Radium—Why the Sky is Luminous on a Starlit Night—Sterilizing Water by Bleaching Powder—Aluminium Bronze for Coinage.....94

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies—Progress in the Cause of Bishop Neumann's Beatification—Archbishop O'Connell Going to Belgium—Mrs. Walsh Honored by the Pope—Impostors Collecting for Colored Mission Work—The Louisiana Catholic Federation.....95-96

OBITUARY

Rev. William St. Elmo Smith.....96

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Cincinnati's Sisters' Schools.....96

CHRONICLE

Senate Breach Wider.—The disaffection in Republican ranks which threatens Republican supremacy in the Senate assumed grave proportions during the week when the regular Republicans in caucus refused to meet three demands of the progressives. These demands were that Senator La Follette be given a place on the Committee on Interstate Commerce; Bristow on Foreign Relations, and Cummins on Finance. One demand was granted that Mr. Bourne be appointed to the Appropriations Committee. Senator Gallinger, chairman of the Republican Committee on Committees, held that the committees were already filled and that it was inexpedient to enlarge them, adding that the progressives had been shown all due consideration and given all the committee assignments to which they were entitled. The action of the insurgents emphasizes the present state of disorganization of the Republican party. The insurgents demand consideration as a separate party and not as Republicans. They do not appear to consider the regular Republicans on the committees as representing them any more than the Democratic Senators represent them. In fact, they represent them less, for the insurgent Republicans are much closer to the Democratic side than to the Republican side and it is likely that they will vote with the Democrats at least as frequently as with the party to which they nominally belong. When the names suggested for these committee appointments came up for approval in the Senate, however, only two of the insurgents voted in the negative.

Senator Frye Resigns.—On account of ill-health, Senator William P. Frye, of Maine, has tendered his resignation as temporary presiding officer of the Senate. Senator Frye, now in his eighty-first year, has been a member of the Senate since 1881 and expects to serve out his present term, which expires March 4, 1913. At the end of that time he will have completed forty-three years in Congress, ten in the House and thirty-three years in the Senate. For seven years he ruled over the Senate, taking the gavel at the death of Vice-President Hobart, and again when Col. Roosevelt became President upon the death of President McKinley. Senator Frye's dealings with his colleagues were uniformly dignified, courteous and impartial.

House of Representatives.—The bill for the apportionment of representatives in Congress under the thirteenth census, as adopted by the House, provides for a new House of 433 members, instead of 391, as at present. Under the new apportionment, the State of New York gains six members, Pennsylvania four, New Jersey two, Illinois two, Massachusetts two and California three. The unit of representation is 211,877. —Victor Berger, of Milwaukee, the Socialist member of Congress, wishes not only to abolish the Senate but to deprive the President of the veto power and to take from the courts authority to invalidate legislation enacted by the House of Representatives. All this he proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which, if asked for by five per cent. of the voters in each State, shall be submitted to a general referendum. "The Senate has run its course," said Mr. Berger, "and it must some day, as with the British House of Lords, yield to the popular demand for its reformation or abolition."

Philippine Question Revived.—Representative Cox, of Ohio, is at the head of a movement of Democratic Congressmen to make the Philippines and their independence a party measure at this session of Congress. At the next meeting of the majority caucus he will ask that a resolution calling upon the War Department for a statement showing what the islands have cost the United States since the American occupation, be made a part of the majority program. This resolution Mr. Cox regards as an entering wedge toward neutralization of the Islands. "The Philippine situation," said Mr. Cox, "is the most menacing before us. Wars of the future will be over lands in the Orient. If the people could see what the Philippines have cost, I am positive that the islands and their future would be accorded serious and immediate consideration. Neutrality of the islands could be arranged for by treaty."

Held as "Times" Dynamiters.—John J. McNamara, secretary and treasurer of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, his brother James B. McNamara and Ortie E. McManigal, accused of complicity in the blowing up of the Los Angeles Times newspaper plant last October, when twenty-one men were killed, were lodged in the Los Angeles jail on April 26. John J. McNamara was arrested at his home in Indianapolis; the two other men were arrested in Detroit on April 12, and thence taken first to Chicago, where they were guarded night and day in a private house. John J. McNamara has always been regarded as a quiet unassuming man of good character. The evidence by which the detectives hope to connect the prisoners with the dynamiting of The Times plant has not all been made public. The luggage of the two active agents is said to have contained infernal machines and devices for setting off explosives. To connect the iron workers' secretary and treasurer with the explosives the only fact disclosed is the alleged finding of explosives concealed in the building occupied as a headquarters of the union and of more explosives in a barn, the owner of which is said to have declared that they had been placed there by the secretary and treasurer of the union. It is hoped that the authorities will proceed with the utmost fairness and with scrupulous regard for the regularity of the methods employed to obtain conviction.

Mexico.—The temporary armistice between the government and the Madero forces has not caused a suspension of all warlike action, for there are bands of revolutionists who do not recognize Madero's headship. They are scattered through the country and have been active even in the Federal District, but they seem to be bent on plunder rather than revolution. The Socialist revolution continues as before the cessation of hostilities, for it is equally against Diaz and Madero. A rich planter named Jose Gonzalez was captured in a skirmish with the revolutionists near Torreon, and although he offered a ransom of one hundred thousand pesos, he was placed against a wall and shot. The strike of the students in the school of agriculture was due to poor food and unsanitary conditions; that in the medical school was declared because the students that had failed in their examinations were those and only those who were known to be unfavorable to the re-electionist program. They attacked the president of the school with a volley of over-ripe tomatoes, sapodilla plums and eggs, and then made a demonstration on the streets. Both presidents have been superseded and the students have returned to their books.

Canada.—The Conservatives have resolved to fight Reciprocity inch by inch in Parliament, hoping to bring about a general election on the question.—A conciliation board has been appointed to attempt the settlement of the coal strike in Alberta and British Columbia.—Trouble is brewing between the Canadian Pacific Railway and its mechanics, though there is a prospect of averting it.—The navigation season opened in Montreal with the arrival of the Royal George, April 28.—Protestant agitation over the Hébert marriage case continues. Marie Clouatre, one of the interested parties, has been induced to withdraw her consent to the decree of the civil court and to apply to have it rescinded. If she persists the case will eventually reach the Privy Council. The English papers support the agitation more or less. Not long ago the Conservative press appealed to the Catholics for support against Reciprocity, pointing out that, should annexation follow, they would lose the religious rights they now enjoy. Unless the same press can prevail upon its followers to refrain from seizing every opportunity to attack those rights, Catholics will probably think that it makes very little difference whether they are lost in annexation, or at the dictation of a truculent Protestant faction.—The immigration of negroes into the West is causing some discontent.—The opening of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to Edson, beyond Edmonton, is bringing a large influx of settlers into the Peace River country.

Great Britain.—The Unionists have regained Cheltenham by a narrow majority in the election consequent on the unseating of the Liberal member. The Liberals retain the seat vacated by Lord Haldane by a majority reduced through Liberal abstentions natural in a by-election regarding a safe constituency. The two parties in Parliament now number: Unionists 273, Liberals 269.—Lord Kitchener, though raised to the peerage twelve years ago, has just taken his seat for the first time, foreign service having prevented him hitherto.—The Rhondda Vale colliery strike still continues, having lasted six months. Attempts at agreement have been partially successful, but the main differences continue without prospect of approaching settlement.—The Times announces that the Chilean warship Esmeralda left Santiago de Chile for the coronation review on April 22. It does not say whether the first part of the voyage was made overland or through the air. Germany should build ships of this amphibious type for the invasion of England it is said to be planning. But perhaps, the Times notwithstanding, the Esmeralda sailed really from Valparaiso.—The Government has introduced a Bill requiring aliens to give sureties for good behavior for the five years after their arrival. Breaches of the peace will lead to expulsion, and an expelled alien returning will be liable to two years imprisonment.—The Wallesley Council (Cheshire) contracted for 12,000 souvenir coronation mugs in Germany. Much indignation is the result. One person has promised an English-made mug to every child who refuses publicly the German article when offered, or breaks it in presence of the authorities (which is bad training for children), and many parents have undertaken that their children shall not attend the presentation ceremony. The cheapness of the German mug is the Council's excuse.—The armored cruiser Princess Royal is the latest addition to the navy. It is of 26,350 tons, 70,000 horse-power, armed with eight 13.5 inch guns and a secondary battery of twenty 4-inch guns. The speed is designed to be 30 knots.—South Africa follows the example of Australia in refusing to send a representation to the Festival of Empire.

Ireland.—On the Amendment to exclude Home Rule from the scope of the Veto Bill, Mr. Asquith said that the measure was a means, not an end, and that Home Rule was one of the ends it was intended to accomplish. Mr. Balfour objected that the people did not know, when returning a Liberal majority, that they were voting for Home Rule, but when a member interjected, "you yourself said so," he accepted the correction. An attempt to put Wales on an equality with Ireland in the matter of self-government was voted down by the Welsh National Council, and Mr. Griffith, M.P., the Welsh leader, said in Mr. Redmond's presence at Holyhead: "There is no conflict of interest, and next year will see both Irish Home Rule and Welsh Disestablishment passed; and to suggest its postponement until a scheme of general devolution is elaborated is unjust to Ireland and destructive of the forces of progress." Mr. Redmond said, "The claim for recognition of their indestructible nationality, and for the preservation of their national language, music, traditions and customs was the same in Wales and in Ireland," but not equally urgent, for in Ireland "it is a case of life or death." He added: "We do not want to separate; we want our place in the Empire that we helped to build; and we refuse to submit to be put in the position of the only community of white men of any race who are denied the right of governing themselves in their own local affairs." Lord Courtney addressed a non-partizan meeting in Dublin in favor of proportional representation under Home Rule, the enactment of which he, though a Unionist, took for granted. The country would be divided into districts with six or eight members each, and the votes would be so manipulated that majorities would get representation and no votes would be lost. The voter would indicate his preference by placing the numbers 1, 2, 3, etc. after the candidates' names. A sample ballot resulted satisfactorily and the scheme met with approval. His principle was: To be strong in your strength you must recognize all your fellows in proportion to their strength.—The National Teachers' Convention drew up what they called a Litany of Ills, showing astounding disproportion between the Government's treatment of education in Ireland and Great Britain. English teachers are paid 50 per cent. more for the same work and standard, and while the Irish building grants have been lowered the British appropriations have been raised by millions. The remedy stated is, an Irish government managing education through representative commissioners according to Irish ideas.

Portugal.—The number of delegates to the future Constitutional Convention has been fixed at 235. Authentic news is still very hard to obtain, for the rigid censorship of newspapers and even of private correspondence continues in full force. Denunciations of so-called "conspirators" are of daily occurrence, but the object of the administration is rather to remove from all political activity men whose nation-wide reputations might make them a power in the approaching election. Even respectable women have been thrown into jail for no greater crime than that of complaining of the "public unrest." The daughter of a minority that is anarchistic rather than republican, the Portuguese Republic has been unwilling or unable or has not known how to relieve itself of the harmful influences of its parentage; and it still remains subject to the control of the handful of Carbonari who, thanks to the treason of some, the cowardice of others, and the indifference of many more, have been able to impose themselves upon the country. The members of the hierarchy will meet on May 8 to determine upon a course of action in the face of the new problems that confront them.

France.—On April 24, a large column of troops left the town of Rabat to relieve Fez, which is forty miles away. Another column of 10,000 is being despatched to Casablanca.—The Action Populaire held a congress at Paris from the 20th to the 23d of April. England was represented by Mgr. Parkinson and Hilaire Belloc, M. P., Belgium by Canon Douterlungne, Director of the Social Works of Tournai. Holland, Italy, Spain, Switzerland and Germany sent their representatives. The closing session was presided over by the Count de Mun.—On April 27 France notified the signatories of the Algeiras Conference that intervention in Morocco by France had become necessary to restore order.—Five years ago Clemenceau challenged Jaurès to tell the nation what he meant by a Socialist State. He accepted the challenge and has just laid on the table of the House of Deputies a bulky volume of 700 pages. Singularly enough he is for defending the frontiers, not, however, by the present army, but by a sort of compromise between regular troops and volunteer militia. Arms are to be stored in designated centres, so that the citizens can help themselves—a very dangerous invitation to the first band of rioters.—France has at last sent its greetings to Italy, and “associates itself with the national joy which she manifests in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of her liberation and unity.”—Paris is just now agitated by the scandals of the sale of decorations, genuine and otherwise, by a functionary of the Government, and by the theft of papers from the Foreign Office. The papers are said not to be very compromising.—At the Socialist Congress, at St. Quentin, it was agreed that no Parliamentary representative of the Social-Democracy should ever again become a member of a bourgeois Ministry, and that the party was irreconcilably opposed to the bourgeois class. Jules Guesde protested against the purchase of the railways by the State, as they had been originally stolen from the people.—Meantime, the Labor leader, “King” Pataud, has declared against the Freemasons and advised his followers never to wear the apron.

Belgium.—The Bien Public regards the Socialist campaign against the schools only as a preliminary to revolution, and calls attention to the fact that the Socialist leader Vandervelde, in a recent discourse, urged the Belgians to imitate the Portuguese.—All the Liberal papers are exhorted to unite in killing Schollaerts’ School Bill. Meantime, also an attack has been made upon Louvain, which receives no help from the State. The project is to withdraw from it the power of giving diplomas to its students, and to force it in that fashion to be on the same footing as the other universities, namely, dependent on the State.—Police investigations indicate that the burning of the Town Hall of Schaerbeek, a suburb of Brussels, was the work of incendiaries. The damage is $600,000.

Germany.—The German imperial census of December last shows a curious change in the proportion of males to females in the population, which is gradually shifting to the advantage of the male element. The respective percentages of increase during the last five years (1905-10) are 7.18 for males and 6.88 for females. The masculine increase is being attained in spite of a greater male death rate, which is 18.1 per thousand, against 16.2 per thousand for women. The German death rate continues to fall regularly, the latest rate, 17.1 per thousand, in Prussia, being the lowest yet recorded.—A strike and a lockout have stopped all work at the Schichau shipyard, Danzig, delaying the completion of the battleships Oldenburg and Aegir. Two weeks ago 900 workers struck work, and the 1,300 men remaining in the yard refused to assume the duties of those who went out. The Director, in consequence, decided to lock out the whole force.—Germany will have under arms in connection with the field maneuvers this summer over 1,000,000 men. In addition to the regular army strength of 622,000 men, over 355,000 reservists will be called to the colors. Adding to these the men serving with the fleet, an armed force of considerably more than 1,000,000 will be engaged in the gigantic war game.—One of the German representatives in the German-American potash controversy stated to-day that all American interests would participate in the negotiations at Hamburg on May 10. It had been reported that the American independents would deal separately with the German syndicate. It is believed here that the coming conference will result in a settlement of the whole matter.—There has been, says the semi-official Berlin press, during the last few months a lively diplomatic dispute between America and Germany, which had its origin in what appeared to be an overbearing tone adopted by the State Department in Washington in the potash negotiations with the Imperial Government. The dispute assumed at times a serious, if not an absolutely threatening aspect. Germany acquits Ambassador Hill of any blame in the matter, and denies having given any intimation that he was a persona non grata.

Austria-Hungary.—Because of unfavorable symptoms recently causing some anxiety to the physicians of the Emperor, his Majesty has been advised to withdraw, for a time, from active supervision of affairs in the empire. In consequence the visit of King Peter, of Servia, which had been announced to take place early in May, during the stay of Francis Joseph in Budapest, is postponed for a time. The Emperor has been urged to remain, for a while, in his summer residence at Gödöllő, a resort some twenty-five kilometres distant from Budapest. His venerable age and natural physical weakness worry those about him, and they are earnest in their efforts to induce his Majesty to rest and recuperate. Official reports assure the people that their monarch is enjoying usual health, but the published action of the physicians has aroused uneasiness.

Turkey.—Serious trouble is anticipated in Albania. The Turks are attempting to relieve Tuzi. Heavy fighting is reported at Scutari. A revolt in Yemen is also expected. One reason of this uprising appears to be the unwillingness of the Albanians to be taxed to support the new constitutional form of government planned by the Young Turks. Another reason is the now very common one of the language, and as an initial step the Turks want the Albanians to use the Arabic alphabet.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The German Centre, Yesterday and To-day

For some of those assembled in the lavishly decorated rotunda of the Reichstag building, in Berlin, on the evening of March 21 last, the scene must have been a specially moving one. In that gathering, called to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the party's founding, there were not a few whose hearts throbbed with quickened beat, as the flood of memories rushed in upon them. Specially honored guests were they, the veterans of the party, who, through the medley of music and song and speechmaking, commemorative of the distinguished place the party had won for itself in the politics of the empire, looked back into the bitter years of early struggle and conflict and thanked God that their efforts for Church and Fatherland had been crowned with the signal success the story of their forty years of service records. "Forty years of the Centre party represents forty years of triumphant German history," was the exultant heart cry of one of those veterans when called upon to review the chronicle of that service.

We are as yet, perhaps, too close to the tumult of party contention which filled so many of those years, to expect the historian to rehearse with entire objectivity the achievements of the great Catholic organization in the upbuilding of the German empire, but surely it is within his competency to reject as false the opinion some have held of the Centre's place in German statesmanship. That body was not organized solely as an opposition party to defeat Bismarck's unjust legislation against the Church; it was not inimical to the development of German Imperialism, or to the expansion of the empire, proclaimed in Versailles in 1870. Though it was compelled to pass through a period of sharp antagonism to the government whilst it fought the unfair religious enactments of Kulturkampf days, since 1879, when victory rested with the organization in that struggle, it has loyally cooperated with the government in every phase of the industrial, economic and social progress marking the advancement of Germany to the proud eminence that empire holds to-day among the nations of the world. No one who studies the history of the party will question this.

Mighty changes had taken place in the politics of Germany during the years 1874-79. True, the scenes holding the centre of the stage whilst Windthorst and Bismarck fought their combat à outrance so hid what was developing within their shadows that the political importance of these changes came to be recognized only when the Iron Chancellor made known his purpose to end the Kulturkampf and to seek peace with the Catholic Church. The trend of Bismarck's plans had been drawing him away from the Liberal party, with which he had earlier identified himself. In the summer of 1879 the complete break occurred. Benningsen, the Liberal leader, refused to follow the Chancellor in the legislative program which the latter announced to prepare the way for economic reform. Bismarck had faith in his own proposals and he, as everyone, felt that an era of tremendous industrial progress was about to open; the Centre party, therefore, was invited to aid him in the work he had mapped out.

Then began an entirely new experience for the party. Hitherto its members had been united as with bands of steel by their determination to crush every legislative attack upon the rights of their Church and of their Catholic fellow-countrymen. Would the solidarity of their body survive the test of new problems and of the hitherto unthought of difficulties sure to arise in the solution of them? How often, in those days, did not Windthorst give expression to his fear lest the sectional interests which would inevitably inject themselves into the consideration of economic and industrial questions might shatter the unity of purpose that had been heretofore the strength of his followers. Happily, the Hanoverian statesman's concern was not to be realized. The close bonds of union, welded in the years of conflict, held strong, and the party entered upon this second period of its history with a well-defined program covering the varied details of the economic legislation to be put through the Reichstag by their old-time enemy Bismarck.

The reason of this harmony, unlooked for even by its leaders, is not far to seek. From its first formation the Centre comprised representatives of all races and of every district in the Fatherland; it numbered in its membership men of all classes and of every profession, and its proud boast from the beginning had been that, as an organization, it stood for the people, that it was in very truth the People's party. True to this boast, the body now recognized its obligation to stand for the interests of the empire as a whole in the projected economic reform, and, in opposition to the claims which sectional prejudice and sympathy might press upon them, to seek through compromise and mutual concessions to favor always the common good of the nation. Such a purpose, of course, can be achieved only when a party is strong enough to control the self-seeking of individuals and of groups that may have aligned themselves under its banners. This strength the Centre possessed in the broad comprehensiveness of Christian principle upon which its political platform was upbuilt. Its members, it is true, have never allowed their religion as such to inject itself into their political action. Even when fighting the anti-Catholic May laws they based their opposition on simple right and on the laws of natural justice. And a like attitude has characterized the party's action always; in these forty years the Centrists have stood manfully by the one principle: Political success worth the achieving must spring from loyal regard to and reverence for the truths which positive Christianity teaches.

Economic and industrial legislation planned with elaborate care and foresight by the great Chancellor, keen to recognize the marvelous possibilities ready at hand to make the new German empire a leading power in the world's material development, had scarcely begun to prove its efficiency, when grave social problems began to stir the country. In Germany, as probably nowhere else in Europe, the sweeping changes introduced into the life of the people by the remarkable industrial evolution of the last quarter of the nineteenth century led to complexities quickly to be seized upon by Marxian teachers as an opportunity to spread their master's dangerous fallacies.

Drastic measures were proposed by Bismarck to crush the earliest attempts of Social Democracy to spread its propaganda among German workingmen. These did not win the approval of the Centrists, since they showed a lack of grasp on the Chancellor's part of the really serious nature of the grievances of labor, and their very unfairness irritated the workingmen and gave capital to the Socialists. Wider experience brought Bismarck to better counsel, and the Centre party then labored faithfully to assist him along the lines suggested in the Chancellor's famous program announced, with the Emperor's approval, in 1881. The history of the party since that day is a glorious record of achievement for the social betterment of the people. No single enactment looking to alleviation of real grievances affecting the classes has been decreed by Germany's parliament without the co-operation of the Centre; and to-day the party is acknowledged to be at once the best defence the Government possesses in its endeavor to curb the growing dangers of Socialism and the most earnest advocate within the Reichstag of practical reform in the conditions touching the people's welfare and happiness.

What has the future in store for it? Naturally this question came to the members of the Centre, whilst their hearts were thrilled on that March evening by the stirring recitals of labors endured and victories gloriously won in the forty years of the party's existence. Skilled combatants in the parliamentary arena, they have too keen an insight into the complex problems facing German statesmen to-day to fancy that any diminution of their strenuous activity is to be looked for. This very year will witness a contest in which the Centre will be tried as it has never been tried before. The elections to take place in the coming autumn, we are told, will be marked by a stupendous effort on the part of the Socialistic body to entrench itself in the Reichstag with such a number of partisans as will enable it to control legislation. How ruinous to a Christian nation such an outcome would prove is all too clear! Yet the Socialists boast a numerical strength in the voting population which forbids one to deride their purpose as a mere idle dream. In the last general elections the popular vote of that party exceeded three and one-quarter millions, leading that of all other political organizations in the empire. Since that time, if one may rely on reports emanating from well-informed sources, the party has rather gained than lost in strength. In that same election the Centre polled a total vote of one million less than the Social-Democrats, while the total vote of the other ten parties and groups and factions represented in the political life of the empire, taken together, about equalled the record of these two leaders. Evidently the struggle for supremacy in the new Reichstag will depend largely upon the success the Centrists shall achieve in the battle of ballots. Happily, the unity of purpose which has made this organization a tower of strength during the forty years of its unselfish labors for the interests of the empire, still endures. And Baron von Hertling, one of the veteran members of the party and a revered leader in its councils to-day, declared in his speech during the commemorative celebration in March: "that unity springs from the vital principle guiding the party from the beginning: Truth is eternal, justice is inflexible, and the freedom which rests upon the solid basis of natural moral rectitude is unconquerable." So long as the political activity of the Centre party is controlled by this sentiment, there is little reason for misgiving. The broad Christian comprehensiveness of its program will continue to afford an assuring pledge of the presence in Germany of a militant body ever prepared to meet and to solve with wisdom problems that may arise to disturb the nation's peace and happiness.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

The Pope and Europe

Impudence can carry one a long way. One living by it was caught in England lately. He used to drift about among shop girls, calling himself Major-General Mackenzie, Duke of St. Omars. When he noticed one with a savings-bank book he used to promise to marry her, draw up a marriage settlement full of Scottish castles, French châteaux, horses, carriages, jewels, make a will in her favor, lest anything should happen him before the wedding day, and then borrowed her savings. "Did you really believe him?" the judge asked his latest victim. "Indeed, I did," was the reply. The judge seemed puzzled, though the explanation is easy enough. Had Mr. Mackenzie been more modest he would have been less successful. Cagliostro, Psalmanazar, Madame Humbert, Diss De Barr and dozens of others prove the efficiency of dazzling impudence.

These are isolated examples, but the press gives a continuous one. Now one periodical, now another, with a tone finely assumed, sometimes of pity, sometimes of disinterested admonition, sometimes of grave rebuke, tells how Pius X is making a mess of his relations with European Powers, or rather, how his intransigent, half English, half Spanish Secretary of State is doing it for him. Occasionally one takes us to the Vatican and shows us Cardinal Rampolla rating the Pope and his evil genius like a fishwife. Then it bids us turn a regretful eye on the past to view Leo XIII, a statesman, dying inopportunately as the Golden Age was about to return. He understood and accepted, we are told, the functions of the Church in the modern world, a moral force, a religious influence supporting the supreme State, which, condescendingly grateful, abstains from anything more than a knock now and again to keep it in its place. Pius X and his blundering Secretary have thrust the Golden Age back among the remote possibilities. It is hard to say which pontiff is the more grossly insulted; nevertheless, the splendid impudence of the whole performance wins credit for it with the public.

The London Times, the Paris Temps, the Indépendance Belge, all the great Liberal journals of Europe take up the parable in turn. Our American papers do the same. The Grande Revue, of Paris, printed it lately in an article which the Débats quoted and approved. Here in New York, Current Literature, echoing the greater voices and giving up on the authority of the Indépendance Belge the fable of the puppet Pope and the arrogant Secretary, devotes four pages of its April number to what it calls the Vatican's War with Europe.

The two great blunders, worse than crimes, laid at the door of Pius X, are the war on Modernism and the breach with France. Yet in both he is but the heir of conditions obtaining at his accession to the Pontificate. The obligations of his office have restricted him to one course, and this must have been followed, no matter who occupied the Chair of Peter. Modernism made its appearance in France, under the name of Americanism, in the last years of the century, and Leo XIII began the conflict with his letter, "Testem benevolentiae." It was Leo XIII who called Loisy and his followers to account and established the Biblical Commission, the Modernist's bugbear. In his encyclicals on scholastic philosophy (1880) and biblical studies (1893) and in his letter on historical studies (1883) he laid down the principles which Pius X has applied. That he passed away before the campaign reached its most acute phase was a blessing for the aged Leo: it did not change its plan. This would mean that Leo had abandoned all the principles which in a long life had become a part of him, and not even the most liberal newspaper could hint this.

With regard to France, in 1891 Leo XIII exhorted Catholics to accept the Republic as the surest way to change its irreligious character. This did not please the Radicals, whose program it would have overthrown. A good many Catholics, too, did not desire a reconciliation of the Republic with the Church, which would make more difficult the restoration of the monarchy, and others frankly believed the reconciliation impossible. Still the majority followed Leo's advice loyally, and for a few years his policy seemed likely to succeed. In 1898, however, came the Radical triumph and the persecution under which Catholic France has groaned to this hour. Leo XIII was forced unwillingly into opposition, as Pius X has been forced no less unwillingly to continue in it. The Law of Associations was passed in 1901, two years and a half before Leo's death. Six months later Combes began the nobis nominavit quarrel, demanding the omission of "nobis" in bishops' Bulls of appointment, so that bishops might appear to have been nominated absolutely by the Government; but it was Pius X, not Leo XIII, who went as far as possible in the way of conciliation. President Loubet's visit to Rome was planned in the last year of Leo's life, and it was not Cardinal Merry del Val, but Cardinal Rampolla, who told the Government how grievous an insult it would be. Leo was dead before the affairs of the Bishops of Laval and Dijon came up; but had he lived he could not have acted otherwise than did his successor. Those sad scandals gave Combes what he was looking for. Accordingly, the Chambers declared, on February 10, 1905, that "the attitude of the Vatican had made separation inevitable": the Osservatore Romano replied, what every well-informed person knows to be the truth, "the assertion is an historical lie." Pius X was merely involved in the troubles French ingratitude had planned under his great predecessor.

But what about the new marriage legislation? The agitation against it is absurdly insincere. That marriage is a sacrament, and that the Church has, therefore, the right to determine the conditions under which it is received lawfully and validly, has been the doctrine of the Church for a good many centuries. One may deny it: one cannot call it a novelty. Catholic Governments have always respected ecclesiastical legislation regarding matrimony; other Governments have ignored it. Under these it binds the consciences of Catholics: those who are not Catholics hardly know of its existence.

Modern matrimonial legislation in the Church turns on the decree "Tametsi" of the Council of Trent, the object of which was to do away with clandestine marriages. About this decree was this peculiarity: it had to be promulgated specially in every place where it was to become binding. In many places it was never promulgated. For Holland, Benedict XIV modified its effect in favor of marriages in which one party at least was a Protestant; and on the application of bishops this declaration has been extended to many places with a mixed population. Hence the validity of many marriages depended upon whether the "Tametsi" had been promulgated in the place where it was contracted, and if so, whether the Benedictine declaration had been extended to it. The practical consequence was that a marriage valid in one place might be invalid in places a few miles away. Thus, in the United States, a marriage valid if contracted in Portland, Oregon, might have been invalid if contracted in San Francisco, and a marriage might have been invalid on one bank of the Arkansas River, while one precisely similar would have been valid on the other.

Pius X, having resolved to rearrange and simplify the Canon Law, naturally took up this anomalous condition of things. And this is the scope of the decree of August 2, 1907, a boon to Catholics and no concern of anybody else. As for the famous McCann case in Ireland, about which Orange lodges on both sides of the Atlantic are making such a fuss, analogous cases might have come up at any time. They are not the result of the decree, and this has not deprived Mrs. McCann of a tittle of her rights before the law. As the Irish Secretary remarked very pertinently in Parliament, according to law Mr. and Mrs. McCann are husband and wife. If Mrs. McCann has been wronged the law will do her justice. But the agitators have no idea of taking the matter into court and thus losing the pretext for their anti-Catholic agitation. As for this country, every lawyer would say the same as Mr. Birrell: "The law knows nothing of Papal marriage legislation. We believe that under it our Catholic fellow-countrymen are not so free as we to marry and to divorce and to marry again. Our courts will continue to administer our own law, and all who apply for its benefits shall have them. It has lost none of its efficiency since August 2, 1907." This ought to satisfy Orangemen and others who fear that Rome is about to enslave them. It ought to satisfy the editor of Current Literature.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Who Exalted Braga?

"Portugal is now dominated by the secret society known as the Carbonari, or charcoal-burners. Lieutenant Machado dos Santos, the naval subaltern, who rallied the revolutionists and led them to victory when everything pointed to defeat, was at the time president of the supreme council of the organization. Few in the Republican camp knew that Antonio Maria da Silva, now postmaster general, presided over the Young Portugal Lodge, the oldest, as well as the most carefully hidden in the country, for it guarded the laws and records of the Carbonari." Thus a Portuguese newspaper, Echos do Vez, in its issue of February 17, 1911, begins an article on the rise and progress of the Carbonari in Portugal.

When the Carbonari were first instituted, namely, in 1820, the field of their greatest activity was Italy, where they exercised tremendous political influence, as the stormy history of those times attests; but they also gained a few recruits in Portugal, where the organization languished for a time and then disappeared, if it did not cease to exist. About fifteen years ago, the Carbonari showed signs of new life, but they were few in number and their influence was inconsiderable, even as late as January, 1908. The Young Portugal Lodge, however, kept up the traditions, and it was then that Luiz Almeida, now librarian of Lisbon, became grand master, as he asserts in an article given to the press.

The assassination of King Carlos was followed by a period of very active propaganda on the part of the Republicans, but this was largely a campaign of speeches and printed appeals; and for the work that they had in view a body of armed men ready for anything, even to give their lives at the word of command, had to be enrolled. It was then that the Carbonari saw their opportunity and they seized it. Their organization was excellent. The members of the society are divided into four classes: Candidates, called "choppers" (of wood); aspirants, who have been admitted; masters, who are placed over several small aggregations; and the grand, or sublime, master, who is at the head of the whole society. Each group is composed of four choppers, who know their chief but do not know one another; four of these groups form a "hut"; four huts form a "tent," and four tents constitute a "sale." All the sales are subject to the supreme council of the society; but the work of the society is regulated by the mother lodge of Young Portugal, whose members are unknown to the generality of the adepts.

From the murder of King Carlos to the overthrow of the monarchy, the greatest zeal was exercised in extending the influence of the Carbonari, yet every precaution was used to prevent the police from becoming acquainted with the propaganda. Meetings of three or four associates were held in the public street, or in an open field; or possibly aboard some small craft, or in a communal bath-house. When a "chopper" was to be admitted to some participation in the secrets of the organization, he was conducted by a roundabout way to a private house, and brought into the presence of a gowned and masked company, where he pronounced the oath of secrecy and became acquainted with his chief, but not with all who witnessed his initiation.

At the very outset, the conspirators fixed longing eyes on the army. They first won over a few officers and then opened a special branch of the organization for securing the cooperation of the privates. It was arranged that privates who entered the society should always, in making the military salute to their superiors, introduce a slight modification which would suffice to make them known to such officers as shared the secrets of the Carbonari; but, lest military discipline should suffer, the officers never revealed that they understood the secret sign.

The Carbonari made no attempt to win over men who were publicly known to sympathize with moderate republicanism, much less those who were outspoken opponents of the monarchical system; for it might have attracted the attention of the police and brought about an untimely and unwelcome discovery of their plans. It has been publicly stated, however, that, from the death of King Carlos to the flight of Manuel, they had enlisted fifty thousand men in their cause. This may be an exaggeration; but one other published statement is palpably false, namely, that since the triumph of the revolutionary party, the huts and tents and sales of the Carbonari have been disbanded, and that the society as such has ceased to exist. Their close organization is the surest pledge that they shall reap the full fruits of their victory in the distribution of spoils. Why disband while there is still a plum on the tree?

H. J. S.

A Work of Providence

II.

What the "Volksverein" intends, is perhaps best expressed in the first paragraph of its constitution. "The purpose of this association," it says, "is the furthering of the Christian organization of Society, and in particular the instruction of the German people in the social duties arising from the development of modern conditions, and their education for cooperation in the intellectual and economic uplifting of all classes. The association will likewise oppose assaults on the Christian principles of Society, and wage war on the fallacies and revolutionary tendencies in the social world."

How well the "Volksverein" has carried out its purpose may be seen in its record of achievements. Let a few statistics make this evident. At the end of its first year, 100,000 names were enrolled in the "Volksverein"; by 1895, there were 177,000; in 1902 the roster counted 230,000, which grew to a half million in 1906, and at the present time the membership has reached 700,000 and more. The Central Bureau at M. Gladbach has likewise kept pace with the growth of members, and to-day its chief staff is composed of eighteen salaried officials, nearly all of whom have degrees in political economy or theology. Each department is directed by a specialist, and not a few of the staff are speakers and authors of note. This academic or chief staff is assisted by sixty clerks, accountants and librarians, while in the printing department nearly seventy persons are employed to give permanency and publicity to the work. It is essential that the Central Bureau be in touch with all the members scattered throughout the provinces, and this is effectively done. Each province has a director, every town a manager, who in turn is assisted by promoters or "trustymen," as they are called in German. The promoters at present number twenty thousand, and they are the very life of the "Volksverein," for they visit the members, distribute the literature and collect the annual dues of one mark per member.

The "Volksverein" is not so much a society with its own end, as an organization to encourage other existing societies and to make them vital for practical modern social work. Thus it urges, in and out of session, the formation and development of "Arbeiter Verein" (workingmen societies) for the moral and intellectual uplifting of Catholic workmen of all kinds. By fostering the religious spirit, by simple apologetics and especially by retreats, these societies do much to counteract the evils of modern industrial life. In the same spirit of helpfulness the "Volksverein" makes propaganda for the "Christian Trades Union," an association of Catholic and Protestant workmen, who while refusing to compromise their principles in the prevailing Socialistic Unions, do not wish to lose the economic advantages of organized labor. It is principally due to the "Volksverein" that after ten years, the "Christian Trades Union" counts an annual income of five million marks from 325,000 members, (but alas the Socialists' unions have nearly two million members!)

But the crowning glory of the "Volksverein" is the manner in which it utilizes the apostolate of the press. From its foundation until last July, the total number of its publications of all kinds—from the one page leaflet to the large quarto volume—amounted to the almost inconceivable figure of 143,600,000! This apostolate grew with the years and reached its highest record last year, with an output of 20,700,000. Of this number eleven millions were tracts and leaflets, chiefly apologetic and socio-political in character, while nearly five millions were copies of the official paper "Der Volksvereinsheft"—which each member receives eight times in the year.

Three millions represents the printed matter circulated to agitate for the ideals and work of the "Volksverein" itself, while of larger pamphlets and books 829,000 were issued. Then there are the many periodicals, for example Der Kranz, a bi-monthly for working girls, or Jungland, a magazine for farmer boys, of which 530,000 and 104,000, respectively, were printed last year, while Sociale Kultur, a high-class monthly, is furnished to the educated, and even of this journal 274,000 were sent forth. Nor must we forget the "Social Correspondence" and its companion, the "Apologetic Correspondence," which furnish excellent articles on these topics every week to over five hundred German newspapers. Seven millions might be added to the twenty millions of last year's output by including the year's circulation of the Westdeutsche Arbeiter Zeitung, which is practically the work of the "Volksverein."

The "Volksverein" is anything but selfish, and hence it helps others to write, agitate or organize for the good cause, by loaning books from its library of 40,000 volumes, and by supplying material from its information bureau. Last year twelve thousand books were thus drawn and three thousand persons received the information they desired. Another form of helping others is the "Extension lectures," as Americans call them, courses lasting from three days to eight weeks, on social and economic questions. These courses are arranged and suited for the various classes of society—now it is a short course for saleswomen, now a longer one for government officials, and again an eight weeks' summer course, which is, in fact, a condensed college course of political and practical economics. Twenty of such courses were given last year, attended by nearly a thousand hearers, many being priests and laymen from distant lands.

But the characteristic work of the "Volksverein" is, as its name indicates, its well-known popular meetings, where the rank and file of German Catholicism come together and feel the solidarity which their faith and their union give them. Of such meetings, 3,158 were held last year (2,314 in 1909), and of these 488 were addressed by representatives of the Central Bureau. Often these meetings take the form of illustrated lectures, and the "Volksverein" offers a choice of three hundred such lectures, supplying the text, as well as the lantern-slides. In a word, no just means is neglected to put Catholics in close touch with the times, so that they may profit by its progress and ward off the evil that necessarily comes with it.

But cold figures and statements can give but an inadequate idea of the achievements and fruits of the "Volksverein." Much of its many-sided work cannot be expressed in mathematical terms, for who can measure the moral effect of such a vast and perfect organization on friend and foe alike? The Catholics of Germany are proudly conscious that they have at their back an organization that is able and willing to defend their "Weltanschauung" at all times and under all circumstances. Let the Socialists become troublesome in a town, and by the next train the "Volksverein" will flood it with anti-Socialist tracts, and if need be will despatch a speaker ready for any fray. Let the Liberals threaten the peace and sanity of a city with a Ferrer Movement, and at once the "Volksverein" meets it with a counter and better demonstration. Verily, it is a work of Providence that to-day, when the Catholics stand alone and are opposed on all sides, that the "Volksverein" is not only in existence, but that it is strong and capable and gives to the Catholics of Germany that intelligence and courage so essential in the struggle for their spiritual and temporal welfare.

FREDERIC SIEDENBURG, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

ON THE FISHERY COAST.

Those who are familiar with the missionary work of St. Francis Xavier will recall the Fishery Coast in Southern India, whose villages the Saint visited so frequently, and in which he reaped such an abundant harvest of souls. In this district half way between Cape Comorin and Cochin, on the western side of the peninsula is the City of Quilon, formerly Coulan, which is now the seat of a bishopric, and one of the suffragan sees of the archdiocese of Verapoly. The whole diocese is cared for by Belgian Carmelites, who minister to about 116,000 of the faithful within its limits. In the days of Francis Xavier there was a Portuguese station there, and it was the most important port south of Cochin.

In October, 1542, five months after his arrival in Goa, which was the scene of his first missionary successes in the Far East, Xavier departed for the Fishery Coast. In Quilon he built a church, and the fame of a miracle he wrought by raising a dead man to life brought about many conversions. Many of the natives had already been brought into the Church through the zealous labors of Michael Vaz and his companions, but owing to the dearth of instructors, the people at the time of Xavier's arrival knew little or nothing about their religion. His first care was to instruct the children, and through them their families and neighbors, who were thus prepared to receive the Faith. In the teeming villages of those days so many sought baptism that the saint could not raise his arm to confer the sacrament. Many generations have passed since Xavier's time, and the territory he traversed and the missions he founded have undergone many vicissitudes; any information then bearing on the present condition of Christians in the territory known as the Fishery Coast cannot fail to be of interest.

A correspondent of the Catholic Watchman of Madras, as quoted in the Bombay Examiner for March 4, 1911, gives some enlightening statistics regarding the facilities for education provided for the children of these sea-coast villages. The details are set forth by way of correcting a misleading article in the Government Gazetteer for December 13, 1910, which, reviewing the Administration Report of the Educational Department, stated that whereas most of the fishermen on the sea-coast from Cape Comorin to the Neendacaray Bar were Catholics, "the representatives of the Roman Catholic Churches in the fishing villages do not exhibit any great anxiety to educate their children." To this statement the correspondent very justly takes exception, and in justice to a community that has all along been well known for its endeavors to promote education among the poor classes, gives the actual state of affairs in the matter of education. "In the Quilon diocese," he says, "there are between Neendacaray and the southernmost point of Travancore 41 sea-coast villages of Catholics. These villages contain a population of 37,089 people, have 8 boys' schools, 6 girls' schools and 22 schools for boys and girls attended respectively by 628 boys, 537 girls and 2,208 children." To meet the requirements therefore of 37,000 villagers, the Catholics have provided 36 schools with about 3,300 children in attendance. "These figures," continues the correspondent, "are quite encouraging, and instead of showing that education is neglected among the sea-coast villagers, proves that special attention is paid to this all important matter, for while the percentage of children under instruction is only 7.4 for the whole state according to the Government Proceedings, the percentage of children under instruction among the sea-coast villagers is nearly ten per cent."

Again, besides the thirty-six schools referred to, there are over one hundred other schools nearby which are also attended by children from the sea-coast. Moreover, the Quilon Mission has established two High Schools for boys, one at Quilon and one at Trivandrum, while with a view to obtain good teachers two higher Elementary Schools have been established, where over 70 students are free boarders, most of whom are from the sea-coast.

"Besides, a number of the Catholic clergy hail from these coast towns," says the writer, "and many of the natives are being trained in the Preparatory and Theological seminaries—which is an additional reason why the representatives of the Roman Catholic churches are quite anxious for the spread of education among the coast villagers, and their endeavors could have been quite successful had not obstacles in the shape of higher school fees, non-admission of free boys, withdrawals of grants, etc., been thrown in their way."

Altogether the details supplied by this apparently well-informed correspondent show how unreliable at times are the statistics furnished by Government reports, and fill out a blank page in the history of Catholic education in the missions of India. E. S.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Blight of Anti-Clericalism in Rome

ROME, APRIL 16, 1911.

The Parliament has adjourned for over the holidays and things political have a consequent rest. The Exposition drags its slow length along, with the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany for the attraction a week ago, a group of Hungarian members of Parliament the past week and Prince Arthur of Connaught expected next week. These are what the American fruit-raiser calls seconds. It is rumored that it has been diplomatically hinted to these distinguished visitors that a call at the Vatican would not be welcome on this occasion, but that is difficult to verify, and it would seem that the persons concerned have discretion enough to see the inappropriateness of that without any suggestion from the Cardinal Secretary of State.

Sunday morning, April 2, at his private Mass, the Holy Father administered First Communion to the two little children of Dr. Chauves, the Brazilian ambassador to the Holy See. While I was still thinking of the charming simplicity of the Father of his people, who loves children so, I was startled with the news of the following Tuesday. Just as Mgr. Orzucci was leaving the choir chapel at St. Peter's, after celebrating high Mass, a shot was fired at him, passing between him and the accompanying master of ceremonies, Mgr. Rocchi, and striking one of the guards on duty at St. Peter's. The assassin was about to fire a second shot, when a bystander struck down his arm, and the guard, who was only wounded in the arm, overpowered him. On examination at police headquarters he said he was Pietro De Santi, a stonemason from Dignano, in Istria, who had come to Rome last August for the express purpose of killing the Holy Father, but after failing to secure admission to the Vatican on various pretexts, he despaired of success and resolved to kill some priest in St. Peter's as earnest of his intent. His grievance was against the Church in general, accentuated by the fact, as he said, that in 1862, he had been ruined financially by his parish priest. He added that he was not an Anarchist, nor yet a Socialist; in fact not interested in politics at all, but simply anti-clerical and a reader of L'Asino. Alas, for the Government's good intentions during the Exposition, the grim spectre of anti-clericalism will not down.

It appeared again in the Chamber of Deputies, where Giolitti is trying to put through his program, beginning with universal suffrage, helped out by the extreme Radicals who, in the person of Bissolati, announce their support of the present administration for a time, till they have matured their strength enough, through the extension of the suffrage, to have a ministry and program of their own. Bissolati could not make the announcement without an episode of attack on the clericals, as seeking a theocracy to the betrayal of God. This was not all. A deputy named Murri, an apostate priest, made a virulent attack upon the Holy Father personally, and announced that the proposal to sanction divorce was only postponed so as not to give ammunition to the clericals at this time, but that he would urge the obligation of civil marriage prior to the religious ceremony, and the exclusion of catechism from the public schools.

He is a man who carries but little personal weight in the Chamber, and was frowned down during his attack upon the Holy Father by many, even of anti-clerical members, but the president of the Chamber, Signore Marcora, let him go on unrebuked, just as Luzzatti had no governmental reproach for the vile attack of Mayor Nathan on the Porta Pia. Yet the paradox of it all is, that the Catholic religion is the state religion of Italy, established by law, and the same law guarantees protection to the Holy Father. But this is a town of paradoxes. I entered the Pincio Gardens the other day from Trinità dei Monti, and thought I would look at the busts of Italian worthies, erected by the government on little four and a half foot pedestals all about the plateau, and lo, the first was Father Secchi and the second Father Segneri, and the third, Garibaldi. And this is the government that holds the Roman College, and forces the successors of Father Secchi to seek elsewhere for quarters. In the same paradoxical fashion the government has seized the Gesù, and yet leaves a few rooms for the Fathers and Brothers who attend the Church, and, if I mistake not, adds a small stipend to help them eke out an existence.

The Catholic Electoral Union of Italy has issued its program. Their policy is to recommend no candidate in particular to Catholic voters, but to declare requirements for qualification. The platform stands for protection of the interests of religion, of the Christian character of the family, of public morality in the press and in art displays; for educational freedom and religious instruction in the schools; for social amelioration based on principles of justice and Christian brotherhood, with the harmony of all classes in view; for the protection of the patrimony of the poor, which has been diverted to alien purposes; for a just measure of home rule for each community and province. It is a program to which no fairminded man can take reasonable exception.

Rome had a trifling earthquake last week, central at Albano, but is more disturbed over the apostacy of a priest named Verdesi, who complains bitterly in the anti-clerical press that his confessor obliged him to denounce in writing three or four fellow-priests who were propagating Modernism. Acting on the denunciation, due inquiry was made, and on verification, and failure of correction, the said priests were eventually suspended. Now Verdesi protests that his confessor infringed on the seal of confession, and one paper to which he granted an interview goes to the foolish length of accusing the Holy Father of breaking the sigillum. Verdesi forgot to mention in his autobiographical account that he was already under correction from the office of the cardinal vicar for worldly and unclerical conduct. Of course, he is now violently anti-clerical, but does not claim to be a reader of L'Asino. However, he has gone over to the camp of our separated Methodist brethren of the Via Venti Settembre, and that will have to suffice for the curious.

Among those ordained to the priesthood yesterday at St. John Lateran, by Cardinal Respighi, the cardinal vicar of Rome, were William Adrian, of the diocese of Davenport; Augustine McNeal, of the diocese of St. Joseph; John Rooney, of the diocese of Chicago; Francis Walsh, of the diocese of Peoria, and Francis Woods, of the diocese of Brooklyn, all students at the American College.

The Biblical Institute recently received a brief from the Holy Father, ordering an examination for its students at the end of each year, and empowering the Institute to issue certificates to those completing the three years' course successfully, the terms of the certificate to be determined by the Holy Father. The Holy Father did not say his Easter Mass publicly in the Sistine Chapel this year, but in his own private chapel: the recent outrage in St. Peter's is an obvious reason for prudential omission, but may not be the real ground.

It is old news that Mgr. Benigni, the Under-secretary of State, has been promoted out of his office and replaced by Mgr. Pacelli; the busybodies promptly started the rumor that the change was brought about because of friction with Germany over the Borromeo letter and the Modernist oath, but the rumor has been as promptly denied.

Father Erhle's reiterated request for relief, owing to failing strength, from his position of librarian of the Vatican Library, has at last been heard, and he will shortly be replaced by Mgr. Matti, at present librarian of the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana at Milan; to the Ambrosiana goes from Rome Mgr. Mercati, the discoverer of the palimpsest of the Hexameron of Origen.

Former Roman students will learn with regret of the death, last week, of Mgr. Coselli, the rector of the Collegio Capranica. This is the second recent loss at the Capranica, as it is only a short time since Mgr. Checchi, the professor of Moral Theology, so well and favorably known to a generation of students at the Propaganda passed away, particularly mourned by the Capranica students, whose chaplain he was.

Father Domenico Pasqualigo, O.P., is about to become a Commissioner of the Holy Office, in place of Mgr. Granello, recently deceased. Father Pasqualigo was already vice-commissioner under Mgr. Granello. Cardinal Rampolla is secretary of the Congregation.

C. M.

Spanish Cabinet Changes

MADRID, APRIL 7, 1911.

The ministerial crisis which resulted from the debate on the Ferrer question in the lower house of the Cortes was believed at first to be a very serious matter; but it passed as quickly as it came and left everything just as it was before. It was thought that the crisis had been precipitated by the attitude of the army towards the Radicals, who had bitterly assailed it, and towards Canalejas himself, who declared that he "neither attacked nor defended the decision of the military tribunal" which sentenced Ferrer to death; but it soon became clear that, although the army is displeased, the true motive for the cabinet changes was the desire of Canalejas to rid himself of certain ministers who were little in favor of his policy, and to replace them by others who were personally more devoted to him. The Ferrer debate was but a peg upon which Canalejas hung his scheme for rearranging the cabinet.

Here in Spain, public opinion shows little interest in the Ferrer debate, for the two motives that prompt it are too well understood. They are, briefly, an attempt on the part of the Radicals to make revolutionary capital by discrediting the army, and the efforts of the Madrid newspaper trust to increase as much as possible the distance between Maura and the presidency of the Council. Hence the trust holds up Maura and La Cierva as terrible inquisitors, ruthless and bloody-minded, who, in their hatred for Ferrer's principles, dragooned the Barcelona court martial into condemning him.

The trust has yet another motive for its campaign of violence and coarse invective, for when the Liberals are in power, it enjoys many favors, advantages and privileges, such as inside information on matters discussed in executive sessions, direct pecuniary subsidies, and fat offices for its clients and friends. Why should not the trust strain every effort and invent every means to keep Maura out of the administration? Why should not its voice be raised with that of the Radicals in proclaiming Maura the enemy of liberty and progress?

Enemy of liberty? Maura is not the enemy of liberty; he is the enemy of anarchy, of revolution, of political and administrative malfeasance, of every abuse that leads towards social indiscipline and the ruin of the nation. We may easily and correctly form a fair appreciation of him by considering the antecedents and avowed projects of those who detest him.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

The Rising in Albania

BELGRADE, APRIL 11, 1911.

All around Scodra (Scutari) desultory combats are still being waged between the Turkish Regulars and the Albanians, up in arms for their alphabet. The reports from Constantinople of complete victory in each encounter are by this time discredited, and the angry accusations of Montenegro, "instigator and abettor of the rebels," prove that matters are not proceeding so smoothly as the Turkish Government represents. Nobody can yet truthfully boast that he has defeated the Albanians, if by defeat is meant a clear victory that disarms and renders incapable for further hostilities. This youngest of the nationalities subject to the Turk is the most warlike of all. The Albanian fights by instinct and by profession. From infancy his calling is bound to be that of arms, for thus only have these Balkan autochthones been enabled to maintain their existence. Every return of spring sends them to work against the Greeks, Serbs, Bulgars, or Vlachs, as the case may be, but always against the Turks. The Albanian, who hitherto lacked an alphabet, may be backward in the domains of literature and art, but he is a finished judge of weapons. He has nothing to learn from any European expert of the properties of English, French or German-made rifles, and this explains how the trained Turkish troops with two powerful field-pieces are unable to dislodge a handful of rebels from the heights round Shipshanin. A strategic position, a good gun, and a willing heart have done wonders ere this, and when the tribes learn a little more cohesion great things may be expected. Each year they seem better prepared for the final effort, which one day will bring them the measure of freedom obtained by nations similarly placed, who won it not through Europe's intervention, but by sheer hard fighting.

News received here to-day affirms the renewed advance of the Hotts and Castrats on the stronghold of Tusa. Detchitch has already fallen into their hands. A portion only of the Mirdite forces had joined the Grudi, Clementi, Shkeli and Dukshani tribes, but when after the combat round Suvi Potok valley the Turks set fire to the Catholic chapel of Vuksa Lekitch, the entire Mirdite tribe, joining with the Mallisuris, swept towards the plains of Lesh, burning every Turkish village they came near. As soon as it was assured that the Turkish troops had been decoyed in another direction, the Mirdites hastened to Shin, at the doors of St. John di Medua, where, it is rumored, they will even offer fixed battle. From Podgoritsa, on the Montenegrin frontier, it is reported that the rebels are splendidly posted on the heights of Dekitch, and that the enthusiasm is unabated. Once more all communication has been severed with Scodra, and the Vali (Governor) General Bedri Pasha, has resigned his command. This is probably in consequence of reproaches from Constantinople, and tallies badly with the optimistic accounts of a speedy suppression of the rebellion circulated by the Turkish press.

The foreign consuls in Scodra have delivered a collective note to the Vali demanding that sufficient troops be left there for defence of the inhabitants. Further, that the regulars be forbidden to plunder the Christian villages on their march, and that the Christians in Scodra be supplied with arms and munition for self-defence, but not compelled to employ them against the insurgents, who are their brethren in Christ.

Issa Boletinats, the bullet-proof Albanian, who has led the annual war many a year, arrived in Uskub lately, and proposed to treat on the following terms: The Latin Alphabet to be recognized and admitted as the medium of the tribes; for even Moslem Albanians cannot express their native tongue by means of the Arab characters favored by the Government; that the taxes levied in Albania be spent in Albania; the Albanian recruits be used for home defence only, and not sent to fight in Asia Minor.

The Mirdites and Mallisuris, foremost in culture, thanks to the unwearying labors of the Italian friars, have solved the difficulty of writing their strange guttural speech, untraceable to any known living or dead language, by means of Latin letters; and the tribes who profess Greek Orthodoxy support them in their claim of this as the national alphabet. At Elbassan there is already a school in which teachers are prepared and books are distributed. The organ of the Albania Club at Salonica, Liria, writes:

"Victory must be on the side of the Latin. Our adversaries are those of all enlightenment, freedom and progress. Until yesterday they banned schools, means of swift locomotion, and modern clothes. Now they would keep us unlettered or force us to adopt their own cumbrous medium. Their efforts to sow discord will certainly fail, for our Mahommedan brothers can better understand the Koran in the national alphabet than in the Arab. The Orthodox tribes have welcomed the Latin primers. Nobody is opposed to their using also the Cyrillic, if they are so inclined. We have five Orthodox brethren in our Teachers' school."

The cut and dried methods of the "Reformers," Shevket Pasha and Enver Bey, have not appealed to the "Sons of Eagles" (Skipetars), who are naturally indisposed to fall in with the new plans for consolidation of the Turkish Empire. Abdul-Hamid, bad as he was, could teach his successors a thing or two. He would as soon have tried to harness a tiger to his state chariot as to make disciplined recruits of the wild sons of nature, who practiced loyalty in their own fashion. He sagaciously refrained from exacting formal steps of submission from men who knew the sacredness of an oath, and kept to all their pacts with him in return for certain exemptions and privileges. When he sent armed forces to parley with the Albanians, after their customary March skirmishes with his local troops, he did so rather to excite respect than to engage in serious encounters. He knew their mountain fastnesses could not be scaled, and that when they had let off some verve on their depredating neighbors, and retaliated on his own men for undue interference, they would be ready to live in peace for the rest of the year. So their annual outbursts came to be regarded as a necessary evil, to be tolerated in lieu of worse developments.

With incredible light-heartedness, the Young Turks started to grapple with a problem that Abdul-Hamid skilfully evaded. The Albanians were, again by virtue of the brand-new Constitution, to toe the line with the satisfied believers in a Great Regenerated Modern Turkish Empire. They mistrusted the "Reformers," however, from the first. Their oath of fidelity to the old Sultan would not allow of welcoming the revolution which dethroned him. In their primitive souls there was no room for compromise of an oath taken directly to his person and never violated, whatever their relations with his minions. To give up their weapons, those trustiest of friends, as did the Slav populations, never entered their calculations. But what did appeal to the more advanced type of Albanian was the proclamation of freedom to educate in the national sense. Hence, their determined advocacy of the popular Albanian alphabet, which has become the chief of their present claims.

The success of those tribes who started the campaign this year made the Albanians serving with the regulars desert in large numbers. The first to abandon the Turkish banner on its march to release Scodra was a Catholic from Jakova, who arrived in the insurgents' camp with a magnificent repeating gun that he had borrowed from his corporal. He was followed by a host of others, who preferred to fight on the side of their own people, as they felt no obligations to the new Sultan. It must be remembered that, at present, the bulk of the Turkish army is divided between Arabia and the district of Macedonia, where the Bulgars are ever threatening, so that there are few extra contingents to be despatched against the revolted Albanians. Montenegro is supposed to connive at the movement of the rebels, and it is easy to understand the sympathy with which it is being followed also in Austria and Italy.

Perhaps I might add here the latest telegram on the subject:

"His Holiness has received the Bishop of Scodra, who reported on the situation in his diocese. The Pope counselled him to enjoin his priests to advise the Albanians to be patient. The Bishop promised to do so, but at the same time acquainted His Holiness with the trials of the Catholic tribes exposed to constant persecution by the young Turks and embittered at the non-fulfilment of given promises. The Pope has, therefore, communicated to the Porte, through the intermediary of the Apostolic Legate in Constantinople, that if the Catholic Albanians be further molested, he will not consent to the appointment of a Nuncio in Constantinople. The young Turks are very desirous of a Nunciature, which would entail the abolition of various Protectorates under the great powers of the Christian population."

If a free Albania cannot be an immediate reality it is coming yearly nearer realization, and nobody doubts that eventually the Standard of Christ will float from the Albanian capital of Scodra.

BEN HURST.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
 President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
 Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
 Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The $50,000 Bible

On April 24, a battle royal took place in New York for the possession of a book. Two or three multi-millionaires in panoply of gold were in the forefront of the fray. "One thousand dollars!" was the first cry that was heard; then another thousand, and another and another, the excitement growing in intensity with each succeeding move, until at last $50,000 was called and Mr. Henry E. Huntington, of Los Angeles, laid his hand upon the coveted prize while all the world wondered.

What is this book that has caused so much commotion, and won such applause for the purchaser? It is a Bible; and the inquiry naturally suggests itself: has it anything to do with the Bible Jubilees which are being celebrated just now in England and America? None whatever. It is not a Protestant Bible, but Catholic from cover to cover. It was printed about sixty-seven years before Luther apostatized from the Church that gave him all the learning he ever possessed, and seventy-eight years before Henry VIII put himself in place of the Pope for the discomfort of Englishmen. It is one of the few remaining copies that were run off the press at Mainz, by Johann Gensfleisch zu Gutenberg, between the years 1452 and 1456. Some call it the "Mazarin Bible," because a copy was dug out of the Mazarin library in France long after the edition was supposed to have been altogether lost. It is also described as the "forty-two line Bible" because it is printed in double columns of forty-two lines each. The text is in Latin, and on account of the abbreviations employed, supposes more than usual familiarity with the language in which it is written. Thus, for instance, the word autem appears merely as aut, with a line above it to indicate the missing letters; non is no; hominum, hoim and so on. Its value has grown with age, and though Gutenberg sold his copies at one hundred florins each, the possessor of the present volume was delighted to get it for what not very long ago the world would consider a fortune.

In 1840, a German poet, besides other airy nothings such as poets are often guilty of, gave his admirers the information that in printing the Bible "Gutenberg lighted a torch which the priests have ever since been trying to extinguish";—not an original conceit. The bard was merely embalming in verse the prevailing and obstinately persevering superstition which possesses the Protestant mind about the Catholic attitude to the Bible.

The priest never hated the printer, nor the printer the priest. For in the first place the book is in Latin, and, therefore, primarily intended for the clergy. Gutenberg was hard pressed for money at the time, and knew perfectly well that they would be his principal patrons. As a matter of fact both before and after the publication of this Bible they were his most enthusiastic supporters. Priests, bishops, archbishops and cardinals were jubilant at the success of his work, and regarded his new printing press—there were others before his—as a God-given instrument for the propagation of the Faith. Printers wore haloes in those days and were hailed as the new apostles of Catholicity. Presses were put up everywhere. Even recluses like the Carthusians were setting type in their monasteries; and, not to be surpassed by the monks, the nuns entered the composing-room. The convent of St. Bridget, in far-away Sweden, was busy publishing books, and in the short space of eight years, the Dominican Sisters of Florence gave no less than eighty-six works to the world. The monks of Bulgaria were printing ponderous tomes in Slavonic, and as early as 1493, a monastic printing press was working overtime at Cetinje in what is now semi-barbarous Montenegro. Germany, of course, where the invention originated, was in a ferment, and the excitement spread immediately to all other countries, Spain and Italy included. Even Christopher Columbus is said to have been for some time a printer. As early as 1475 there were as many as twenty printing presses in Rome, under the patronage of the Pope, and before the end of the fifteenth century no less than 925 works were issued in that centre of Catholicity, chiefly owing to the exertions of the clergy. Evidently the priests were not extinguishing Gutenberg's torch. They were giving it a fiercer flare.

But all this was to keep the Bible away from the people! On the contrary; the prevailing motive of this ecclesiastical activity was, as the publisher of the Cologne Bible expressed it, "that the people might the more readily be induced to a diligent study of Holy Writ." In Germany there were, in 1509, 22 editions of the Psalms in the vernacular, and 25 of the Epistles and Gospels before 1518. There were 14 complete editions of the Bible in High German and 5 in Low German before the Reformation. Nor was Germany an exception in this respect, for if anyone would take the trouble to examine the catalogue of the British Museum he would find listed there 11 German editions of the Bible ranging from 1466 to 1518, 3 in Bohemian, 1 in Dutch, 5 in French and 7 in Italian; and these, be it remembered, represent only the books which this particular museum has been able to obtain. What, then, becomes of the ridiculous but cherished myth that Martin Luther never saw a Bible till he was twenty years old, and that he was the only monk at Erfurt who possessed the precious volume? And how is it possible to account for that other delusion that the Catholic Church has, for the purpose of keeping the people in ignorance, persistently forbidden the reading of the Bible? From the very beginning of Christianity the smallest Catholic child has been made familiar with it; throughout the centuries the Church has stood as its defender against those who would mutilate and corrupt it; and to-day she still defies the world which would toss it aside as a human work, a fabrication or a romance. For her it has always been the inspired Word of God, of which she is the sole guardian and interpreter. The Holy Bible is her inheritance and she eagerly dispenses it to her children.

State Care of Children

Frequent reference is made to the huge burden carried by Catholics in their unselfish purpose to provide for their children, out of their own resources, the training which they cannot secure for them in State endowed institutions. A correspondent, writing recently to the New York Times, calls attention to another aspect of the indebtedness of the community to religious bodies. New York newspapers, on the day he wrote, had printed certain reports touching the question of the care of dependent children in orphan asylums of the municipality conducted by religious organizations. Quoting these figures, the correspondent affirms that a sum approximating $10 per month for each child is paid by the city. To be sure the outlay for each child is in excess of this, but the balance is met from funds otherwise accruing to the asylums, ordinarily from the charity of Catholics.

Then referring to the twelfth annual report of the city schools (page 384) the writer cites an object lesson, "which at this very time and for several years past has been given to us in the matter of the cost of caring for delinquent and dependent children in a home directly administered by the city itself." The correspondent has in mind the Parental School, an institution which it cost the city over $700,000 to build, and in which children committed to it are maintained at an actual cost per pupil of $4.55 per week.

The comparison between the cost to the State in private and public homes is illuminating. It becomes all the more so if one adds, as in perfect fairness he has the right to do, to the $4.55 representing the cost of actual maintenance of the child, the interest on the $700,000 expended in building the Parental School (a sum secured by bonds of the city) divided by the number of pupils regularly cared for in the school.

Items such as these serve as an interesting commentary when one has to deal with plans broached by progressists, with a view to having the State undertake almost completely the care of dependent children.

Catholic Women's Colleges

No one, not even her bitterest enemy, will deny that the Catholic Church has shown an extraordinary resourcefulness in the matter of education, and has proved to the world her ability to adapt herself at all times to new and difficult circumstances. The history of what she has achieved here in the United States within the last fifty years presents an admirable illustration of this. The situation the Church was obliged to face was one calculated supremely to test her resourcefulness. Laws making elementary training compulsory had been enacted practically in all the states, and the non-religious system provided to meet the school demands thence originating was not one of which the Church might approve. To assure her children a school training not lacking the essential detail of religious formation, the Church called upon the faithful to meet the emergency by establishing a parochial school system of their own. So splendid was the response that to-day there is scarcely a Catholic community in our land which is not deeply penetrated with the necessity of Catholic education, while in almost every instance in which the plan was at all feasible, many sacrifices have been made to organize Catholic elementary schools on a permanent basis and as systematically as possible.

Nor did the guiding spirits of our Church rest content with this. Institutions for secondary and college training were not forgotten, and although, up to the close of the nineteenth century, the energy of Catholics had been spent chiefly in meeting the need of elementary schools, private interests within the Church had succeeded in founding and equipping even university schools in which the desire of Catholics for the most advanced educational work might be gratified.

In the tremendous efforts made to achieve all this one detail seemed to be overlooked for a time. Provision for the advanced training of young women apparently had not been deemed a need demanding immediate attention. True, the Community of the Sacred Heart and other religious bodies had been obtaining splendid results in the academic work accomplished in their schools, but we have not had until recently an institution quite on the lines of such women's colleges as Vassar, Wellesley and Bryn Mawr. This seeming defect the resourcefulness of Catholics has of late been meeting quite satisfactorily. Already we have in Trinity in Washington, St. Mary's in Notre Dame, Indiana, Mount St. Joseph in Dubuque, St. Elizabeth's at Convent Station in New Jersey, and St. Angela's in New Rochelle, New York, colleges for Catholic women whose efficient work is not at all behind that done in the older non-Catholic colleges.

And apparently these mark but a beginning. Last September, encouraged thereto by His Grace, Archbishop Farley, of New York, the Sisters of Charity of the metropolis opened college courses in their well-known school at Mt. St. Vincent-on-Hudson, New York, and so signally successful has the project proved, that the report comes to us of completed arrangements for a new college building and a dormitory. From the Middle West, too, there is received the gratifying announcement that Archbishop Messmer, of Milwaukee, has given his hearty endorsement to the plan to establish in his diocesan city a Catholic college for the higher education of women, to be conducted by the Sisters of Charity of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Meantime, that there may be no lack of trained young women ready, should the inclination and opportunity come to them to enter these college schools, Catholics everywhere are studiously considering the question of the equipment of secondary schools for Catholic girls, in which the necessary preparatory work for this higher training may be accomplished under Catholic safeguards. Philadelphia offers the most recent example of their activity in this matter. The generosity of the revered Archbishop, lately called to his reward, made possible there a great Catholic High School for girls. Before his death Archbishop Ryan turned over to the school authorities of Philadelphia the plot of ground necessary and the basic sum of $100,000 for the work. Monsignor McDevitt, superintendent of schools in the archdiocese, is now planning to accomplish its erection.

Surely, we Catholics may be justly proud of our achievements in educational work, and the honest pride we feel in it unquestionably is a mitigating influence in bearing the burden which our sacrifices in the cause of religious training entail.

Sunday Comic Supplements

One is glad to observe the growth of sentiment in opposition to these monstrosities. Men and women everywhere appear to be awaking to the pernicious influence the Comic Sheet Section of Sunday newspapers must necessarily exercise. One is especially gratified to find that the objections raised have to do principally with its demoralizing effect upon children. Somehow, too many parents pay no heed to the fact that the child mind is easily impressed. They are careless, nay, indifferent, concerning what a child reads so long as it is amused and interested. The Comic Section does amuse, and, unhappily, it does interest the child, feeding its imagination with conceits which it would never think of otherwise. But doing this, it unfortunately does more. It vulgarizes thought, life and literature, and its influence upon the child mind is regularly such as to create a perverted taste for all that makes for refinement.

Why do not the editors of these supplements recognize this fact and give us a magazine section of reading and pictures that will stimulate, not pervert the sense of beauty natural to the child? The plan has been adopted by newspapers in some of our large centres, notably by great dailies in New York and Philadelphia. There is splendid missionary work to be accomplished in this field, and if our papers were to banish the crude offensiveness of their caricatures, the effect would be as far-reaching and as helpful as is that of the welfare work undertaken to ameliorate the physical and moral condition of the child throughout the country.

The Dean of the Despots

Could the Constitutional Governor of a State hanker after a designation as distinctive as it is not honorable? Tlaxcala, one of the smallest Mexican States, enjoyed the ministrations of one and the same governor for twenty-six years. He resigned the other day, and the people are so resigned to this heroic deed of his that they have dubbed him the dean of the despots. "Let Don Prospero (the retiring governor) go away off some place and write a book; however bad it may be, it will be better than anything that he has done as Governor of Tlaxcala." This sounds as if it had been published somewhere near the border, and on the American side of the river; it appears in a paper published in the City of Mexico, almost in the shadow of the national palace; and Don Prospero is a hanger-on of President Diaz; both have shown great staying ability. "The grandsires and grandames of future generations will frighten little children by threatening to call Don Prospero; for anything like his administration was never seen before it and never will be seen after it." Beggars' dogs may now bark at him before whom Tlaxcala trembled.

The chain that binds Mexico is not long, but it is strong. Mexican newspapers (and their editors) have had for so long the unpleasant and disconcerting habit of disappearing from view without taking leave, that we are ready to wave farewell to our esteemed contemporary, whose dexterity in steering between Scylla and Charybdis has probably occasioned a head-on collision with a floating government mine. In what may be the last number of this paper which we shall see, he states succinctly the five links of the chain that binds Mexico. They are worth remembering.

(1) Despotism claims the first place, for on it the others hang. Arbitrary imprisonments and executions have signalized the rule of the "permanent fixtures" in Mexican politics. (2) Peonage, or the virtual enslavement of the agricultural classes, and especially the evils and abuses of the contract labor system; the power of the planters in the courts and in politics is to blame for it. (3) Industrial slavery, which, thanks to the privileges and influence of the proprietors, keeps factory employes in bondage. (4) Plantation slavery, that is, taxes are not proportioned to the holdings, but are piled up on small proprietors, thus driving the small holder to bankruptcy and enabling the large holder to add to his domain. (5) Monopolies, financial and commercial, which, owing to official protection, have crushed the small dealer and have put business in the hands of the chosen few. (6) Favoritism for foreigners, giving them preference over the natives, as a result of government favor shown to them, and of the influence of foreign diplomatic representatives.

These six links, says a Mexican lawyer, have been forged, thanks to the continuance in office of the same men who have been official Mexico for a generation. When the Madero revolt broke out, it was looked upon as a wild and senseless scheme which could command no support. After four months of military activity, the administration finds that it has to contend, not only with revolutionists in arms, but with other revolutionists, who seek a peaceful revolution, and even with the cowardly pose of many of its supposed admirers, who are seeking shelter from the fury of the storm. "Step lively," we seem to hear old Charon say; for, though Mexicans will bear much, when once aroused they are not easily appeased.

—•••—

The following paragraph appeared in the London Tablet of April 15:

"'Peace, perfect peace,' was sung at All Saints', Margaret street, reports the Daily Telegraph, on March 26, in memory of the Rev. Perceval Walsh, Vicar of Stanton Harcourt. He was considered the oldest Freemason in England at the time of his death. 'Shades of Upton Richards, Liddon, Rawlinson (afterwards a Catholic) and others of the then Ultra-High School, who professed to hold Freemasonry in honor,' is the comment of a correspondent."

"Honor" is evidently a misprint for horror. Indeed, one of the signs of how much nearer the old High Churchmen were to thinking with the Church than are their successors with all the developments of ritual these have produced, was their horror of Freemasonry. We knew one of them who, initiated in his youth into the Orange Society, refused formally in his maturer years to act as chaplain to the Lodge in his parish, on the ground that, as a secret society and a society with its own religious rite, Orangeism is anti-Christian. He persuaded, with these reasons, a barrister, who afterwards was raised to the Canadian bench, to abandon the society and to renounce Freemasonry, of which he had been Provincial Grand Master. Eventually, the lawyer entered the Church; the clergyman, alas! had not the same happiness.

—•••—

From China comes the report of the breaking out of a revolution at Canton. Li, the Taotai of the city, has been assassinated. A Chinese brigadier has been killed, and the Viceroy's palace attacked. Hundreds of rebels are reported slain, and British and American gunboats are hurrying to the scene of the disorders.

CONCERNING CARIBS

It isn't fair to ask an ordinary, sane, well-informed man, "What is a Carib?" You might just about as intelligently ask, "Why is a Carib?" None but a most superlatively anthropologic dryasdust could be expected to attempt an answer; and, ten to one, even he would get it wrong.

There is a big Carib village not far from Belize, in British Honduras. One can get some rough, first-hand information there. You go to it by sea—unless you happen to be a rather unusually expert woodsman and don't mind traversing tangled tropical swamps and crossing rivers innocent of bridges. You go to it in a sail-boat. Sometimes it is six hours distant from Belize, sometimes it is twenty-four. That may smack of Black Magic; but it is really a most natural phenomenon. The location of the village does not change at all. It is only the wind which blows you there that changes.

Suppose you leave Belize at high noon; and suppose the wind blows decently from the north or east: then you run southward along the coast, through wonderfully blue water and past sleepy little palm-crowned islands (which remind you somehow of civilized feminine Easter hats.) Headlands, ringed with breaking seas, rise up on your right, and fall behind again. Gulls and pelicans poise overhead in the warm bright air, or follow you along a bit in momentary curiosity. You dream through the lazy heat, and watch the clouds sailing above you, apparently racing your little sloop. The sun sets over low hills a dozen miles inland. The dense growth that fringes the coast a league or so away changes to olive-green and softens into purple. And as the short twilight comes on, you swing past a wooded point and turn in towards the shore and the white lines of breakers. Before you is a low beach, a vague cluster of houses in which lights begin to twinkle scantily, a background of blue-black mountains, and the ashes of sunset in the sky. A long canoe, hewn from a single cedar, is dropped over the side of your boat. You step in—very gingerly; the craft is crank, the sea tumbling—and two brawny fellows run you through the rushing foam to the beach. These are the easiest known preliminaries to the high and honorable study of the Black Caribs. And the name of the village is Stann Creek.

There are three thousand Caribs in Stann Creek (over two-thirds of them Catholics, by the bye), and their village straggles along the beach in a few thin lines of houses for two or three miles. The whole place has something of the air of an overgrown family gathering. There are no fences, no particular order of arrangement in the location of houses, which stand at all angles to one another, with the one instinct, apparently, of snuggling comfortably together. The streets too share in the very informal, shirt-sleeves character of the place. They wander like wilful children, in most any old direction; and—perhaps because they are so very much unrestrained and easy—they manage always to be graceful. There is no bewildering variety of architecture in the houses. A little box made of slabs from the cabbage-palm, mounted on stilts, with a roof of guana grass or, in the case of the prosperous, of sheet-iron; that is a description which does not leave out more than half a dozen houses in the village. Pastor Wagner might feel at home here—the simple life abounds.

But indeed any one might feel at home in Stann Creek. It has a perpetual air of welcome. You wander along the winding streets in the dusk, to stretch your legs after the cramping of the little sloop. There is just a little pleasant light in the sky; twilight or moonlight, you don't quite question which: enough at any rate to show you cheerful smiling black faces, and grins that seem to shine out like glow-worms. The day is over, and the heat thereof; dinner has been dispatched; the trades blow in, full of the salt coolness of the sea; there are groups of men and women lolling about everywhere, stalwart fellows in calico trousers and tunics ready and eager to talk with the stranger, armies, as it seems, of toddlers in nature's innocent garb; the air is babbling with talk, with soft laughter, with tinkly music. Everywhere you are greeted, with a certain shy kindness that almost makes you feel you have been expected. You have half a conviction that it is all old and familiar to you. And you go to bed with a satisfying, comforting sensation of being amongst your own.

Everyone gets up early in hot countries. In the grey dawn the fishermen of the village are chatting and singing on the beach, running their canoes through the surf. Soon after the market opens; the housewives are loudly bargaining in the great shed where all perishable food-stuffs are sold. The waking village is as cheerful, as humming with chatter and the kindly hubbub of genial folk as it was the evening before. And what sturdy people they are! Men and women are tall, well-formed, muscular. And every woman seems to have some amazing load balanced upon her head, a great flat wooden bowl piled high with plantain, fish, papaya, bread-fruit, what-not. They are black as negroes; they have negroid skulls and kinky hair. But they are not negroes—at least, not altogether. If you listen to the talk in the market-place, in the little open spaces between the houses, spaces that seem a common possession, in the tiny houses themselves, you can distinguish, even though no linguist, two very distinct languages. The men speak a rather harsh, guttural speech, apparently based on an African dialect and keeping, in the main, the characteristics of that idiom. But mingled with the African are many undoubted French words: except the first four, all the numerals are French, though sometimes slightly distorted; God is Bondiu; the names of the months are African, but of the days of the week four have French names and the other three are known by African phrases counting each so many days from Sunday; there are several of the French nasal combinations, the French "u" and "eu"; cross is groi; oil is luil, spirit is sifiri, and so on. And there have been no Frenchmen in this part of the world for some centuries.

The women speak this language also; but the women use amongst themselves another language in addition, one not known or understood by the men. Of it this only can be said, that it seems more nearly allied to Indian dialects of Central and South America.

All this is to introduce the legend of which one hears much amongst the Black Caribs. Once, the legend goes, the true Caribs, the Red Caribs, filled the islands now known as the Lesser Antilles, Guadalupe, Martinique, Sta. Lucia, St. Vincent, Barbadoes, and the rest. They were tall and strong and fierce. They were cannibals. They drove the milder Arawaks to the northern islands. Then came the white men, who defeated but never subdued the Caribs. At St. Vincent the French ruled, and in time brought African slaves; the Red Caribs on the island had fled to the interior and lived in the mountains. Somewhere in that most unsettled time of West Indian history, the seventeenth century, the black slaves rebelled, killed their French masters, and took their women. And because the black men, as did all men, feared the terrible Caribs, they had no peace until they had surrounded the Caribs in the hills of St. Vincent, and killed all the men and taken the women. But the Carib women kept to their own language, and mother taught it to daughter as is done even to-day. And from the French masters and their women came the barbarized French words into the black men's speech.

The story is given for what it may be worth. Whatever their origin, the Black Caribs are a fine sturdy thrifty people, the most daring sailors on the coast, brave, faithful, honest, cheerful. The Padres who work amongst them think highly of them. They are not easily won to a life of morality, but once they are captured, they stay captured; they can be depended upon. They cherish some rather odd views on the subject of marriage, very strongly resembling some of the notions lately propounded by eugenists and other strange by-products of civilization. One might say that Mr. George Bernard Shaw had many disciples in Stann Creek. (Or is it possible that Mr. Shaw has borrowed from the Caribs?) So closely do the extremes of civilization meet after all. But the Padres are changing, rather have changed, much of that. Four hundred marriages amongst a population of two thousand have, in the last six or seven years, thrust the Caribs of Stann Creek out from the number of the Fabians.

It is good to be in Stann Creek on Sunday morning. The little wooden church, pretentious enough for this part of the world, is filled with worshippers. Dignified barefoot ushers, with a scarf of office aslant their breast, marshal the congregation in all befitting solemnity. And when the Host is lifted up above the bowed and reverent heads, the walls of the little church expand to take in all the world. It is no more a foreign country, a strange people. We are at home again, in a gathering of men whom a few lonely priests through toil and prayer and plenty of privation have made our brothers in Christ. W. A. M.

LITERATURE

A Roman Diary and Other Documents Relating to the Papal Inquiry into English Ordinations MDCCCXCV, by T. A. LACEY. New York, etc.: Longmans, Green & Co.

A defeated general may find comfort in writing an account of his defeat, in telling with simple good faith of his plans and their failure, clinging to the belief that they should have succeeded, and that, if they did not, fortune or domestic intrigues must bear the blame. The public, seeing clearly in the light of the victor's straightforward story, that success was never possible, and that he was doomed to failure from the beginning, read his book with interest and with no little pity. Such a book we have before us. One cannot question the author's good faith, which makes his illusion the sadder. Every Catholic understanding the question was convinced at the time of the Commission on Anglican Orders that the champions of these were going to their overthrow, and the narrative of the Commission even as given by Mr. Lacey shows how right was that conviction.

The story of the origin of the Commission is like a romance. A French abbé meets Lord Halifax at a health resort. Absolutely ignorant of the Church of England, he accepts him as its type, and returns to France imbued with the idea that it has been misunderstood and even wronged; that with the exception of what relates to the Roman Pontiff its doctrine is Catholic, that its orders are valid, that its spiritual life is that of the Church of Christ, and that it is yearning for reunion with Rome. A visit to England, in which he is shown only the Ritualistic side of the Establishment, and a rebuff from the Archbishop of Canterbury, do not set him right. He clings to his theory, perhaps the more tenaciously because it implies gross blundering at Rome in the past. Exaggerating everything favorable to it, and ignoring whatever would militate against it, he draws others to his side, amongst whom was the present Cardinal Gasparri, then a professor in the Institut Catholique, who had hitherto thought so little of the English Church that he had rejected its claim to the priesthood on the strength of the Nag's Head story. Friends were found, too, in Rome; the charity and zeal of Leo XIII were imposed upon so that he was almost persuaded that England was on the eve of conversion, and the reopening of the question of its orders was urged. Some wondered why so much should be made of this; for, after all, the prerogative of Peter must always be the real point at issue. But they were assured that in the minds of English churchmen their orders were uppermost, and the claims of Christian charity were urged to induce compliance.

The Commission was appointed; and here one sees the absolute sincerity of Rome. Whatever personal interest the Holy Father had in the matter would have inclined him to favor the friends of Anglican Orders. His well known love of England and his zeal for the return of all nations to the Catholic Faith had led him to give a willing ear to the good news from that country. But nothing of all this influenced him in the constituting of the Commission. There was one marked out by his theological science, by his acquaintance with Anglicanism gained by long residence in the United States, and by his familiarity with the English language, as preeminently fitted to preside over it, Cardinal Mazella, and him Leo XIII appointed to this office. It was hardly a good omen for the movement. Neither was the open hostility of two of the consultants, Canon Moyes and Abbot Gasquet, whose intimate knowledge of the whole question would give the greatest weight to their opinions. Lord Halifax and his friends sent the best men they had, Mr. Lacey, the author of the book before us, and Mr. Fuller, who had written much on controversy, to help out the defenders of Anglican Orders.

It was like sending volunteers to serve as chief staff officers against a thoroughly scientific army. They say that George IV, having been shown over the field of Waterloo, became persuaded beyond the possibility of correction that he had commanded the army in the battle. Like George, Anglicans, once they have dabbled in theology, usually become intimately convinced that they are theologians. Mr. Lacey is an exception. His mission was thrust upon him, and he confesses that the matters he had to handle were not always within his capacity.

As its title shows, his book is principally the diary he kept during his stay in Rome. In it one sees the strange incongruity of a clergyman hardly in touch with his surroundings dreaming of reunion in the centre of the Catholic Church. He visited religious, prelates and cardinals, and found all polite, some sympathetic, but few hopeful. He tells of his deficient French and Italian, of his potterings in libraries, useless, because he could not comprehend what to the trained theologians of the Commission were the crucial points of the matter, how Mgr. Gasparri, on whom such hopes had been built, declared himself sick of the whole business, and of his own incredulity when candid friends foretold the outcome of the investigation. The diary is followed by letters exchanged with friends in England, the memorandum of Mr. Gladstone to the Archbishop of York, a discussion of English and Roman historical documents which he interprets his own way, ignoring altogether Canon Moyes' masterly interpretation of them by the facts resulting from them. Then comes his amazing pamphlet "De Re Anglicana," prepared for the Commission with the destructive criticism by Canon Moyes and Abbot Gasquet. This he attempts to answer. But he touches a few only of their points turning upon such questions as the precise meaning of "many" and "few," and whether the bishops remaining in office during the reign of Edward VI and continued by Mary could be classed with Gardiner, Bonner and the other deprived bishops as "animo et sententia Catholici." His critics were, perhaps, not entirely free from partisan zeal and, it must be noted, wrote at considerable disadvantage in Rome; but every impartial reader will see that their account of the Church of England is essentially true, while Mr. Lacey's is essentially false.

This finishes the book as it touches directly the Commission. The author adds a discussion of the Bull Apostolicae Curae, the English Ordinal, of a decree of Gregory IX regarding Greek baptisms in the Province of Bari, about which much might be said, but which gives no foundation to his idea that it may become a precedent for the recall of the condemnation of Anglican Orders, and, as appendices, the Apostolicae Curae, the answer of the English Archbishops, which fully justifies the condemnation, and a supposed reply of Leo XIII. The introduction to the volume shows all the bitterness of disappointment. H. W.

The Brownies' Whispers. A Floral Cantata. By CLARA J. DENTON. Music by W. RHYS-HERBERT. New York: J. Fischer & Brother. Net 75 cents.

A gardener receives an order from the "mansion" for flowers, but the purpose of the decorations is withheld. This greatly distresses him lest he lose his patron's favor by bringing flowers that are not suited to the purpose. His daughter endeavors to aid him solve the problem, and summons the flowers before him, roses, lillies, daisies, etc., one at a time. They sing to him, and he is more at a loss than before. The Brownies, who know the secret but may not tell, whisper to the daughter while she sleeps in the garden, and she acts on the information.

The "Brownies' Whispers" is for grade-schools, and is capital in many respects. The libretto not only presents actual good features, but it offers possibilities to one who knows children well and can handle suggestions; it does not aim at a plot containing things suited to "grown ups," but is decidedly a child's play in its idea and development. It is laid in the child-world and has charming little lessons for the child-heart. From this standpoint the "Brownies' Whispers" is refreshing, and in its refining influence on young people, deserves to be named with rich old Fairy Tales and Mother Goose Rhymes. S. H. H.

The Siege of Boston. By ALLEN FRENCH. New York: The Macmillan Company.

As the Siege of Boston, considered by itself, was but one episode in our war of independence an author could hardly hope to keep the interest of modern readers sustained through a book of some five hundred pages if he were merely to spin out to that length the story of Boston's investment by the patriot army. So Mr. French begins ab ovo and fills more than half his book with the narrative of events preceding the siege. From a chapter on the "Beginnings and Conditions" of the difficulties between the colonies and the mother country, he passes on to tell about the Stamp Act agitation, the Boston Massacre and Tea Party, Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill. The character and services of Warren, Hancock and the Adamses are sympathetically delineated and the vast difficulties Washington had to grapple with in organizing the besieging army are vividly described. Without a man of Washington's patient genius it is hard to see how the British could ever have been forced to evacuate the town. Mr. French's interesting volume should stimulate his readers to learn the details of our first war's other campaigns. WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Frederick Ozanam. By KATHLEEN O'MEARA. New York: Christian Press Association.

This is a reprint of the "Life of Ozanam," by Kathleen O'Meara, who should never have assumed the nom de plume Grace Ramsay. Kathleen O'Meara is much more musical. Mr. Thomas M. Mulry, the President of the Superior Council of New York, has written the preface which is in reality an appeal to the educated and ambitious young men of our time to join the ranks of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. A glance at the book will show them that the same incentive to add the element of active charity to their otherwise almost worldly lives which induced Ozanam and the brilliant group of young men, of which he was the centre, to found the confraternity of the Vincentians exists for them. Those young Frenchmen were active and eloquent champions of Catholicity in their day, but the hard and unbelieving set with whom they were thrown said to them scoffingly: "You may boast as much as you like about the glory of the Church. That is all past. What are you doing?" Spurred on by this taunt, Ozanam and his friends set to work. They had no money but they could visit the poor and give them at least the alms of kind words which is better than money. Thus they began, never dreaming of the greatness which their charitable work would assume. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Medieval Mind. A History of the Development of Thought and Emotion in the Middle Ages. By Henry Osborn Taylor. Two volumes. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $5.

Aspects of Islam. By Duncan Black MacDonald, M.A., D.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. Meditations on the Blessed Virgin. From the German of Rev. Francis Gabriani, S.J. New Edition, Carefully Revised. By Rt. Rev. Alexander MacDonald, D.D. New York: Christian Press Association Publishing Co. Net $1.08 postpaid.

A Convert's Reason Why. By A. J. Hayes. Boston: Thomas J. Flynn & Co.

French Publications:

Histoire Du Concile Du Vatican. Depuis sa Première Annonce Jusqu'à Sa Prorogation. D'Après les Documents Authentiques. Ouvrage du P. Theodore Grandérath, S.J. Édité par Le P. Conrad Kirch, S.J. Tome Premier: Préliminaires du Concile. Tome Deuxième: Première Partie: L'Ouverture du Concile et les Premières Débats. Tome Troisième: Seconde Partie: La Constitution de Fide Catholica L'agitation extra-conciliaire. Bruxelles: Librairie Albert DeWit, Rue Royale, 53.

Italian Publications:

La Questione Di Papa Liberio. Per Fedele Savio, S.J. Edizione 1907. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

Nuovi Studi Sulla Questione Di Papa Liberio. Per Fedele Savio, S.J. Edizione 1909. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

Punti Controversi Nella Questione Del Papa Liberio. Per Fedele Savio, S.J. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

EDUCATION

The Journal of Education, a Boston publication, in its issue of April 13, comments on a condition of affairs which, if the many ugly references made to it in recent newspaper stories be at all reliable, we may not term unusual or merely sporadic. "It may be an epidemic," says the Boston journal, "but there is a shocking revelation of immoral silliness, to put it mildly, among college professors of late. . . . The retirement of so many in advanced years, and filling their places with youngsters fresh from college, of whose moral poise little is known, is sure to be disastrous unless their social and personal habits are carefully supervised. We are liable to pay a fearful price for the exchange of tried and true men for untried youth."

The reason of the evil thing thus noted is scarcely to be found in the explanation suggested. A much more likely one is given by the editor of the Sacred Heart Review (Boston, April 22), who has this to say in the matter: "We are inclined to think that the putting of young men in old men's places is not altogether to blame for the epidemic of 'immoral silliness' noted by the Journal of Education. It is not, in our opinion, the youth, but the training, of the college professors that is responsible. For years, writers have been commenting on some very queer opinions as to morality held and taught at the big secular universities. These false and pernicious opinions have begun to bear fruit."

Tally another victory for the movement indicating a return to sane methods in college work. At the annual banquet of the Michigan Alumni Association of Chicago, held at the University Club in that city, April 15, announcement was made of coming changes in the system at the Michigan school as regards "electives" in the literary department. Dr. Robert M. Wenley, professor of philosophy, told the guests that a special committee, appointed for this task four months ago, had made such progress with the plans to limit the elective system as to assure the completion of the committee's work in a short time. "As you know, we have come to a definite decision that the elective system is a failure," said Dr. Wenley, "and we are proceeding with the determination of giving a real Bachelor of Arts course."

The Chicago Tribune (April 21) chronicles a protest made at a conference of colleges, held under the auspices of Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., against the encroachment of the university system of specialization on the small college system. President Main, of Grinnell College, Iowa, explained the grievance. He told how, under the present system, universities admit sophomores from colleges into special courses in their schools, and on the completion of these courses grant the students both university and college degrees. This system, he declared, spells death for the college. He pleaded for the retention of the old four-year course, and held that, in the interest of true scholarship, colleges must intensify rather than scatter their efforts.

The same issue of the Tribune records as a news item, the fact that the University of Illinois omnibus bill, carrying nearly $4,000,000 in appropriations for that institution, was reported favorably by the House appropriations committee. One wonders whether those formulating the Galesburg protest were keen to do anything in the matter of this immense appropriation. It is precisely these stupendously endowed State universities whose educational vagaries make difficult the natural and proper work of the small college. Mere protests against the inevitable consequences of these vagaries will not bring relief, unless they be accompanied by energetic action directed against the unwise and unnecessary evolution of educational work in lavishly endowed State institutions.

Perhaps the severest indictment of American educational methods that has appeared of late is that found in the comment of an Oxford tutor upon the training of the Rhodes scholars entering the English university. The comment is quoted in the Carnegie Foundation report, and it will add considerable weight to recent home criticisms of the work done in our colleges. The Oxford man says: "With regard to the American Rhodes scholars, I think that their training in America has, in most cases, encouraged smattering in a large number of subjects. As a general rule, they know nothing well, but know something about a great many things—the kind of knowledge one might get from attending public lectures. Moreover, apparently even in scientific studies, they have not been accustomed to keeping their hold on work for any great length of time. The examinations appear to be in work which has not been done very long before the date of the examination intended to test it. As a consequence, they at first find the Oxford system difficult, for the double reason that they are expected to get up a subject thoroughly, and are tested by an examination much longer and more severe than that to which they have been accustomed, and on an extensive range of work, some of which has necessarily been done a considerable time before the examination takes place."

The Catholic Times of Liverpool favors us with the substance of an address delivered by Archbishop Bourne on the school question as it affects the Catholics of England. For the past sixty years, said the Archbishop, the question of the provision of secondary education for Catholic boys in London had been one of great concern to Catholics. It was a most complex question, and although many attempts had been made to put into practice schemes for the provision of schools for Catholic secondary education, all of them had failed. Attempts were made by Cardinal Wiseman and Cardinal Manning, and it was the first thing to which he gave his attention. Although something had been done in the way of preparation, nothing of a very practical nature had been accomplished. The Jesuit colleges at Wimbledon and Stamford Hill, the Benedictine school at Ealing, etc., were accomplishing excellent work, but there was not a single school of the type he meant in the County of London, and just when they were getting near the realization of their plans in that respect the Government made further restrictions that placed difficulties in the way of their accomplishment. The regulations made by the Government in their administrative work were of a character that made it almost impossible to set on foot a Catholic secondary school. It was laid down that the management of Catholic schools must be a popular one, and that there must be no test for teachers, so that if they took the regulations as they stood at the present time it was impossible, unless some device was adopted, to know that they were going to get Catholic teachers.

In order to set on foot a secondary school to-day a considerably greater sum of money would have to be expended than formerly. They had, he thought, £22,000, and as soon as the work could be proceeded with it would be carried out on the most effective lines. He hoped that interest would be aroused in the matter, and that they would do what they could to make known the terribly unjust burden that had been placed on the Catholic body by the Board of Education.

ECONOMICS

Some time ago we mentioned the action taken by the legislature of the Straits Settlement, a British colony, against the combination of the steamship companies trading to Eastern Asia. We hear from Japan that the independent shipowners have petitioned the Japanese parliament against the great companies of that country, begging for the abolition of many of the subsidies. Now the Federal Government of South Africa has declared war on the Steamship Conference including all the great British lines to the Cape. The mail contract with the Union-Castle Line will expire in September, 1912, and the Government has passed a Bill forbidding the letting of the new contract to any member of the Conference. It is not likely that the Union-Castle Line will withdraw from it, and so the question arises: Where will the contract go? An amendment prohibiting the contracting with foreign companies was rejected.

The steamship conference is not essentially unjust. Its object is to protect the great lines with millions invested in first-class ships against periodic rate wars which the owners of tramp steamers declare whenever it suits them to do so, and terminate in the same way. There is this great difference between a steamship and a railway combination: There can be no sudden and temporary invasion of a railway's territory; the sea, on the contrary, is open to all, and such invasions are always possible. If, then, the rates fixed by the agreement be just and reasonable, and if there be no unfair discrimination regarding shippers (two conditions that the fact we have just mentioned tend to secure), it may be even an advantage to the public to know that freights and fares are not subject to sudden changes. On the other hand, though one may declaim against rebates, it does not seem contrary to justice to reward with them shippers who, in order to support the splendid and constant service of the great lines, refuse the temporary reductions offered by vessels cutting into the trade. The grievance of the Straits Settlement, it will be remembered, was that there was discrimination in these rebates, whereby certain houses were favored at the expense of others, an injustice in common carriers the Government is obliged to guard against.

The result of the new law will be either the letting of the contract to a foreign company, whose management cannot be controlled by the Government as thoroughly as that of British companies, the detaching of one of these from the Conference, or the setting up of a new line in opposition to the Conference as long as the contract lasts. None of these seems altogether satisfactory.

The heavy death duties levied in England on large estates cause no little inconvenience, especially when the succession reoccurs within short periods. Thus cases occur when the same estate has had to contribute twice in the same fiscal year on account of the death of the inheritor within a few months of his taking possession. However, "It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," and the Insurance Companies are taking advantage of this state of affairs to increase their profits. They are issuing special policies to provide funds for death duties, and proprietors are naturally availing themselves of this very convenient way of saving their estates from the sudden strain they would otherwise have to sustain.

For generations the name Barclay and Perkins has meant to Londoners solid and substantial wealth. It has also stood for an enormous consumption of drink in a great number of beer-houses. For years past legislation has been at work on the scandal of London drunkenness, and not unsuccessfully. The directors of Barclay, Perkins and Company inform the shareholders that the depreciation in their property owing to this legislation amounts to £2,500,000. To meet this they propose to write the ordinary capital shares down from £100 to £1, or, in other words, to reduce the value of this investment from £1,020,000 to £10,200. Cumulative preference £10 shares are not to suffer so severely. They are to be written down to £4 to effect a capital reduction of £1,080,000, but as their income is to remain unchanged and they are to be redeemed, in case of winding up, at their original value, this reduction is apparently only nominal. Lastly, the Reserve Fund of a little over £500,000 is to be drawn on for £410,200. This is hard on the ordinary shareholders; but one must not forget that as they have lived for so long on the intemperance of the poor, they must not complain of the inconvenience the reforming of this intemperance occasions them.

SOCIOLOGY

A new scheme for simplifying the calendar comes from England. It proposes to make New Year's Day unreckoned either in the week, or the month, or the year, something like the Sansculottides of the Revolutionary calendar. The year would then consist of 364 days, or 52 weeks; and the days of each month would always recur on the same day of the week. The additional day of Leap Year would follow the same rule as New Year's Day. There is the same difficulty here as in another plan announced a year ago, in which Easter was to be a fixed date—namely, that Christians will have nothing to do with it, nor Jews either. The reason is obvious. The first week of each year and the first week of March in Leap Year would both have eight days; and so the Christian Sunday and the Jewish Sabbath, neither of which is at the disposal of arbitrary calendar-makers, would be displaced. As mankind has not yet reached a state of perfect imbecility, but is still capable of sums in simple addition and subtraction, the need of the so-called reform is not very clear.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The following is printed in the issue for April 21 of the Liverpool Catholic Times from its correspondent in Rome:

"Father Bricarelli, S.J., announces that he will forthwith institute an action for libel against the ex-priest Vardesi, of Rome, who has just joined the Methodists, for charging him with violating the seal of confession. As a matter of fact, when Vardesi accused himself in a confession to the Jesuit priest over a year ago of having taken part in Modernist gatherings, his confessor had to decide if he were bound to denounce the members of those reunions, and accordingly asked the advice of the Pope on the matter. Pius X declared that such a penitent would be bound to reveal the names under pain of grave sin. And now this course, a course which has to be adopted every day throughout Christendom in such doubtful matters, is forthwith called violation of the sacramental seal by the apostate! Pius X, as Vardesi is well aware, when speaking to Father Bricarelli of the case, had not the remotest idea of whose case of conscience they were treating. However, the miserable man had to cast about for some reason for his apostasy. It is now said he is about to be married. His family, a good old Catholic family of Rome, has written a letter to the press, declaring that their door is inexorably closed to the son who has caused them so much shame and sorrow."

SCIENCE

Long range weather forecasting dates back to the days of the celebrated astronomer, Herschel. The methods heretofore followed having been everything but scientific and reliable, the department of astro-physics of the Smithsonian Institute is about to try to make them so. The work has been entrusted to Dr. C. G. Abbott and Secretary Charles D. Walcott, who will begin their investigations with some preliminary observations indicating that, distinct from seeming modifications due to local conditions, there is a variation in the amount of radiation from the sun, which apparently affects the weather. A new laboratory will be established in the cloudless regions of southern Mexico, making the fourth devoted to this research, the other three being located at Washington, Mt. Whitney and Mt. Wilson. In speaking of the results already reached, Dr. Abbott says: "Our measurements at Mt. Wilson have been carried on for several years. The first expedition was in 1905, and we have observed almost daily for six months of each year from 1905 to 1910, excepting in 1907. In 1910 I was fortunate in having two weeks of good weather on the summit of Mt. Whitney, which is the highest mountain in the United States. I carried on there complete measurements, which were simultaneous with those carried on at Mt. Wilson. We have found that the results obtained at Mt. Whitney check and substantiate completely the work we were doing at Mt. Wilson. Therefore, having established a standard scale of measurements and having shown that we get the same results at Washington, Mt. Wilson and Mt. Whitney, we are now able to state the value of the solar constant of radiation. This value is of an importance equal to that of the distance of the sun in astronomical work. Our measurements show a range of the value of the solar radiation outside of our atmosphere of about 8 per cent. Now, by taking stations so far apart that no local condition in the atmosphere can affect them both, we may actually prove whether or not these variations are in the sun, or are something that we have not eliminated in the atmosphere. If we find them in the sun we shall have made a discovery of the first rank."

Herr Brandes, a German scientist, has perfected a new method for purifying feed water. He calls it a Luminator, and it promises to extend the life of steam-boilers considerably. It consists in bringing feed water into contact with an aluminium plate of special dimensions, with corrugations of special size. No chemicals are used. The action seems to be that by the passage of the water at rated speeds over the metal surface frictional electricity is induced with a negative electrification of the water and an ionization of the salts, causing them to become amorphous. Besides, aluminium particles, abraded both by friction and by electrical decomposition, form in the water a colloid which at length undergoes a change. The action of the impregnated water is explained by engineers as follows: The colloidal aluminum acts as nuclei for the evolution of carbon dioxide and the crystallization of the salts. Moreover, that there is an absorption of oxygen by the particles, causing a desired deoxygenation. American and foreign engineers confirm all the claims for this new process.

Prof. Otto Hahn is under contract to deliver to the French Academy of Science within the next few months 250 milligrams of a new substance which is expected to be a fair substitute for radium. This new radio-active material is a by-product of the manufacture of thorium gas mantles, and is known as mesothorium. When in combination with bromide it is whitish in color and has the same properties as the corresponding salts of radium. Its price is about a third of that of the rarer salts. It is claimed that Germany alone can produce ten grams of mesothorium in a year, which is in excess of the entire world's supply of radium salts.

The luminosity of the sky on a starlit night, says Lambertus Yntema, an astronomer who has been carrying on extensive researches along these lines in Germany, is attributable in part to the direct light of the stars, in part to some other source which he styles earth-light, which he thinks may be a permanent aurora. A measuring of the light shows that it varies not only on different nights but also at different periods of the same night. It has been found to amount to as much as from 7 to 15 times mean-starlight, but it is surmised that this is an exceptional ratio peculiar to the locality in which it was determined. Observations also indicate that the light has its origin close to the earth's surface, and that it is akin to the light emitted by the coma of a comet.

Prof. Jeffery reports in the Proceedings of the American Academy of Sciences that he has been able, by improved methods, to obtain thinner sections of bog-head coal than have been possible hitherto, and that a microscopic examination of these sections reveals not algae but spores of vascular cryptogams. Paleontologists have always been of the opinion that these types of coal are largely composed of gelatinous algae. Professor Jeffery's investigation undermines the algae hypothesis regarding the origin of petroleum.

The United States Bureau of Standards has just completed the installation of two of the largest and, at the same time, most sensitive machines in the world for the testing of iron, steel and other forms of building materials. The smaller is rated to 230,000 and the larger to 2,300,000 pounds. A special feature of these testers is the weighing mechanism, which makes it possible to test a piece of tool steel 6 inches in diameter and a hair spring of a watch with like accuracy. The price for the two apparatus is about $200,000.

The investigations by the English government into the sterilization of water by bleaching powder are not only interesting from a scientific standpoint, but also promise to replace processes hitherto reckoned efficient, safe, and economical. Analyses have shown that 1 part of available chlorine to from 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 parts of water completely destroys all non-sporeing organisms within 20 minutes, leaving neither smell nor taste to the water. Manufacturers of domestic filters are examining how they can utilize this method.

The French Coinage Commission has rendered an adverse decision on the adoption of an aluminium coinage, claiming that neither the pure metal nor its alloys offer sufficient resistance to blows or friction. An aluminium bronze is recommended, consisting of 90% of copper and 10% of aluminium. Coins of this composition have a beautiful yellow hue and to prevent any confusion, the committee recommends that the coins be pierced with central orifices so as to prevent their being mistaken for gold.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

A large public meeting will be held under the auspices of the Laymen's League at Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of May 7, at which the speakers will be Condé B. Pallen, Ph.D.; James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.; W. Bourke Cockran, and His Grace the Archbishop of New York. A full statement will be made at that meeting of the plans of the League. The Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies has been organized to carry on the Retreat movement and to establish courses of systematic study by Catholic laymen of Social Questions and modern Christian apologetics. His Grace the Archbishop of New York is the Honorary President and the Bishops of Brooklyn, Trenton and Newark are Honorary Vice-Presidents. Father Terence J. Shealy, S.J., is the Spiritual Director.

The Social Studies to be established by the Laymen's League have been planned by a special Committee on Social Studies, formed for that purpose and including in its membership a number of the leading Catholic laymen of New York.

The plan of Social Studies provides for a course of classes designed to train a band of Catholic laymen as competent lecturers upon the questions coming under the general head of "Socialism," so called, so that these men can go out whenever requested and expound and defend Catholic teaching upon these matters. The division of the subject will be three-fold, viz.: Historical, Ethical and Economic. The department of modern apologetics will be conducted on the plan of popular lectures designed to cover the "Layman's Difficulties" in the field of (1) Historical and Biblical Criticism, (2) Social and Political theories, (3) "Scientific" questions and (4) Current Controversies. The courses of classes and lectures will begin next fall and will continue through the winter and spring.

For a permanent House of Retreats the League has purchased the Fox Hill Villa, near Fort Wadsworth, on Staten Island, and will occupy it as soon as the necessary changes are completed. It will be called Mount Manresa.

The new property is magnificently situated, having a superb view of the harbor and the ocean gateway. There is a fine large manor house containing forty rooms, and twenty acres of ground beautifully improved with gardens. L. H. Meyer bought the land about forty years ago, when that portion of Staten Island was unimproved. Mr. Meyer took a particular pride in improving the place, and is said to have spent more than $800,000 on it; in fact, it was one of the show places of the island for many years. It has a great deal of natural beauty and is so situated that the members may reach it in an hour from almost any part of Manhattan. The place is renamed Mount Manresa in honor of the Spanish town of Manresa, where St. Ignatius Loyola wrote his famous Spiritual Exercises.

The property, besides being restored to the great beauty which characterized it during the former owner's life, will be improved by the erection of an imposing structure on the hill in the rear of the grounds.

On May 16th the first session, which is named the antepreparatory, will be held in Rome, at which the Sacred Congregation of Rites will discuss the question: Has the Venerable John Nepomucene Neumann practised the theological and cardinal virtues in an heroic degree? This is an official communication from the Very Rev. Father General of the Redemptorists.

Archbishop O'Connell will leave Boston early in May for Belgium to attend the preliminary meeting there of the officials of the coming Eucharistic Congress, which is to take place in Madrid, June 24-29, and at which he will also be present.

Spanish-speaking Catholics in San Francisco recently started a weekly paper with the title América Española.

An autograph letter from Pope Pius X was received by Mrs. Ann Elisa McCaddin Walsh of Brooklyn, N. Y., commending her endowment of the Henry McCaddin Junior Fund for the education of candidates for the priesthood in the poorer dioceses of the country. Not only the signature, but the entire letter, is in the handwriting of the Holy Father. It is written in Italian, the following being given as a free translation, in part: "To our beloved daughter, Ann Elisa McCaddin Walsh, who has deserved so much by providing for the education of so many young men to the priesthood; hoping that the Lord may reward her with His choicest graces, especially for this work of charity and religion; in token of gratitude and good will we heartily impart the apostolic benediction."

We are in receipt of a letter from the Rev. J. E. Burke, Director-General of the Catholic Board for Mission Work among the Colored People. It is a warning that a number of colored men, supposedly ministers, some of them wearing the Roman collar, are collecting money for industrial institutions in the South. One of them calls himself a priest; another a bishop. When the latter was challenged, he said that he could get more money if he passed as a bishop. "Money given to them," says

Father Burke, is money thrown away. "I would ask, therefore," he continues, "to refer such collectors to me and to say to them a donation will be given if they receive a word of recommendation from the Rev. J. E. Burke, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City."

The Federation of Catholic Societies of Louisiana, which, National Secretary Matre states, is among the most flourishing in the country, held its ninth annual convention in New Orleans, April 23 and 24. Bishop Van de Ven celebrated Solemn High Mass in the Cathedral, which was crowded by representatives of all the Catholic societies of city and State, and Perosi's Mass was rendered by the Choral Society of the Knights of Columbus. The preacher, Rev. R. H. Smith, C.M., president of Jefferson College, stressed the necessity of the lay apostolate, a network of societies fostering Catholic education, circulating Catholic papers and literature, resolutely combating public acts and pronouncements opposed to sound morals or Christian belief, and applying the remedy of Catholic principles to the moral and intellectual evils that threaten the life of the body politic. At the public meeting in the Knights of Columbus Hall, President Denechaud said the great object of the Federation was to conserve the Church, the home and the national tie that made the home. Hon. M. I. Weller of Washington, D.C., sketched the story of Catholicity in Washington, Maryland and Virginia, pointing the lesson of our gains and losses from the Spanish foundation at Jamestown, 1525, to the establishment of the Apostolic Delegation. Father Cagney, O.P., of Chicago, speaking on Divorce, said the remedy, outside of Catholic example, was the social ostracism of divorcees. Catholics could not set the stamp of social approval on those who openly practised immorality. Hon. J. J. McLoughlin made a strong plea for the extension and support of Church Extension societies and the fostering of a missionary spirit among laity as well as clergy. Archbishop Blenk commended the zealous activity of the Federation, which, since the great national convention at New Orleans in the fall, has doubled its membership. He urged its further development, and among other results hoped through its efforts to strike divorce from the laws of Louisiana. Very Rev. J. B. Bogaerts addressed the delegates in Jesuits' Hall, April 24, on Catholic colonization, and particularly on the work and plans of the Catholic Colonization Society of America, established in Chicago, 1910, under the presidency of Rev. J. Devos, to direct Catholic immigration to and through the United States. Industrial as well as agricultural colonization is provided for, and already many companies have applied to the society for colonies, guaranteeing in each instance to provide a Catholic Church and school. Eight have been established under this plan, and several are under consideration. Resolutions were passed commending the city authorities for suppressing "La Samaritaine" on the protest of the Federation, and urging similar action against all objectionable plays and publications; also requesting the city papers to publish no photographs of immoral characters or criminals when not needed for identification. Mr. C. I. Denechaud was re-elected president.

John D. Rockefeller has offered to give $5,000 for St. Ann's Maternity House and Infant Home of Cleveland, Ohio, if other friends of the institution will give $8,000 within the next three months.

OBITUARY

After an illness of less than a week, the Rev. William St. Elmo Smith, the first Catholic chaplain attached to the New York Fire Department, died in the French Hospital, New York, April 28. Father Smith was attached to St. Vincent de Paul's Church, West Twenty-third Street. On March 28, 1899, he was appointed chaplain in the department. He ranked as a battalion chief, and attended every large fire in the last ten years. He was popular with the men, and was often called upon to administer the last rites of the Church in the performance of his duty as chaplain. All the battalion chiefs and the regulation number of eighty men attended his funeral in a body and acted as an escort.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

CINCINNATI'S SISTERS' SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"A Brief History of the Catholic Church in the United States," published by Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss, and written by the Sisters of Notre Dame, Namur, invites the following criticism:—

On page 67 is this statement, "The Sisters of Charity [of Cincinnati] had been working in the diocese since 1829, caring for the orphans, and Bishop Purcell who was an advocate of Catholic education brought the teaching Order of the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur to open schools, 1840."

The History could not have been compiled by the Sisters of Notre Dame of the Cincinnati Province as they would have at hand an abundance of correct historical material in the old files of the Catholic Telegraph, abstracts from which I send with this letter, to verify the statement herewith presented.

Bishop Fenwick, the predecessor of Bishop Purcell, also "an advocate of Catholic Education," had the initiative, and he brought the "teaching Order" of the Sisters of Charity (Mother Seton) from Emmitsburg, October 27, 1829. The Dominican Nuns from Kentucky had an Academy and District School at Somerset in 1831, and the Poor Clares opened an Academy in Cincinnati at a very early date. Mother Seton's community was and is a teaching body. Mother Seton herself and the majority of her companions were highly educated and cultured American ladies. They were finished English scholars, many of them knew several languages, and nearly all of them spoke French fluently. When Archbishop Carroll, January 17, 1812, gave formal approbation to the American Daughters of Charity—the first diocesan approbation in the United States, by the first Archbishop of the United States, to the first religious community founded in the United States, he instructed the Sisters as follows: "In the meantime, assure yourself and them [the Sisters] of my prayers for your prosperity in the important duty of education which will and must long be your principal, and will always be your partial, employment. A century at least will pass before the exigencies and habits of the country will require and hardly admit of the charitable exercises toward the sick, sufficient to employ any number of Sisters out of our large cities; and therefore, they must consider the business of education as a laborious, charitable and permanent object of their religious duty." (Shea, "Life and Times of the Most Rev. John Carroll," p. 649.)

Armed with this command of their first ecclesiastical superior, the Sisters of Charity went forth to all the large cities of the United States, the pioneer teachers of this country, and inaugurated our great Catholic parochial school system. Following Mother Seton's plan at Emmitsburg, they opened side by side, a pay school and a free school, often with an orphanage attached.

This they did in Cincinnati in 1829. They took six little orphans to live with them, and immediately opened their school near the old Cathedral on Sycamore Street. The Catholic Telegraph began its existence October 22, 1831. Its old volumes furnish many interesting accounts of the public examinations conducted in the Sisters' schools in the presence of the Bishop of the diocese, the reverend professors of the ecclesiastical seminary and prominent secular gentlemen. The seminary was close to the Cathedral on Sycamore Street, but General Lytle gave to Bishop Fenwick property in Brown County, Ohio, for educational purposes and the seminary was later transferred thither. In a short time Bishop Purcell regretted this change because he could not give the students his personal supervision, so he resolved to bring the seminary back to the city. He decided to open a Young Ladies' Boarding School in Brown County, and asked for another colony of Sisters of Charity.

Demands from various parts of the country were in excess of the number of Sisters at Emmitsburg, and the Superiors there were compelled regretfully to decline the Bishop's invitation, while "he himself," as he wrote to Mother Margaret, "was forced with sincere sorrow to turn aside from old and dear friends and make application to strangers, a thing he would never have thought of doing, had St. Joseph's Vale been able to supply the growing needs of his diocese."

The Religious of the Sacred Heart had made him a promise to come to his diocese but found they could not fulfill it at this time. Remembering that when he was in Belgium about two years previously he was told that the Sisters of Notre Dame, a community founded in 1803, whose rules were approved toward the middle of the century, desired to labor in foreign countries, he applied to the Bishop of Namur and later to the Mother Superior, asking for Sisters and promising them the old seminary property, "one hundred acres in perpetuity," telling them also that he might need later a foundation in Cincinnati, and one in Chillicothe. The letters of Sister Louis de Gonzaga, among the enclosures above mentioned, give a correct account of the coming of the Sisters of Notre Dame as well as a picture of the pleasure the Sisters of Charity found in welcoming other Religious to their old field of labor.

Which is the older, and why?

On page 26 of the History is a paragraph "Visitandines" and immediately following it, "The Sisters of Charity." The next to the last sentence in the former paragraph is: "This was the Georgetown, D. C., establishment, the oldest female academy within the limits of the Thirteen Original States."

Such a conclusion does not follow from the arguments in the two paragraphs:—

"Miss Lalor's first house was founded in 1808." Mrs. Seton became a Catholic in 1805 and three years later (1808) "opened an Academy at Emmitsburg, Md. Here in 1809, she, with four associates, took the religious habit and they adopted the rule of St. Vincent de Paul with some modifications." (They were formally approved in January, 1812.)

"Miss Lalor's community was approved July 24, 1817. On December 28, 1817, she, with two others, took solemn vows." She had taken simple vows in 1813.

Is not St. Joseph's Academy, Emmitsburg, the oldest Academy within the limits of the thirteen original States? It is certainly the oldest conducted by Religious. Cincinnati, Ohio, April 28. S. M. A.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 5

(Price 10 Cents)

MAY 13, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 109

CHRONICLE

Anglo-American Arbitration—Federal Control of State Lands—Senator O'Gorman Feted—Hoe Library Sale—Gold Medal for Mr. Carnegie—Nicaragua—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Germany—Austria-Hungary—Portugal97-100

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Quebec Marriage Case—Thirty-three Years on the Great Lakes—Dr. Karl Knud Krogh-Tønning—Unitarianism and Christianity.101-106

CORRESPONDENCE

A Correction—Italian Unity Celebration Paradoxes—Famine Conditions in North Kiangsu—Guatemala Justice107-109

EDITORIAL

War is Hell—Juvenile Crime—A Word to the Peace Society—Fee for Public Schooling—

Catholic Book Lists—The City of Confusion. 110-113

LITERATURE

"The Enchanting Gaelic Siren"—Wandering Ghosts—La Congregazione Mariana Studiata nei Documenti—A Papal Envoy During the Reign of Terror—The Childhood of Christ According to the Canonical Gospels—Books Received. 113-117

EDUCATION

An Italian Educational League—The Parmen-tier Memorial Commercial School—Benefits from the Study of Greek—Self-Supporting Students—The Boy Scout Fad—Paternalism in the Schools117-118

SOCIOLOGY

Federation and Catholic Rights—Families in France118

ECONOMICS

The Foreign Population of Shanghai.....118

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Meeting of the Archbishops of the United States—Resignation of Archbishop Keane—Disputation at Woodstock—Conversion of the Rev. A. J. Grant—Charitable Bequests—The Designation "Roman Catholic".....118-119

SCIENCE

Wood's Method of Photographing the Moon..119

OBITUARY

Rev. E. W. Cronin—Sir Charles Alphonse Pantaléon Pelletier—Rev. J. F. X. Tehan, S.J. 119-120

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Date of Newman's Ordination—The Catholic Directory—The Senior Catholic Academy...120

CHRONICLE

Anglo-American Arbitration.—Satisfactory progress is reported in the preparation of the proposed arbitration treaty with Great Britain. It has been agreed that in the negotiations the United States is to take the initiative, and our government will, therefore, submit the first completed form for the approval of Great Britain. Drafts of the several clauses were read at a Cabinet meeting, and in some instances plans, for each of which the phraseology had been prepared, were considered. Various Irish-American and German-American societies have protested against the proposed treaty, and Congress is being urged not to approve it. The House received a joint protest from the Irish-American and the German-American Societies of New York which reads: "Mindful of George Washington's warning against all entangling alliances, we are unalterably opposed to an alliance with Great Britain in any form or under any disguise; we are against the establishment of closer relations than those now existing between this government and Great Britain, on the ground that such alliance or closer relationship would invoke resentment on the part of other European powers and destroy our relations with them." The Central Council of Irish Clubs of Boston also filed a protest, declaring that "England is the hereditary foe of our native land and the land of our adoption." The petition says that "until Ireland is given legislative independence we will oppose alliances with Great Britain."

Federal Control of State Lands.—Two important decisions bearing on the general policy of conservation were rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. One holds that the Federal Government may, without consulting the State affected, set aside public lands in that State as a forest reserve, and that such lands are not subject to State fencing laws. The other is to the effect that the United States Grand Jury may bring indictments against persons grazing stock on forest reserves without permits. The Supreme Court maintains that the United States has the absolute right to do what it pleases with its own property, inasmuch as the Constitution has given it such power; and this control is not a right incident to sovereignty, as claimed by the opponents of the reservations, but is the exercise of a right which every citizen possesses.

Senator O'Gorman Feted.—Six hundred members and guests of the National Democratic Club greeted James A. O'Gorman, the new Junior United States Senator from New York, at a dinner given by the club, in his honor, at the Hotel Astor, New York City. Governor Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, shared the honors of the occasion with Senator O'Gorman, and was enthusiastically received by those present. The gathering was marked by the attendance of men from all professions and walks of life, and of more prominent Democrats than any function of the kind that has been held in New York City for many years. In his address, Senator O'Gorman said that, in his official character, he intended to stand on the basic principles of the Democratic party, whose adherents in every period of our national life "have been foremost in patriotic effort to secure, maintain and perpetuate the blessings of a free government." Referring to the present activity of the Democratic party, he said: "The House of Representatives, Democratic for the first time in sixteen years, has set a splendid example of advanced, necessary and expeditious legislation during the past month. The pledges of the party have been kept, and the record of the House is one of achievement under wise and capable leadership." As to his own attitude with regard to questions of the hour, the Senator declared: "I believe the people of the land want an immediate downward revision of the tariff. They protest against prohibitive rates that destroy competition. They demand a parcels post. They demand that the Panama Canal be fortified by the Government that built the Canal. They demand the election of United States Senators by direct vote, and they demand that the reserved rights of the States be jealously guarded against Federal usurpation." The speech won hearty applause. Other addresses were delivered by Governor Wilson and William E. Clinton, United States Senator from West Virginia.

Hoe Library Sale.—The greatest public auction of books ever recorded was brought to a close on Friday, May 5, that day marking the nineteenth session of the sale of the Robert Hoe library by the Anderson Auction Company, of New York. The total receipts fell about $2,500 short of $1,000,000. This sum far surpassed the Ashburnham sale in London, which held the record for thirteen years, with a total of £65,000. The present sale also holds the records for the largest, as well as the second and third largest, price ever paid for a single book. The highest price was $50,000, for the Gutenberg Bible, which last sold in London 14 years ago for $20,000. Mr. Henry E. Huntington, a nephew of the late Collis P. Huntington, was the purchaser. The Bible is on vellum, and there are said to be only seven such copies in existence. This and the copy owned by Mr. Morgan are the only ones in America. Bernard Quaritch, the British publisher and dealer, from whom Mr. Hoe acquired it, valued it in his catalogues at £5,000. Mr. Morgan paid $42,800 for Caxton's edition of the "Morte d'Arthur," and Mr. Arthur Hoe bought the "Pembroke Hours" for $33,000. The sale just concluded numbered 3,528 items, or a quarter of the library. There are great rarities for the three sales that are to come, each of which will occupy ten days of a two weeks' period. The second quarter of the library will be auctioned off next November.

Gold Medal for Mr. Carnegie.—Andrew Carnegie received, on May 5, what he called his greatest mark of honor when twenty-one American Republics bestowed upon him a gold medal bearing on one side the words "Benefactor of Humanity," and on the other, "The American Republics to Andrew Carnegie." According to John Barrett, director-general of the Pan-American Union, it was the first time in history that such a tribute from so many nations had been paid to an individual. Señor de Zamacona, the Mexican Ambassador, made the speech of presentation; Secretary of State Knox presided, and President Taft spoke in eulogy of the gifts which Mr. Carnegie had made for the cause of peace on this hemisphere and throughout the world. Members of the diplomatic corps and men high in official life filled the hall of the Pan-American Union Building in Washington, where the ceremonies were held, and for the erection of which Mr. Carnegie gave almost a million dollars.

Nicaragua.—Shortly after the dissolution of the Constitutional Convention, a revolutionary movement broke out against President Estrada, who was accused of admitting Conservatives to his cabinet and of inflicting torture on his political enemies. Doctor Espinosa, whom he exiled from Nicaragua, has returned to help the revolutionary cause.

Mexico.—The failure of Judge Carbajal, of the Supreme Court, to come to an understanding with Madero, leaves the country a prey to three independent revolutionary movements. The Southern states are overrun by General Miranda, who is threatening the capital; the Magon sympathizers, aided by many American adventurers, are active in Sonora and Lower California; and Madero holds the Northeastern states. President Taft has been urged to take effective measures for the protection of Americans and other foreigners, whose lives and property are asserted to be in grave danger, not so much from the revolutionists as from the bands of highwaymen who are profiting by the prevailing disorder.—It is stated in the Mexican press that many members of Congress are not and for a long time have not been, if they ever were, residents of the states that they are supposed to represent.—Over a thousand students signed and presented to President Diaz a memorial in which he is reminded that his seventh inauguration and his forcing Corral on the country were mistakes, and that he ought to resign in the interests of peace.

Canada.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier has come to terms with Mr. Borden on the course to be pursued in Parliament. The House will adjourn, probably, from May 23 to July 18, to allow the members to attend the Coronation. Sir Wilfrid will carry out his original intention of attending the Imperial Conference. It is quite likely that the adjournment will result in a dissolution and the submission of the Reciprocity agreement to the electorate.—On St. George's Day, April 25, Admiral Kingsmill, speaking in Halifax, said that the white ensign of the royal navy was flying in the Niobe, and that he hoped no other flag would ever fly in Canadian warships. On May 4, Senator Landry called attention to this, and was informed that the Canadian blue ensign is flying in the Niobe, and that Admiral Kingsmill made no suggestion that it should be removed or changed. The only way to reconcile the two statements is, that Captain Macdonald, of the Niobe, with Admiral Kingsmill's approval, was flying the white ensign, and that between April 25 and May 4 he got orders to haul it down and hoist the blue. It is certain that Canadian ships will fly the Canadian ensign; but, as we have pointed out, all this does not make for the unity of the empire.—Mayor Guerin, of Montreal, gave permission for a Socialist parade on May 1; he refused to allow the red flag. A Russian Jew tried, nevertheless, to carry it and made a disturbance when the police took it from him. The Socialists then wrote an impertinent letter to the Mayor, telling him, as their practice is, that he understands neither Socialism nor the red flag, and inviting him to learn at the feet of one of their orators, who was to speak the following evening.—Sir François Langelier, Chief Justice of Quebec, has succeeded the late Sir C. A. P. Pelletier as Lieutenant Governor.—Hon. Frank Oliver is charged with corruption, in receiving money from the Canadian Northern Railway, in return for permitting it to select a land grant.—Alderman Lavalec proposes to change the name of St. Catherine Street, Montreal, to Commerce Street, as more suitable, in his idea, to a business street. The Star comes valiantly to the defence of historic Montreal attacked by a French Canadian, pointing out that the same reason may be urged against St. James, St. Francis Xavier, St. Sacrement and others.

Great Britain.—The House of Lords Bill has passed through Committee. The preamble promising a reform of the Upper House threatened to split the Liberals, as the more radical aim openly at a single chamber. The Unionists, however, supported it and the conflict over this question is postponed.—Unionist statesmen are beginning to realize that the country is in a state of revolution, of which it is hard to foretell the end.—The Labor Party opposes the amendment of the alien law, by which the lawless foreign element would be controlled, on the ground that the right of asylum must be maintained.—The first-class cruiser Invincible has been injured somewhat seriously by careless docking. The report that it was practically wrecked is denied. The Lebaudy airship, acquired some time ago by the Government, has been wrecked by striking against a tree, and a new one, 510 feet long, has been so badly injured that its appearance at the Coronation review is very doubtful.—The Unionists called the Government's attention to the speech of President Taft, in which he is reported to have said that reciprocity with Canada must come now or never. If it be rejected now, imperial preference would bind the British Empire together. They asked whether it would instruct the ambassador to get the exact terms of his speech. They asked also for information concerning the reported ignoring by the United States of the Rush-Bagot treaty, excluding war vessels from the Great Lakes. They then went to applaud the speakers at the Guildhall peace meeting. The Government put both matters aside. Natives of British India living in South Africa have obtained a recognition of their grievances from the Federal Government. A temporary arrangement has been made, which they hope will lead to a permanent one. They seem to be under no obligations to the Imperial Government in the matter.—The death is announced of the Hon. Mrs. Drummond, aged 84, who entered the Church in 1896. She was daughter of Lord Ribblesdale, step-daughter of Lord John Russell, and mother of Mr. Lister Drummond, well known for his zeal for the Catholic faith, which he embraced twenty years before his mother did.

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond is writing a series of articles in a London Radical journal showing the advantages of Home Rule from the British standpoint. In his latest contribution he contends that Ireland will be loyal as soon as she has something to be loyal to, and the only true loyalists are the Nationalists, who are trying to secure a rational and permanent basis of loyalty. Replying to Lord Lonsdale in the House of Commons, Mr. Dillon charged with disloyalty the Ulster Unionists, who are making contingent threats of rebellion against an act of parliament. Mr. Asquith, speaking in Manchester, May 6, reiterated the purpose of the Government to introduce a Home Rule bill in the near future, and declared the reports of cabinet dissensions on the question absolutely unfounded. "For the first time," he said, "there is a really good understanding between the democracies of both islands. Material ties, apart from sentiment, bind them together, and the Irish question has come to be regarded in the last few years as the most urgent part of Great Britain's imperial problems."—Lord MacDonnell, in a lecture at Galway University on the Agrarian factor in Irish history, said the national character had been maintained and strengthened by national fidelity to the Catholic Faith, but weakened in some respects by long continued agrarian and legal injustice. The Land Purchase Act of 1903 had made some reparation and self-government would go further in that direction, but the immediate need was a completion of the transference of the land to the people by the government buying out the remaining landlords on a cash basis and reasonable terms.—The Royal Life-Saving Association of London has conferred a Gold Medal of the first class on Father O'Shea, of Ardmore, County Kerry, who lately rescued the surviving sailors from a wrecked schooner in Ardmore Bay. The coast guards decided that rescue was impossible, but Father O'Shea organized and led a crew and succeeded.

France.—The country is still agitated about the condition of affairs in Morocco. The progress of Brémont's column to relieve Fez was followed with great anxiety. At one time it was reported that he had succeeded in getting near the city, but was surrounded by the tribesmen and was unable to enter the beleaguered town. He finally, according to the cable of April 30, led his troops within the walls, but the situation is still unchanged. A loose investment of the capital continues. Food supplies have been cut off, and the native soldiers in the city are wearied out by their constant skirmishes. Meantime, the rebellion has spread throughout the country, and many of the tribes heretofore friendly or inactive have joined the insurgents.—May Day in Paris was not marked by any disturbance, except towards evening. From 20,000 to 30,000 soldiers ensured order.—Though there are no actual conflicts with the troops in the champagne districts, the population shows everywhere signs of hostility. Cases of brigandage and incendiarism even of the woods and vineyards are constantly occurring.—On his visit to Tunis, President Fallières treated the representatives of the Mohammedan religion with the greatest consideration, and promised them the protection of the Government for the exercise of their worship. It is in curious contrast with the treatment of his Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Germany.—The Frankfurter Zeitung, a leading financial organ of the empire, reviews the claims to the benefits of the reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada, on which German commercial bodies are insisting, and which are now the subject of diplomatic negotiations. The Zeitung holds that Germany is undoubtedly entitled to such benefits, under the Washington note of February, 1910, promising the most-favored-nation treatment. It says the United States in the negotiations of that time abandoned the old American interpretation, under which the most-favored-nation clause did not apply to concessions granted to third nations in return for reciprocal concessions. The United States then demanded and received the benefits of the German minimum tariffs without corresponding concessions, the minimum Payne tariffs being more unfavorable than the Dingley rates. The American Customs Court, contends the Zeitung, now wishes to revive the former interpretation, but this is not acceptable.—May 4, the steamer Deutschland, with the German Antarctic expedition, sailed from Hamburg to Buenos Ayres, where complete supplies will be taken on. This makes five Antarctic expeditions, representing as many countries, now afloat or soon to be. The German expedition is under the auspices of the Geographical Society in Berlin, and is commanded by Lieutenant Filchner, of the general staff of the army. He is a well-known explorer, and was one of the first to reach Lhasa, Tibet. He explored Turkestan and Persia in 1903 and 1905. His plan is to send a vessel with provisions over the route followed by Lieut. Shackleton, and form a depot at the half-way point to Shackleton's quarters. The regular expedition will start later from Weddel Land, on the opposite of the pole, and make a dash across in an endeavor to reach the depot.—Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg journeyed to Karlsruhe to meet the Emperor on his return from Corfu, and to accompany him thence to Strassburg, where, on May 7, his Majesty assisted at the unveiling of the memorial to Emperor William I. The Chancellor used the opportunity to confer with his Majesty on the Morocco situation, and on the Alsace-Lorraine constitutional questions, both of which appear to have reached an acute stage in national politics.

Austria-Hungary.—Emperor Francis Joseph, now resting in Hungary's capital, announced his purpose to devote the sum of 100,000 crowns to the endowment of the pension fund of the Society of Sculptors. The organization has just completed the celebration of its golden jubilee in Vienna.—Carl von Hieronymi, Minister of Commerce in the cabinet of Hungary, and a noted figure in the politics of his country since 1870, died in Budapest, May 4. He has been connected with the Department of Commerce for years, and to his initiative is due much of the successful reform work brought about in matters pertaining to it in recent years. He was particularly interested in the promotion of river traffic and in the extension of Hungarian State railroads, achieving creditable prominence by the practical legislation he forwarded in both these interests.—The Catholic School Association, the vigorous defenders of the rights of parents and of children in the matter of religious training in the public schools of the empire, recently celebrated its silver jubilee.—The energetic call issued by Coadjutor Archbishop Dr. Nagl, urging the Catholics of Austria to organize in opposition to the Los von Rom movement, is meeting with gratifying success. A society has been established, similar to the American Federation, which will unite the Catholics of Austria in effective work in opposition to the Los von Rom promoters. Similar steps will be taken to bring together the Catholic bodies of Bohemia.

Portugal.—Bishop Leite de Vasconcellos, of Beja, has been summoned into court for having been present in church at the reading of a pastoral which had not been authorized by the Braga administration. It is likely that he will be deposed and dispossessed, as was his colleague, the Bishop of Oporto.—The Minister of Grace and Justice has decreed that only native Portuguese priests educated in Portugal may discharge the duties of the sacred ministry, thus excluding foreign priests and Portuguese priests educated abroad. In decreeing the separation of Church and State, the provisional government reserves to itself the management of the church funds and the ownership of the church buildings; it regulates religious worship in the churches and in public; forbids priests to devote themselves to teaching; and establishes the order to be observed in seminaries. It also cries out at intervals against the intolerable tyranny exercised by Premier Franco in the last days of the monarchy.—English shipbuilders, replying to the government's proposal to spend $150,000,000 on a navy, have declined to begin the work on credit; and there are no funds in sight.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Quebec Marriage Case

In London, some years ago, a gentleman had the misfortune to lose his wife and to fall in love with her sister. Hearing that in Canada one might marry his deceased wife's sister, the couple hastened thither, and, with the help of an Episcopalian clergyman, were soon as nearly man and wife as Canadian law could make them. On their return to England they found the Vicar, once so friendly, cold and distant, and the Curate and the best people of the parish following his example. In a word, they were "sent to Coventry." They asked the reason and were told that, in the eyes of the Church of England, they were not married. Troubled in conscience, they sought the Bishop, who declared their attempted marriage void on account of affinity, adding that as the civil law had made the canon law in the matter its own, he recommended them to get from the courts a decree of nullity, so as to avoid complications should either wish to marry somebody else. They took his advice, got the decree and were received again into favor.

We do not know whether this case ever happened. There is no reason why it should not have occurred. Anyhow, it is analogous to another now causing much unnecessary talk in Canada. Two Catholics of the Province of Quebec attempted matrimony in defiance of a prohibitive ecclesiastical law. Whether this was the "Ne temere" decree or not, is immaterial. There have always been such laws, and such a case might have come up at any time. After a couple of years or so, the matter was submitted to their Ordinary, the Archbishop of Montreal, who decreed the invalidity of the attempted marriage. As the civil code of Quebec recognizes the matrimonial canon law, the Archbishop's decree was presented to the courts, which issued a declaration of nullity with regard to civil effects.

In the imaginary English case Nonconformists might, according to Protestant ideas, have had some grievance. The Church of England law and the civil law were the same. Hence, not only with regard to members of the Established Church, but in all cases whatsoever of subjects domiciled within the realm, an attempt to marry the deceased wife's sister was ineffectual. If, then, Nonconformists had raised an outcry against the invalidating by an English tribunal for an ecclesiastical impediment they did not recognize, of a marriage contracted according to law before a duly authorized minister, they would have been, not so much interfering in the discipline of the Church of England, as pleading the cause of all who, not being members of that Church, counted it a hardship to be subjected forcibly to its laws. In Quebec the case is different. There is no question of a marriage contracted according to law before a duly authorized minister, because there Protestant ministers are not authorized to officiate at the marriages of Catholics. The civil code respects the marriage legislation of all religious bodies. Article 127 recognizes the "impediments admitted according to the different religious beliefs as resulting from consanguinity, or affinity, or from other causes under the rules hitherto followed in the different Churches or religious societies." If the denominations had a law that marriages to be valid must be celebrated by their own ministers, the courts would govern themselves by it; that they have no such legislation is not the fault of the Quebec Parliament. Hence, the Canadian case is purely a domestic one, touching directly Catholics only, and not affecting Protestants except indirectly, inasmuch as they may desire to marry Catholics. Otherwise Protestants of every denomination may, so far as the Quebec code is concerned, enjoy the liberty, or, rather, license, of their sects. They may marry their deceased wives' sisters, they may marry clandestinely or in places where they are not domiciled, they may get divorced and marry again, and Catholics do not interfere. Why do they not show us the same tolerance?

But that is not "pretty Fanny's way." Silversmiths are found elsewhere than in Ephesus—in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver. On Easter Sunday—the better the day, the better the deed—the Protestant Bishop of Montreal, Dr. Farthing, made this marriage case the subject of a violent discourse. Methodist conferences have taken up the strain, the Orangemen have done the same, ministers have thundered from many pulpits, and for a longer time than the Ephesian two hours the multitude, not knowing what it is all about, have shouted: "Down with the 'Ne temere' decree!" The Toronto Conference says plumply that matrimonial legislation belongs exclusively to the State, and insists that its views shall be made the law for Quebec. Bishop Farthing said the same in maintaining that every marriage without legal bar, contracted before an officer authorized by the State, must be held valid. His brethren across the Atlantic will hardly approve such frank Erastianism. The Bishops of the Church of England yield weakly to the claims of the modern State: with all the traditions of the past and the survivals of the practice of ages before their eyes, they have not yet been able to give full assent to those claims.

For marriage has always been under ecclesiastical jurisdiction, a sacred thing, an ordinance of God, for every one holding to the primitive revelation. Only as men fell away from God did they degrade it to what, after two thousand years of Christianity, the world would drag it back. Sacred before our Lord's coming, it became infinitely more so when, in establishing His Church, He made matrimony a sacrament. Though the Reformers rejected the teaching of fifteen centuries, they did not abandon the claim that marriage is a matter of religion. Their sects held on to jurisdiction over it; Luther would have had this vested in the parish minister. From Luther and Melancthon Philip of Hesse obtained the sanction of his bigamy. In the consistorial courts of Germany ecclesiastical and lay judges sat side by side. Legislation regarding matrimony was directed by the denominational authorities, and Böhmer, a jurist of weight in the early eighteenth century, required the minister's benediction for its legal validity. In England the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts lasted until 1857, and Lord Stowell, famous among ecclesiastical lawyers, laid down in the beginning of the nineteenth century, that the basis of the marriage law of all Europe is the canon law. From the Lutheran consistories in Germany came the demand that not only parental consent and presence of witnesses, but also the church ceremony, should be a condition of validity; and even in Scotland a marriage was regular only when contracted before a minister after the proclamation of banns.

But enough of the past. All serious Protestants are sufficiently agreed on the matter even to-day. A marriage without a religious rite is, in the idea of some, null; of many, doubtful; of all, abhorrent; while, as to marriages in contempt of impediments recognized in their denominations, they would be of absolutely one mind, were they not hampered by the illogical situation created by the Reformers. Bishop Farthing may lash himself into an Ephesian fury, crying that any marriage contracted according to the civil code is necessarily valid; but in his calmer moments he will confess that such is not the case. The Nonconformist British Weekly says to the point: "If we are asked whether the Church, or any particular Church, is invariably bound to recognize as Christian marriage whatever may be legal marriage according to the decrees of the State, we must clearly answer in the negative. All true Christian Churches have a doctrine of what constitutes Christian marriage. They have the law of Christ to follow, and they must follow it at all hazards." For Christians there is no other marriage than Christian marriage. To the Protestants of Quebec, therefore, its civil code should appeal as realizing their idea of toleration, and one is amazed at hearing them clamor for the abolition of a law which respects their denominational ideas, and for the introduction of that tyranny under which their brethren groan in almost every other part of the British Empire.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Thirty-three Years on the Great Lakes

The Great Lakes in question here are not American, but African. Thirty-three years ago, namely, in 1878, when Pope Leo XIII sent missionaries to Africa in the wake of the explorers, he aroused the interest of the whole Catholic world. Some thought it was too hasty, daring and rash. Others even regarded it as folly. It may have been folly, but it was the folly of the Cross; the folly of heroic and sublime devotion, which only the Catholic religion knows, and which it breathes into the hearts of men. "Your ambition," said the Superior to these missionaries, "is to fall unknown for the cause of truth, charity, and civilization, so as to save these wretched souls, and to destroy the horrors of slavery. If you fall, others will follow you; and I solemnly declare in the presence of God that every missionary, myself among the rest, would rather die than abandon the missions of the Equator."

The fight was a terrible one, and the death of missionaries was unavoidable. Of the ten in the first caravan, one, like Moses, died before he entered the promised land. Four of the survivors who were destined for Tanganyika, took six months to reach their destination. Five others arrived at Lake Nyanza only after a year and two months and twenty-five days of terrible sufferings and privation.

Fifteen months after the departure of the first missionaries, a new caravan set out with eighteen others, six of whom were laymen, who went as mission helpers. Alas! in less than a year, eight of them paid for their heroic devotion with their lives. But from these eight tombs, light and life were soon to issue.

The murderous climate, the lack of resources in the depths of this savage country, the opposition of despotic chiefs, would have been enough to dampen the ardor of less heroic men, but Christian charity does not quail before bodily suffering, which after all, is not the cruelest anguish suffered in Africa. What tries the missionaries most is the spectacle of these wretched descendants of Cham, groaning under the awful yoke of ignorance, corruption and slavery.

It must not be imagined, however, that the negro of Central Africa is destitute of every moral sense, and of every religious idea. On the contrary, he has both of them, but in a very confused fashion, and the voice of his conscience is easily stifled by the fierce passions of his heart. A low and abject superstition possesses his soul and prevents him from lifting his gaze towards anything elevated and noble. There is besides the terror which he has of sorcerers, and they are to be found everywhere. It is not belief that gives these wretches their power over the people, who will sacrifice their possessions, or even their lives, at the sorcerers' bidding. Besides this, another obstacle was soon to be met on the shores of Victoria Nyanza, viz., Protestantism. It had few missionaries, but boundless resources.

But the greatest of all the difficulties was Mohammedanism, a creed that satisfies some of the yearnings of the heart by giving a shred of truth, but which at the same time abolishes all restraints of the animal passions, makes the wildest disorders of the senses lawful, and gives a loose rein to brute force. "The shadow of a Turk," says an oriental proverb, "withers for a whole century, the field over which it passes." To overcome this obstacle was our chief difficulty. To make those degraded tribes understand the wickedness of their belief; to teach them that all men are brothers, that God gave to them liberty of soul, and liberty of body; that Jesus Christ bestowed these gifts when the world was bound by a universal slavery, to make them comprehend that He purchased this restoration of human dignity by the shedding of His blood, such was the task set before us.

Catholicity did not succeed in planting its seed in the stubborn soil of the Equator until after seven years of gigantic efforts had passed, and only when we had laid fifteen of our missionaries in the grave. But it was worth while, even at such a price, to batter down the ramparts of Mohammedanism, and to open the vast regions of Africa to the influence of the Church of God.

The Mission of the Great Lakes received its first baptism of blood in 1886. Twenty young men, most of them the attendants of King Mwanga, and with them Joseph Mpassa, one of the grandees of Uganda, were led to the block and decapitated, because they had cried out with all the enthusiasm of their heroic piety, "We shall continue to pray as long as breath is in our bodies."

The tyrant thought he would drown in blood the first seeds of Christianity. Blood flowed, indeed, but from it there sprung up a vigorous growth, which the persecutor in vain endeavored to destroy. The expression of the great African Tertullian, which portrayed the despair of the Roman Emperors, and the joy of the primitive Church, that the blood of martyrs was the seed of Christians, found its application again in the suffering Church of Central Africa. The Church never truly triumphs, except on Calvary.

At the present moment the Sacred Congregation of Rites is proceeding with the beatification of the martyrs of Uganda. It is the first step in the rehabilitation of the negro race, and a guarantee that Catholicity shall win a splendid victory near the Great Lakes of Central Africa. Almost simultaneously, Nyanza, Tanganyika and Nyassa have received the messengers of the Gospel. Superstition and paganism have fled before the light of faith, and the horrors of slavery and tyranny no longer resist the power of the Apostolic Vicariates, which are actually established and which are fortified by the energetic charity of the 428 missionaries who are engaged in the work. As many as 143,762 neophytes, who were only yesterday groaning under the yoke of the evil one, are now kneeling beneath the shadow of the Cross, and are peaceful and happy in the 90 stations which have been established in those regions. There are 205,875 catechumens gathered around the missionaries, and 1,773 catechists are helping to impart spiritual instruction to the people. But it must not be imagined that only the lower class of the natives, or the wretched and abandoned outcasts of society, are eager to come to the Church. For, although it is true that some of the great men of the country are kept back by their cupidity and immorality, it is none the less a fact that others have recognized that Catholicism is the only source of true happiness and true joy. Take, for instance, the Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Uganda; or Mougwanya, who spends his life in helping the spiritual and temporal advancement of his regenerated countrymen; or the Sultan of Oulipa, whose faith and piety have brought his entire court to Catholicity, and many of the notable personages of the Capital besides. In a word, Africa of the Great Lakes has already recognized in the missionaries its strongest support, and its most solid assurance, even of temporal prosperity. Ask the old man who crosses you on the road; ask the invalid who is flung out of his house by his own people; ask the young widow, who is plunged in wretchedness and misery, who sustain and who assist them? They answer with one voice: "it is those whom we call our Fathers, our Mothers, our Brothers, the missionaries." They regard with wonder the Christian charity that unceasingly pours out its largesses in the 232 hospitals, refuges, asylums and dispensaries, which the missionaries of Africa have established in these regions. During the single year of 1910, 1,011,140 sick people have been cared for or remedies have been sent to them.

But it would be a mistake to imagine that the Christianity of the native is limited by the amount of temporal assistance bestowed, or that the activity of the missionaries is confined to the 24,232 baptisms which have been administered in the course of the past year. The sentiments of faith and charity implanted in the souls of the people by the words and examples of these great apostles cannot fail to grow stronger if there were nothing else than the edification which these new Catholics are giving to those around them. Thus the intensity of the religious life of these converts is manifested by the 975,754 Confessions made in the course of the year, and by the surprising total of 1,723,572 Communions. But if this great desire to avail themselves of the advantages of Christianity is so evident among the aborigines, their eagerness to rise from their degradation and ignorance is no less manifest. The 1,277 schools, where the White Fathers and their helpers give free education to 30,934 boys and 16,484 girls, are proof enough of the desire of the negro for a more lofty intellectual and moral life.

Alas! to meet these requirements, and bestow the benefits of a sane and satisfactory instruction upon these multitudes, missionaries are needed. Those we have are all too few, and their energies are spread over a vast extent of territory. "The children have asked for bread but there is no one to break it for them." It should be noted also, that the region of the Great Lakes is not the only Apostolic territory of the White Fathers. Besides the six Apostolic Vicariates of Central Africa, which we have mentioned, the missionaries are working in the Apostolic Vicariate of the Soudan; the Apostolic Prefecture of Sahara, and the missions of Kabylie. In those parts 113 missionaries devote themselves to evangelize the Mussulmans and idolaters. At the request of Leo XIII, the Society has also accepted the direction of the Grand Greek-Melchite Seminary of St. Ann at Jerusalem. To make up for this lack of missionaries, schools have been established at various places for the formation of teachers, and also a seminary where, God willing, an attempt will be made to establish a native clergy. The importance of this work of the catechists is plainly seen wherever they have been employed.

These helpers constitute the most potent lever for moving this colossal mass of ignorant idolaters. The missionaries, left to themselves, can scarcely hope to do anything else than to produce an inconsiderable effect in some scattered centres. But now they have with them 269 young people, chosen for their ability in the little seminaries, who are getting ready for this work, and besides that, there are twenty-eight seminarians studying philosophy and theology. Such is a rapid sketch of the work that has been inaugurated, and we cannot withhold our admiration for those missionaries who, in such a short space of time, have succeeded in implanting Catholicity in the region of the Great Lakes. Our Holy Father, Pius X, made a public recognition of it when, on his feast day speaking to the Cardinals gathered around him of the trials and consolations of the Catholic Church, he instanced particularly the missions which were under the care of the White Fathers in equatorial Africa.

L. C.

Dr. Karl Knud Krogh-Tonning

"With the death of Dr. Karl Knud Krogh-Tonning, one of Scandinavia's most eminent theologians has passed away." With these words the Berlingske Tidende, the leading journal of Denmark, begins its obituary of the famous Norwegian convert. The Norwegian papers, too, were full of his praise. All agreed that he had been "a pillar of the Lutheran church," to whom his conversion to the ancient faith was a severe blow.

The Catholic press, especially in Germany, where Dr. Krogh-Tonning was so well known, and had so many friends, has not been behindhand in doing honor to his memory. In the April Hochland (Munich) an intimate friend of the deceased gives a very interesting sketch of his conversion, the substance of which I take the liberty of presenting to the readers of AMERICA, supplementing it here and there from other sources.

Dr. Krogh-Tonning loved the Lutheran Established Church with all his heart, and clung to it tenaciously. This must be borne in mind if we wish to understand the full significance of his conversion. Step by step he drew near to the Catholic Church, but he went over to her only after the last remnants of the foundations of Lutheranism, on which he had taken his final stand, had crumbled away. Thus, many years before his conversion he had recognized the untenableness of the Scriptural foundation of the Lutheran faith. He could not help smiling when his professor of theology, after telling his hearers that the Bible was its own interpreter and dilating on its "perspicuity," afterwards, in the class of exegesis, threaded his way through its many intricacies like a contortionist, and entrenched himself behind the boldest hypotheses, in order to make not only occasional passages, but large sections and whole books intelligible to them. But such experiences were far from making a Catholic of him. He had first to learn what is really meant by "Church," and that, though it is easy to ridicule them, the deposit of Faith cannot be preserved in its entirety without Popes and Councils.

His eyes were gradually opened. He became convinced, like Newman and Manning before him, that no real Christian authority can be set up beside the old Catholic one. "It is the same as with the leaning tower of Pisa—if anyone were to undertake to build it higher, it would certainly fall, for in building one cannot deviate from the straight line with impunity."

The following episode shows how slowly, but also how consequentially Krogh-Tonning proceeded in his search after truth.

As a good Lutheran he had adorned his study with the portraits of Luther and Melancthon. He had, it is true, long since conceived an aversion to the violent "Reformer," but he could not yet bring himself to part with the pictures. However, when he became acquainted with Luther's sermons on married life, and the whole scandal of Philip of Hesse's bigamy, he solemnly removed Luther's image from the wall. Philip Melancthon's, he thought, could remain where it was. And it did until he read of "gentle Philip's" share in the Hessian affair—then his picture was taken down, too.

In the meantime, with the aid of the Scientific Society of Christiania, of which he had become a member in 1883, Krogh-Tonning had been publishing a series of "Studies," which showed more and more clearly that he could not logically defend Lutheranism any longer. The Study on the "Disintegration of the Church" marks the last stage in his conversion. The Lutheran theologians had to confess that they could not refute it. They were no match for the learned author of "Den christelige Dogmatik" and the editor of the monumental "Testimonies of the Fathers."

These and other equally valuable works, as well as his pulpit eloquence, had made the name of the Christiania pastor a familiar one throughout Scandinavia. The highest ecclesiastical honors were his for the asking. But Truth beckoned to him, and he left all to follow her.

On June 13, 1900, at the advanced age of fifty-eight, he was received into the Church in Aarhus (Denmark), one of his favorite retreats from work and worry. The news of his conversion was greeted with a storm of vituperation. To the honor of Bjoernstjerne Bjoernson it must be said that he manfully defended the convert. Whoever gives up as much as Krogh-Tonning, he said, for conscience' sake, deserves the respect of his fellow-men, and not their abuse.

After his conversion, Krogh-Tonning lived a very retired life in his modest little house in Christiania, devoting all his time to writing and works of piety, till death carried him off almost suddenly, on Sexagesima Sunday, while on his way to St. Olaf's Church, to sing High Mass."

"Through labors and sufferings, through humility and charity, Dr. Krogh-Tønning became a great, a strong Christian personality. He did what we others speak and read of and admire: for Christ's sake he left hearth and home, and looked on the goods of this earth as nothing in comparison with those of eternity. . . . He has passed from among us, but the significance of his life, of his search after truth and of his sacrifice has not been interred with him. In the years to come his life-story will serve to comfort and guide many a doubting, truth-seeking mind."

Besides his "Reminiscences," which everyone must read who wishes to become acquainted with the Scandinavian Catholic Movement, the best-known works of Krogh-Tønning's Catholic period are: "The Last Scholastic" (1904); "Hugo Grotius and the Religious Movement in the Protestantism of His Time" (1904); "Essays," (a) Plato as Precursor of Christianity, (b) Liebnitz as Theologian (1905-06); "Life of St. Brigid of Sweden" (1908); "Catholic Christianity and the Modern World, a Series of Homiletic Discourses" (1908). All these works can be had in German translations in Kempten (Bav.) and Münster. G. M.

Unitarianism and Christianity

In the issue of May 1, 1909, AMERICA said editorially: "The claim of some American Unitarians that a recent election has stimulated their growth, and their consequent aggressiveness, make a study of their tenets and history opportune." The proposal to establish in Washington, as a centre for Unitarian propaganda, "a Church typifying broad, liberal, tolerant Christianity," makes further elucidation advisable.

That Unitarianism usually is and has been tolerant is true. Dr. Priestley, its principal founder in the United States, pleaded for complete Catholic emancipation at a time when the Catholic Relief Bill was bitterly opposed by the leaders of Protestant dissent. Dr. Martineau, its cleverest, and at one time, though not now, its most authoritative exponent, declared that supernatural Revelation, if any there be, is found in the Catholic Church, and continued: "If you would trace a divine legacy from the age of the Cæsars, would you set out to meet it on the Protestant tracks, which soon lose themselves in the forests of Germany or the Alps of Switzerland; or on the great Roman road, which runs through all the centuries, and sets you down in Greece or Asia Minor, at the very doors of the Churches to which Apostles wrote?" We may add that the author of the definition quoted above is himself a typical example in word and act of liberality and tolerance.

Moreover, in this country, people are free to propagate any set of ideas which do not contravene the laws of the land, and to erect in Washington or elsewhere a meeting-house suitable for their purposes. But they have no right to usurp a name which not only does not express their views, but which has been for ages preempted by others in a sense of which their views and principles are a direct negation. Believers in Unitarianism may, if they will, defend and commend it, but they have no right to do so under the name of Christianity, for such it is not in any sense, liberal or otherwise. Hence, its general commendation under that title is a grave, though, doubtless, an unintentional injustice to Christian believers.

The name Unitarian is almost as old as Protestantism. It was known in Transylvania in 1600, and the Polish Socinians, who were suppressed by Yan Casimir in 1665, and other followers of Fausto Sozzini who denied the Divinity of Christ, frequently adopted it. The first Unitarian establishment in which Christ was definitely excluded from worship was set up in London, 1774, by Theophilus Lindsey, a seceder from Anglicanism. His adherents described themselves as "followers of the Father only," and essayed, says Martineau, "to take the eternal Son of God from heaven and isolate the Father as the One Infinite Mind."

Some English Unitarian congregations, who had abandoned the dissenting sects, continued for legal purposes to call themselves by their former titles, but, says Rev. W. C. Bowie, Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, "they are all committed to freedom of thought and that Worship is ascribed to God alone, not to a Trinity or to Jesus." Dr. Crooker's "Unitarian Church" (Boston, 1902) denies all belief in the Messiahship of Christ. Some Unitarians, in an effort to win over Protestants to whom formal rationalism is distasteful, speak of "the Fatherhood of God and the leadership of Jesus," taking care, however, to mention no dogmatic element in Christianity; but Rev. W. C. Bowie, in his "Unitarian Movement," definitely excludes all dogma:

"Anyone who attended regularly the Sunday services in one of our churches would discover among other things the entire absence of certain doctrines upon which the great Churches of Christendom continue to place emphasis. The doctrines of the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, the Atonement, the Infallibility of the Bible, Eternal Torments and other 'orthodox' beliefs would not be mentioned except by way of rejecting their validity. Incarnation and Revelation would be presented, not as partial, but as universal truths."

Now, Mr. Bowie, as Secretary of the British and Foreign Association, is a most authoritative witness of Unitarian belief, and what he here witnesses to is not only void of every Christian element, but, if words mean anything, is unmitigated Pantheism. If Incarnation and Revelation are not partial, but universal, God and His truth are embodied in every specimen of humanity, and do not exist outside of it. All of us are divine and each of us inspired. This view is supported by other weighty Unitarian authorities. Rev. W. C. Gannett, in "The Incarnation," lays down as a fundamental dogma: "The great affirmation of religion is that God and man are in essence one . . . Christ is the immanent God enstructured in the constitution of the world, enstructured in the human soul—redemption being the progressive education of the human soul by this indwelling teacher." God, he says, is incarnate in Garrison, Frances Willard, Emerson and in every individual, and Christendom has merely intensified "the pre-Christian pagan truth of God incarnate in humanity." He boldly adopts as his own the declaration of Emerson: "If a man is at heart just, then so far is he God: the safety of God, the immortality of God, the majesty of God, do enter into that man." And he frankly avows: "All this is, I know, pantheistic; but let it be so."

The fact that Emerson was found too advanced in his day for a Unitarian pulpit, and is to-day a prophet among Unitarians, marks the evolution from Deism or Theism to Pantheism. Priestley, who introduced formal Unitarianism to America, 1794, held God to be the one necessary cause, isolated from personal relations with His creatures, who were a kind of machine in His hands. Channing pushed the isolation further and insisted on the moral freedom of man and "the religion of Conscience." Martineau would bridge over the causality of God and the conscience of man by "the religion of the Spirit," which he calls "the field of spiritual affection, the common essence of man and God."

This phrase was probably used in a rhetorical sense, as Martineau was not a Pantheist, but his successors in Unitarian leadership accepted it literally, as we have seen, especially in America, where, as early as 1865, the pagan element was prominent. "In that year," says Rev. J. F. Smith (Encyclopædia Britannica), "American Unitarians took the lead in a pantheistic direction, showing greater sympathy with recent scientific speculation and less fear of pantheistic theories than their English brethren." In 1886 the Western Unitarian Conference adopted an exclusively ethical standard, overruling the minority, who wanted to retain some semblance of Christianity, and in their subsequent conferences and their extensive literary propaganda "the common essence of man and God" has been proclaimed as a dogma. In the New Orleans Conference of 1909, and the Boston Anniversary of the same year, Pantheism was openly professed and believers in religious dogma were declared unscientific and superstitious. The Enquirer, the Hibbert Journal, and the numerous Unitarian books and tracts widely distributed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, make no effort to conceal the pantheistic and rationalistic basis of the Unitarian body to-day.

Unitarianism has largely inspired, and has been in turn emboldened by Modernism and the New Theology.

It has also begun to copy Modernistic methods in using supernatural terms in a natural sense. But the supernatural is unknown to it. It repudiates "the Bible as an infallible or inspired guide in matters of faith, or in matters of conduct," and denies revelation or revealer. It has "scientifically settled that there never was any fall of man," and sin is an upward climb in development of character ("Unitarian Gospel," Savage). Miracles are essentially non-religious, and "Christianity is religion in its widest natural sense." The emphasis is on the natural, for the facts of atonement, redemption, the resurrection and the biblical story of God's dealings with man are pronounced by Martineau "mythical literature or superstition, or pharasaical theology"; and Martineau is now considered conservative. Salvation is declared merely "the quickening of the elements of goodness in man."

Unitarianism has no creed further than what should occur to minister or member as deducible from natural reason. The minister's right to express his own views is, however, limited by the congregation's right to depose him after three months' notice, but the individual's right of negation is unlimited. Such generalizations as "the seeking of truth and the practice of righteousness," and "the immanence of God in the soul of humanity," exhaust their community of belief. Why, then, have a church at all? A church supposes worship, but individual freedom, whether to worship or not, is a cardinal point with the Unitarians, and the increasing number of those who recognize God in humanity only will have difficulty in finding anything to worship. Rev. Henry Ierson, in "The Church," sees the difficulty and fails to solve it, but Dr. Crothers (Introduction to Unitarianism) lightly takes the word, in an indefinite, cosmopolitan sense, as "a brotherhood based on common human needs and aspirations," or "a meeting-place and a home for all those who are interested in the betterment of the common life."

A church is surely a misnomer for such a society or edifice, unless, like "God," "religion," "salvation," it be interpreted figuratively after the manner of the counterfeit symbols of Modernism, but Christian it cannot be. Unitarianism may be variously regarded as Rationalism, Naturalism, Positivism, Pantheism, but not, as we have shown, unless by juggling with language, can it be called Christianity. Nor may it be pronounced "liberal" or "liberalizing," unless the denial of the Divine Personality and fundamental teachings of Jesus Christ, and therefore of the causative principles of modern civilization, may be so designated.

M. KENNY, S.J.

NOTE.—The principal Unitarian sources have been indicated in the text. Of the Catholic writers, probably the best informed is Rev. George Hitchcock, D.D., formerly Unitarian Minister in Chatham, England. In "A Pilgrim of Eternity," the story of his conversion, and in "The History of Religions," Vol. IV (Catholic Truth Society), and The Irish Theological Quarterly, July, 1908, and April, 1909, he presents, with knowledge and sympathy, the history and present position of Unitarianism.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Correction

Relying upon the testimony of one whose trustworthiness we had no reason to question, we published in this department two weeks ago a communication headed "The Crimes of a Convent." The writer claimed to furnish exact details concerning the sacrilegious happenings in the monastery of Czenstochowa in Russian Poland, to the recital of which there was given wide currency last year by the press in the United States. His account is false in essential features, and we take this opportunity to correct his erroneous statement.

The monastery which was the scene of the sacrilege is not one of Russian monks under the jurisdiction of the Holy Synod of the Russian schismatical Church. It is a Roman Catholic monastery, and has been a revered place of pilgrimage for the Catholics of the ancient Kingdom of Poland since 1490. It has been affectionately termed by these the Lourdes of Poland. The community in possession is made up of members of the religious body of the Hermits of St. Paul, monks and priests of the Roman Catholic Church. The unfortunate author of the scandal, Friar Macoch, had been a priest in the monastery for seven years. Our present informant, a worthy religious who himself made a pilgrimage to Czenstochowa some years ago, explains the possibility of the grievous irregularities described in the sensational press reports of the scandal by the deplorable meddling of the Russian authorities with the religious superiors charged with the supervision of the monastery.—ED. AMERICA.

Italian Unity Celebration Paradoxes

ROME, April 23, 1911.

The Prince and Princess of Connaught have come and gone, after a pleasant display of flags, uniforms and toilettes, a visit to the exposition, a state banquet and a call at the Pantheon to lay wreaths on the tombs of Victor Emmanuel and Humbert. I fancy that this is the only place where royal visitors or their representatives have to call on the dead as well as the living monarchs; but so it is; no regal caller gets by without a visit and a wreath to the dead rulers of United Italy. To-day we are to have the King of Sweden, and next week the King and Queen of Denmark, with their three children. This sort of thing keeps the city in festa about all the time, to the great delight of the native and the heightened pleasure of the tourist.

Thursday was the birthday of Rome. I believe that we are some twenty-six hundred and sixty odd years old, and in spots we look the part. The celebration began with a Latin poem, "Hymnus in Romam," in the Campidoglio, and closed with fireworks on Monte Mario. The poem was a success. It was chosen from a competition of one hundred poems offered for a prize held up for the occasion. The successful competitor was Giovanni Pascoli of Bologna, who is recognized as something of a poet and much of a Latinist. The city was gay but orderly throughout, though it is noticeable that for all these extraordinary festivals the government fills the city with soldiers in uniform, off duty, who, while enjoying the holiday, lend by their multitudinous presence not only to the color but also to the security of the city. The fireworks in the evening were a fizzle, as intended, but a spectacle practer intentionem; for the better part of the material caught fire by accident and produced a splendid conflagration, which it took the fire department several hours to get under control, though it caused no great damage.

As is to be expected, there is a large number of knights of the road crowded into the city, and thefts are frequent. Strangers suffer most, but a native bank messenger was relieved of seven thousand dollars the other day, and the culprits escaped. At Naples a church was broken into and everything of value removed, including the ciboria, the Blessed Sacrament being scattered over the altar and sanctuary. The anticlerical students of the city gathered at the statue of Giordano Bruno yesterday and, after crying "Down with the Vatican!" to their hearts' content, passed a resolution condemning all clerical students for boycotting the Exposition. They did not refer to the ecclesiastical students, whom nobody expects to attend the Exposition, but to the Catholic lay students of the different government schools; the charge is absolutely gratuitous, for the lay students of Rome, needing some country to have as an objective of the natural sentiment of patriotism, are quite patriotic on occasions of public celebration.

On Easter Sunday, in St. Peter's, during the Easter Mass a scamp started distributing pamphlets throughout the vast crowd, in which, besides exalting the Reformation doctrine of the value of faith without works, the author expressly attacks the Sacrament of Penance. This, coming on top of the recent charges against the inviolability of the seal of Confession, takes on a look of organization. The papers state that the distribution was the work of the Protestant propaganda here, and though it savors of the Tipplish character of the work of our friends of the Via Venti Settembre, it is not easy to prove who paid for the printing of the pamphlet and its circulation on that day in St. Peter's. The agent was shown the door of the basilica by one of the guards, and when there, showing a resisting remonstrance, he was turned over to the civic police, who advised him of the fact that he might not distribute printed matter thus without a license and sent him about his business.

Apropos of this, we might note that the reader of L'Asino, who last week attempted murder in St. Peter's, has, under further police examination, disclosed a few autobiographical details of his career, which throw more light upon his anticlerical sentiments. Years ago it seems he wished to marry a girl of his native town, but was opposed by her parents, the parish priest and, under the latter's influence—as he averred—by his own uncle and aunt. Straightway he murdered the uncle and aunt, was arrested, convicted and condemned to death, but had his sentence commuted to twenty years' imprisonment. On leaving prison he emigrated to South America. Returning last August to Rome, he changed his name to escape the notice of the police, worked for a month or so at his trade of a mason, and then began the rounds of the drinking places of the city. This finished his preparation for the climax.

All the above looks very anticlerical. Yet in this city of paradoxes you may see at the same time the Blessed Sacrament carried to the sick solemnly under a canopy and accompanied by the vested clergy and the reverent faithful; you will see the funeral of a priest march through the streets, accompanied by large numbers of surpliced and singing clerics, and on Easter Saturday you could have seen the parish priest in surplice and stole, accompanied by an acolyte, carrying the newly blessed water, going about to bless the houses of the faithful who desired it.

Death has been busy at the Vatican. Early in the week Cardinal Cavicchioni died. From 1875 to 1883 he had been in the Propaganda as under-secretary for the affairs of the United States. In 1884 he was made archbishop and sent as Apostolic Delegate to Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia. He was created cardinal priest in 1903, and among his other offices he has, since the death of Cardinal Satolli, been Prefect of the Congregation of Studies. Yesterday died Mgr. Angelini, the papal secretary of briefs Ad Principes. He was an exquisite Latinist, and to him is attributed a great deal of the elegant Latinity to be found in the documentary utterances of Pope Leo XIII.

Since Thursday the Holy Father has been suffering severely from rheumatism, and public audiences have been suspended. This has been a disappointment to many hurrying Americans, but really we have nothing to complain of, as innumerable American Catholics were presented to his Holiness during Lent. At present among those visiting Rome are Vice-Governor Gilbert of the Philippines and Mr. Frank Branagan, the Treasurer of the islands.

It may be of interest to record in part the resolutions passed by the Catholic Young Men's Congress of Abruzzi, which took place last week:

"Whereas," they declare, "we recognize the value of forming the minds and hearts of our young men to the principles and practices of Christianity, which should permeate all the manifestations of individual and social life;

"Whereas, we consider it necessary to form in our young men a sound conscience which profound conviction may translate into a rule of life;

"Whereas the urgency of the present time calls upon our young men to address themselves to an examination of social problems and to a perfect knowledge of the Christian solution of the same;

"Resolved, That our different associations

"(1) Provide for the religious development of their members with regular courses of instruction and conferences, from the simplest lessons of the catechism up to more complete apologetics, according to the age and intellectual capacity of the members, and to habituate them to frequent the sacraments in Sodalities and to practise works of charity;

"(2) Provide, through the medium of libraries, conferences, debates and courses of study, exact knowledge, following the guidance of the Holy Father, of the Christian social programme in its theoretical postulates and its practicable realizations, forming the conscience of the people and the temper of its organizers so as to cause the spirit of Catholicity to flow into all social life."

C. M.

Famine Conditions in North Kiangsu

SHANGHAI, March 20, 1911.

Kiangsu lies to the east of Anhwei, and is a maritime province. Its total area is 40,000 square miles, and its population 25,000,000. This would give on the average 625 persons to the square mile, or one hundred more than are found in Belgium, the most thickly populated country of Europe. Kiangsu is divided into two parts, North and South, by the Yangtse River, which flows through it and enters the ocean to the northeast of the great commercial city of Shanghai.

It is in the north and northeastern portion of this vast province that famine prevails, the area affected covering 12,000 square miles, with a population of about 3,000,000. Geologically considered, the country is a vast alluvial plain, formed by deposits from the Hwai and Yellow Rivers and traversed by the Grand Canal. In 1790 the Hoang-ho, or Yellow River, burst through its embankments not far from Kaifengfu (Honan) and, rushing into Kiangsu, formed the Hungtse Lake, and thence flowed into the sea a little to the south of the present city of Haichow. In 1852 it abandoned anew its channel in Kiangsu, and took to its northern course, which it still follows in the province of Chihli. These erratic habits have deserved for it the inglorious name of "China's Sorrow."

The Hwai River, already mentioned when speaking of Anhwei province, pours its waters to-day into the same Hungtse Lake through which the Yellow River formerly flowed. The lake is connected on the northeast with the Grand Canal, while to the southeast lies another vast expanse of water, all of which are a standing menace to the country. In the annual flood season these lakes silt up and then, in subsequent years, overflow, thus bringing ruin on the dense population inhabiting the plain.

In the present circumstances the whole region bordering on the above lakes and eastward of the Grand Canal towards the sea is suffering from inundation, the waters having in many places destroyed entire villages and ruined the crops, thus bringing famine on the country.

Principal among the districts affected are Heuchowfu. This city has a population of about 60,000 inhabitants, but owing to its lying on the former sandy bed of the Yellow River, it is one of the poorest prefectures of North Kiangsu. Pichow is a townland further eastward and suffers most. Nine out of ten families are ruined and have been compelled to migrate southwards. The few folks that remained behind have had to live on roots and chaff, but they will succumb ere long to the terrible hardship. Sutsien, Yaowan and Suining are also much affected. At Sutsien, and in the environs, gangs of robbers seize all live stock and hold up travelers and boats. No one dare resist. The famine area extends southward as far as Tsingkiangpu. Here, from sixty to eighty thousand persons are starving. Most of these are refugees from the north, but they cannot be dismissed, as their native place affords nothing to eat, and no work to be done.

The Shanghai Catholic Mission is largely represented in all these places, and reckons there are at present as many as 30,000 baptized converts and 40,000 catechumens, most of whom, like their pagan neighbors, are reduced to a state of utter beggary. Rev. Father Thomas, S.J., who labors at Suining and Pichow, writes thus on the situation: "Torrential rain fell at these places during three days and nights. We are now in the midst of a lake. The crops have been swept away or been destroyed. Houses collapsed on all sides. Many of our schools have met with the same disastrous fate, and every day news of a similar character reaches us." Father Doré, missionary at Haichow and Shuyang, the latter place on the eastern side of the Grand Canal, has as bad a story as possible. "At Shuyang," he states, "my church, presbytery and the girls' school have collapsed. At Haichow, on the seacoast, robbery is publicly practised on all the highways. Gangs of from one hundred to two hundred persons attack the rich and exact from them rice and clothing. Here, in the neighborhood, two Catholic families have been despoiled of all they possessed."

Father Richard, who carries on work at Yaowan, on the Grand Canal, writes that "It is impossible to travel there even on horseback." He then adds: "Snow has recently fallen and covered the ground during several days. Many are still clad in their light summer clothes, their winter garments having been pawned so as to realize thereby a few dollars and help them tide over the cold season. One of our neighbors sold a boy seventeen years old for $2 gold. He is to be a slave for life. Another well-to-do family purchased four children for $1.50 gold. Little girls are sold daily here and fetch half a dollar. Several are even given away for nothing on condition that they will be fed and cared for till the crisis is over." What reader in America can hear these facts without shuddering? They cannot, however, be gainsaid.

If further proof of such a sad state of things were required, we have the testimony of Dr. W. F. Junkin, of the American Presbyterian Mission (South). Writing from Tsingkiangpu, he says: "In visiting a house I found there only a quart of grain. The family elders had just sold their ten-year-old daughter. She had fetched one dollar and was purchased by a house of ill-fame. A boy of seven or eight years was sold a few days ago for twenty cents. In the same village a man sold his own wife for about two dollars: She was knocked off to an unmarried rake who had wherewith to maintain her. The people said it was done to save her life, as she would otherwise die a miserable death." (North-China Daily News, Feb. 24.)

It is pitiful to behold such horrors as those described above and be unable to relieve them. Immense distress prevails in North Kiangsu, and the present famine is not a small affair. Those really destitute, and they number thousands, need immediate relief.

Twenty-five professors and teachers from the leading colleges and schools in the United States reached Shanghai on February 11. They are on their way to Peking, where they will take up positions in the newly established Academy called "Hsing-hwa." This establishment has been specially erected to train the students that are to be annually sent to America under the indemnity return stipulations. At present there are about four hundred students in training, and they will undergo a four and five years' course before being sent abroad. These students are recruited from every province of the Empire, and must pass a special examination before they are admitted to the new college. Each year fifty students will be sent to the United States, where they will study five or six years and then graduate in law, medicine, civil and mining engineering. When they return to China they are expected to do a vast amount of good and help their country with the knowledge they have acquired abroad.

The professors include Dr. and Mrs. Bolt, the Misses Crane, Hughes, Pickett, Sharpe and Starr, Messrs. Eaton, Breece and Smith. Miss Starr has had considerable educational experience in Hawaii, and will be in charge of the Art Department. During their stay in Shanghai the party has been entertained at dinner by the United States Consul-General. Dr. Wilder, the Chinese Young Men's Christian Association and several prominent officials who received their education at Harvard, Cornell, Columbia and other American universities. The party will be followed in the near future by another batch of teachers, who will proceed direct to the capital.

In the educational field China stands much in need of outside help. During the year 1910 work has retrograded rather than advanced. Many of the schools hastily started in the early days of the reform fever have been either closed or languish through lack of funds, competent teachers and sound discipline. In education, as in other things, the country lacks experience and the motive power to carry things through with perseverance and efficiency.

M. KENNELLY, S.J.

Guatemala Justice

GUATEMALA, C. A., MARCH 31, 1911.

Many acts of injustice are constantly being committed, which show the extreme corruption reached by all parties concerned in the administration of justice in this country. True it is, that this is no novelty all the world over, for in the United States such cases are not wanting, but the difference is that there, if found out, one will be punished and redress will be obtained, whereas in countries like this there is no hope for the victims, and even an attempt to obtain judgment from higher authority would be dangerous, for, ten to one, it would be to fall from the frying pan into the fire. Not that the following case is anything new or of the worst, but rather of the milder class, I tell it, and because it happened before my very eyes; from one many may be known:

One night last June three men were attacked by ruffians in the streets of this town, with the result that one of the three was slain and the other two fled for safety. The two men who escaped were arrested on the following day and committed to prison. The prisoners, being poor workmen, could not afford to employ a lawyer, so a colonel of the army, whom they had known for a long time, offered to help them out of the trouble. He told them that money was needed to bribe the clerk of the court, and they raised two hundred pesos (about $20, U. S. gold) as the first step towards freedom. The colonel generously divided this sum with the clerk of the court, but the two accused men still languished in jail. Meanwhile the real murderers were captured, but as they were in better circumstances they employed a lawyer. His first effort was to endeavor to induce our two friends to withdraw the charges that they had made at the outset against the three ruffians, but this they would not do. Finally, all five were released without further legal proceedings, after having paid over to the judge the sum which he demanded. The two workmen paid one hundred pesos each; what the culprits paid I have been unable to learn, but I know that they paid.

Damages sustained by the innocent parties: Ten months in prison at hard labor, even on Sundays and often at night, and rations that had to be pieced out by their relatives; four hundred pesos to the officers of the court; two hundred pesos to their volunteer lawyer, besides a promise to work for him after their release from prison; expenses entailed on their friends who brought them food.

Who is going to make good their loss, a heavy one for such people? Will they go and demand justice from higher authority? They would not even dream of such folly, for they know that only greater harm might be the result; so nothing is left them but wait till doomsday for justice. Till then, good-bye.

TIO LOLOS.

A M E R I C A

A • CATHOLIC • REVIEW • OF • THE • WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

War is Hell

Noticing in a recent number the exaggerations into which some promoters of the peace movement are falling, we pointed out that war is not an unmixed evil. Some take exception to this as incompatible with General Sherman's famous apothegm: "War is hell." Even if such incompatibility existed, it would not follow that AMERICA should therefore retract. Were it question of tactics or strategy, we would bow to the authority of so great a soldier: in metaphysics and ethics, however, we may say without presumption that we have the advantage of any soldier, however distinguished, because as the science and practice of war is his line, those sciences, amongst others, are ours.

Nevertheless, the incompatibility is only in the imagination of the jaunty critics who fancy they have us on the hip. When General Sherman said, "War is hell," he meant that, as the torments of hell are inevitable for the sinner falling into it, so the sufferings of war are inevitable for the soldier, and for the inhabitants of the region where it is waged. But he would have been the last to deny the good side of war. To have done so would have been to condemn himself and the men who followed him. Their blood, the sufferings of non-combatants were the price of the union and of the peace, prosperity and greatness of to-day dependent upon it. We think, too, that General Sherman knew the Christian doctrine far better than those who quote him against us, and could have told them, did they care to know, that, like war, hell has its good side. For everyone in this world it is a powerful means of salvation. The fear of its torments, unavoidable to the lost, has turned sinners without number to God, and has been the first upward step of many a saint. Could we interrogate the blessed in heaven, a countless host would tell us that but for the grace of God enabling them to realize what hell is, they never should have attained to bliss. "War is hell." War is not an unmixed evil. Hell is not an unmixed evil. But the absence of the knowledge of this salutary truth is an unmixed evil. Perhaps our critics will meditate on this for their souls' health.

Juvenile Crime

In New York to-day one hears much regarding outbreaks of juvenile crime. Highway robberies, daring holdups and burglaries seem to have a peculiar fascination for vicious youngsters, and the dread of a long prison sentence appears to exercise little restraining effect. If one may credit newspaper reports, a like condition of affairs exists in Chicago and Boston and other great centers of our population. An ex-Judge of New York City is reported to have said in a recent interview in Baltimore:

"By far the highest per cent. of the crime done to-day in this country is the work of youthful malefactors. Mere boys in their teens are being haled into the criminal courts of our large cities in droves for the perpetration of the most desperate offenses against society."

Curiously enough, a common explanation of the distressing state of things here alleged, now put forward by men and women of prominence among us, is defective home training. These critics prate much of the want of parental discipline, asserting that the abandoned and reckless boy is, in nine cases out of ten, the product of lax control at home. No doubt, lack of home training is lamentably in evidence among us, but is there no other reason for this spread of youthful depravity, admittedly one of the most serious problems facing the modern sociologist?

One recalls the golden promises freely dispensed a couple of generations ago by those who insistently advocated compulsory education and the so-called non-sectarian state school system. Ignorance, with them, was a sin; illiteracy, a crime, and the one saving remedy that could be relied upon to make us a moral people was the public school. The experience of fifty years of that much-exploited panacea fails to prove them to have been prophets.

Is it needful, in view of this experience, to call attention to a deficiency in the training of young people in America quite as responsible for the development of juvenile crime here and elsewhere as is the deplorable lack of parental discipline among us? It is an old axiom that the mere accumulation of knowledge cannot morally better an individual or a society. Education of the mind may be a help, since it does fit the individual to understand, to distinguish right from wrong and to apprehend the consequences of evil. But education ought never to have been regarded as an insurance against immorality, a preventive of crime, a cure for cupidity, or a guarantee that the golden rule will be observed. Public opinion, happily, is coming to realize this. Teachers everywhere are opening their eyes to the truth that they will not develop men and women with abiding characters of moral worth and sterling integrity,—characters that will stand the storm and stress of real everyday life, by any process of veneering through the mere influence of mental discipline and improved material surroundings.

Moral steadfastness imports a sense of self-control and of self-respect; it demands an appreciation of the beauty of virtue and of the nobility of toil; it involves a comprehension of man's mission to battle for the right, to listen to the voice of duty and to act according to principle, not because all of this is helpful to present success, but because it is a sacred obligation of conscience.

If our boasted school system has failed so signally to turn out honest, upright and industrious citizens as it is commonly claimed to have failed, were it not well to abandon old fallacies and to recognize the need of explicit religious and moral training for our children? Thus, and thus only, shall we be able to stem the tide of ever-growing depravity complained of.

A Word to the Peace Society

The recent activity of the American promoters of the Universal Peace movement seems to have aroused a feeling in Germany little calculated to advance the interests of their project. Evidence of this appears in the attitude of German press notices regarding the measure now being pushed by the American Peace Society of an arbitration agreement between England and the United States. Current reviews at hand from Germany cite the published statements of the American press as a proof of a widespread, if not general, tendency to foster anti-German sentiment. Whether through ignorance or with deliberate purpose, say writers in these reviews, all sorts of mean and interested motives are imputed to the German Government. Scarcely a day passes, they claim, which does not find the assertion made in American papers: "Germany is the only great power which holds aloof from the efforts now being made to insure the World's Peace." "Indeed one might fairly conclude," they add, "that it is only because of the antagonistic stand of Germany that universal disarmament is not proclaimed within twenty-four hours."

The Kölnische Volkszeitung arraigns the New York Tribune as chief offender in the matter, and, strangely enough, it bases its complaint upon the literary supplement which that paper publishes every Sunday. There has been running of late in this supplement a series of short stories founded upon incidents in the war of 1870, in which, says the Cologne journal, the model virtues of the French soldier are extolled, whilst the German officers and men are reviled as infamous rascals. The Volkszeitung comments on the immense circulation of the Tribune and, claiming that the supplement copy is syndicate matter furnished, as well, to thousands of small journals throughout the States, it builds up an argument, apparently satisfactory to its editor, that the Tribune is industriously sowing the seed of anti-German feeling in America.

We who know our own people, and who know, too, that the Sunday literary supplement, while it may help its readers to fritter away the care free hours of Sunday, does not exercise any very serious influence upon them, may smile at the overwrought fancy of the Volkszeitung man who thus conjures up trouble for his people. The fact, however, that trifles light as these are seriously weighed by critics in other lands, and that they are accepted as reasonable motive of a definite mental attitude concerning us in America, should suggest to our friends of the Peace Society the propriety as well as the necessity of watching the details of their propaganda. A certain eminent leader of the movement spoke lately of an Anglo-Saxon World police body. "Did he not know," said the clever paragrapher of the great German daily above referred to, "that the United States has not the slightest right to be called Anglo-Saxon; did he forget that the United States had better mind its own business and not attempt to meddle in the concerns of other peoples?"

Fee for Public Schooling

The Public Education Association, a well-known civic organization of New York City, is waging vigorous war against that section of the proposed new charter for the Greater City which is concerned with changes in the city school system. In the tentative draft approved, it is said, by Mayor Gaynor, provision is made that the Board of Education shall be a smaller body than heretofore, that it shall be a paid board, and that in its competency shall rest all the functions of general oversight and business direction of the schools, on the one hand, and of educational technique and policy on the other.

The Educational Association, a conservative body, which freely gives of its time and energy to education, declares that the school changes thus proposed would result in a reactionary upheaval of New York's school system, since the centering of all power in this paid board would reduce the city's salaried educational experts to the position of mere hired employees. It would, too, pool the several duties of these experts, now properly divided, into one small political board, and would, in consequence, inevitably destroy fitting independence and continuity of policy. The school section of the new charter as authorized in the tentative draft should be eliminated, say the members of the Association, "because it would plunge the schools into politics, being manifestly framed to accomplish that very end."

The Association presents its own alternative draft, in which it is provided that the present unwieldy Board of Education, made up of forty-six members, shall be reduced to fifteen members, who shall not be paid. But comparatively little change is otherwise made. The powers of the board remain practically as now, all initiative in educational policies being centered, as at present, in the paid educational experts, the City Superintendent and the Assistant Superintendents.

Curiously enough, its members suggest as a minor change a clause which in other days would have been deemed revolutionary. In principle, at least, they concede what many fair-minded men have long contended for. They ask that the board shall have power to exact a fee of $5 from students in all schools higher than the elementary. This fee will be required to pay for the use of books and other school supplies, but must be returned at the end of the session to those students who have attended regularly and have performed their school duties in an exemplary manner.

In a communication to the New York Times a well-informed schoolman has this to say of this project of the Association: "Surely this is a good proposition. It is a great wonder that it has been so long in coming, since the letting in of all comers 'just to see what high school is like,' or because they must put in a month or two more at some school before attaining the age of fourteen years, needed to get working papers, can surely not be defended. Other curious classes of pupils enter high schools, both day and evening, who have no adequate reason for entering and no hope of being able to stay. Obviously, the intention is to keep educational advantages out of unworthy hands, and to secure the benefit of them to the fit and worthy."

Catholic Book Lists

For some years attention has been directed to the books of Catholic authorship in various public libraries of the country by the issuance of printed catalogues containing lists of Catholic authors and their works, and by the general distribution of these catalogues among Catholics to whom they might be helpful. It has been a most praiseworthy endeavor to foster an interest in Catholic literature, and the care and general accuracy shown in the preparation of these lists are worthy of highest commendation. Attention may profitably be called to a new departure begun in England, which seems more directly helpful for the general run of readers. This is the preparation of a restricted list of standard works by Catholics in various departments, which Catholics, when casting about for something to read, may procure for themselves or look for in local libraries. Such works abound. In history, philosophy, science, biography, poetry, fiction, controversy, Catholics of the English-speaking world, past and present, have written works of which we may all be proud. The difficulty lies in drawing up the titles so as to make them truly representative of what is best for the general reader. Were an objective standard of excellence to be chosen, the task would be comparatively easy, but the tastes, dispositions, previous training, present occupation, circumstances, surroundings, and a hundred other considerations, enter into the subjective standard, which, perhaps, is alone to be set up when there is question of the ordinary reader.

A novel attempt to solve the problem has been made recently. The Catholic Mind for April 22 furnishes its readers with a list of One Hundred Best Catholic Books written in English, or long familiar in an English dress. The list is the result of a competition among the readers of the Catholic Times of Liverpool, and was printed by that estimable paper in its issue for March 31. The books are divided into classes, the largest class, that of fiction, containing fifty standard works by Catholic authors. Along with fiction appear ten historical works, ten biographies, ten works of devotion or religious controversy, six poets, and fourteen works that are miscellaneous. We have no means of knowing the exact number of those who cast their ballots for the respective books and authors, but such as it is the list may be said to be fairly representative of Catholic accomplishment and to reflect more or less accurately the popular taste among English-speaking Catholics across the seas.

The list speaks well for the character of the readers of Catholic newspapers in England. The works selected are uniformly of a high order of merit, with an occasional slip that one might naturally expect to see where the general reader, and not the critic, is making the decision. The selection, too, comes with the endorsement of many who evidently have read extensively and have been trained to think for themselves.

Some few works by American authors are honored in the list, if we may without qualification claim Cardinal Gibbons, Marion Crawford, John Oliver Hobbes, Henry Harland and John Boyle O'Reilly as American. It would be extremely interesting and serviceable to see a catalogue of one hundred books drawn up by the same process which would be more distinctively American. The publication and wide diffusion of these catalogues or lists, we believe with the editor of the Liverpool Catholic Times, would widen and deepen interest in Catholic literature and in the writings of Catholic authors, and would prepare a more numerous public for the perusal and purchase of Catholic books.

The City of Confusion

The Episcopalians held a Church Congress in Washington on April 25. The Churchman of May 6th gives us an elaborate report of the proceedings, from which we quote literally:

The first paper read was that of Judge Packard* of Maryland. "The great mass of our people," he said "were Protestant against every error, though catholic (with a small c) for every truth." But the Very Rev. S. P. Delany of Milwaukee could see no reason why the word "Protestant" should be retained in the title of the Church, whereas the uselessness of any title whatever was emphasized by Tax Commissioner Lawson Purdy of New York, who "protested that Protestantism was neither a faith nor a system of theology, but, rather, a point of view; a help in the development from homogeneity to heterogeneity, and so to a completer evolution. It had at the Reformation broken from religious authority and cut loose from revealed religion." Dr. Leighton Parks "declared that "equality was the note of Protestantism and so was fraternity, but in the latter the Church was weak." Nevertheless, in opposition to this view, Dr. B. Talbot Rogers insisted that "liberty, equality and fraternity were notes of the Catholic religion, not of Protestantism," an assertion which "elicited a counter protest from Dr. McKim." Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady "declared dramatically that Romanism was alive and must be downed," but Rev. Ernest Smith was of the opinion that "the Roman Church was dying both in Europe and the United States, and that our Church was a rallying point for a dying Protestantism and a decaying Romanism."

When they came to discuss the seat of authority in the Church, Professor Batten of the General Seminary confessed that "the historic episcopate meant for him the authority of the people as represented in the apostolic ministry," and that "the direct election of rectors, deputies and bishops would be an advantage." The Rev. Louis Osborne of Newark, "who spoke breezily," said "the Church was just themselves." Professor Foley was of the same opinion, and maintained that "no authority inhered in the clergymen apart from the body of the people. Authority only functioned in the ministry. As long as there was a baptized man there would be a Church." But Rev. Edwin A. White insisted that the seat of authority was in the General Convention.

When the subject of Christ's character was discussed Dean Groton of the Philadelphia Divinity School informed his audience that "keen intense criticism strengthened the conviction of Christ's supernatural personality. Belief in the historic Jesus and the mystic Christ was assumed as a foundation of faith by St. Paul, as in the Gospels." The Rev. Harold Brewster seemed to see in Christ a Divine Person, but the Rev. G. C. Steward maintained that "the apostles preached a transcendental Christ," and Dr. Elwood Worcester coincided with that view, adding that "Christ had been rediscovered in the new life of Christianity. God," he continued, "incarnated many times in the world's history, had been perfectly and eternally incarnated in Christ by the complete surrender of will."

Was there ever a sadder sight? Here in a solemn assembly of Episcopalians, at which the President of the United States, who is a Unitarian, gave the opening address, the lay and clerical delegates contradicted themselves and each other at every point. One wants to be called Protestant, another Catholic. For one—a man named Brady, by the way—Catholicism is very much alive and ought to be downed; for another it is dying and decayed. For some Protestantism is a religion, for others it is a point of view; for some it is the true faith, for others it has cut loose from all authority and revealed religion; for some its authority is vested in the people, for others in the Convention; for some it ought to have bishops and ministers, for others there would be a Church if it had one baptized man; for some Christ is a Divine Person; for others He is only a mystic transcendental personage, and for others, again, a Buddha. Is there any wonder that Protestant Churches are empty?

LITERATURE

"The Enchanting Gaelic Siren."

The Poems of David O'Bruadar. Part I. Edited with introduction, Translation and Notes. By Rev. JOHN C. MACERLEAN, S.J. Dublin: Irish Texts Society. London: David Nutt.

In construction and development the poems of the Gael are unique. Their verse forms as well as their source of inspiration are indigenous and they are the only ones in modern literature that are altogether of native growth and never found need to borrow of any. Chaucer, Spenser and Milton went to school for their verse forms to the Italians and the French, so that the English metrical systems are importations or modifications of a foreign stock. The same is true of the Romance languages, which, as they grew out of Latin, discarded the metres of the parent tongue and unconsciously adopted, as far as their capacities allowed, the rhyme and stress and rhythm of the Celt. Hence, modern verse, directly or indirectly, owes nearly all its form and therefore much of its substance to the Celt.

The claim is a large one but seems well sustained. The most competent Celtic scholars now agree with Zeuss that the Celt taught Europe to rhyme. "The form of Celtic poetry," says Zeuss, "is more ornate than the poetic form of any other nation, and even more ornate in the older forms than in the modern; and from this greater ornateness the Celtic poems at the decay of the Roman empire passed over into the song not only of the Latins but of other nations, and remained in them." The continental Celts exercised the initial influence, but as their languages died out and the Irish missionaries and scholars entered the field, the more intricate metrical systems of the Gael, from whom the rhyming of Latin hymns originated, began to mould the measures of the nascent European languages, which in turn were adopted by Saxon, Teuton and Slav until to-day the quantitative system of Greek and Latin has been completely replaced by the rhyme and accentuation of the Celt. "This form," says Zeuss, speaking of the Latin rhyming of the Anglo-Saxons, "was introduced among them by the Irish, as were the arts of writing and painting and of ornamenting manuscripts, since they themselves with the other Germanic nations made use in their poetry of nothing but alliteration."

Final rhyme, assonance and accentuation were the gifts of the Irish, or at least of the Celt, to modern verse, but the Gaelic metrical systems had much that other tongues seemed unable to assimilate. The elaborate complexity and intricate subtlety of the Irish poetical code, the marvelous syllabication of music by the cunning grouping of consonant and vowel and the interlacing of harmonies from word to word and line to line, attained such perfection as early as the seventh century that the foremost continental scholars have pronounced it not only unequalled but undreamt of by other nations. Accentuation was not regulated as with us by syllabic measurement but by the scheme of alliteration, assonance and rhyme, the stress falling on the harmonizing sound, so that every half-verse contained a specified number of accented syllables. There was not the regular interchanges of up and down beats in modern verse, but the accentuation was equally pronounced and much more elaborate as the stress, variously formed in each part of a line, corresponded to a similar stress in another line and often in several others. The peculiar consonantal and vowel groupings followed sound phonological principles, but only Gaelic ears have been educated to distinguish their niceties.

This education had been going on without interruption for a thousand years in the Bardic Schools, an unique and widespread institution, which, since the days of St. Columba, was endowed by King and chief to give public instruction to all comers in poetry, history and law. Entrance was by examination, and it took the student from twelve to twenty years to pass through the numerous grades of bard and filé (the higher class of poet) and reach the rank of Ollave, who, among other accomplishments, was master of 350 metres. The bardic families were hereditary, but the rule of their colleges to receive no student from the neighboring territories, thus necessitating travel and intercourse between clans and provinces, tended to break down sectional prejudice and create a national unity of thought and sentiment in which local attachments were submerged. St. Columba loved Derry much, but Erin and her people more. "Carry my heart to Erin," he sang, "seven times may she be blest. Carry my blessing across the sea: Carry it to the Irish." Irish nationality is as old as the bards.

The Danish and Norman invasions broke up many of the bardic colleges and destroyed much of their literary output, but the Normans soon learned Gaelic and became the most ardent patrons of the bards. They were often proscribed by English law, but it was not till the days of Elizabeth that the direst penalties were enforced, of which the prime mover was the poet Spencer, who, though he recognized "their sweet art and good invention," advised their extirpation because they were "tending for the most part to the hurt of the English or the maintenance of their own lewd liberty."

Individual bards and local schools survived the ruthless uprooting of the system, and in the seventeenth century, which witnessed the passing of Clan and Brehon and the crumbling of Gaelic civilization, broke forth into probably the richest, certainly the most spontaneous and patriotic, outburst of classical Gaelic song. There are extant some 30,000 lines from this period, chiefly in the D'Yeevee or Shayna metres of seven or eight syllables to a line, in quatrains of twenty-eight or thirty syllables whose law required a pause at the end of the second line and a complete thought in every stanza. The result was intense compression, so that these poets were called "the Schoolmen of intense speech"; yet Ludwig Stern, the German Celticist, pronounces their productions, "choice, stately, learned and extremely artistic."

At the breaking up of the bardic orders which composed chiefly for the noble and learned, the more difficult and archaic forms began to be discarded, and new and freer metres were adopted by the remnants of the bards who, when lord and chief had fallen, attuned their lyre to the popular ear. No longer swathed in the technicalities and intricate metres of the schools, "poetry became," says Douglas Hyde, "the handmaid of the many, not the mistress of the few; and every nook and corner of the island burst forth into passionate song." Consonantal rhyming became less marked and accentuation more regular, and by a marvelous arrangement of vowel sounds so placed that in every accented syllable, first one and then the other fell upon the ear in an astonishing variety of harmonious modifications, Gaelic poetry of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries "became probably the most sensuous attempt to convey music in words that was ever made by man. This is the truest note of the enchanting Gaelic Siren, and he who has once heard it and remains deaf to its charm can have little heart for song or soul for music."

Not "to convey music in words" but to rouse the people to defence of their faith and nation, to solace them in their woes, and scorch with satire the renegade, apostate and oppressor, was the object of the new school of bards. Of these the most noted and characteristic is David O'Bruadar. Born about 1630, he lived through the Cromwellian and Williamite wars, stood with Sarsfield on the walls of Limerick, saw two confiscations, three expatriations and the final defeat, subjection and impoverishment of his countrymen. Reared in affluence and dying (1698) in direst poverty he shared their feelings and fortunes and interpreted their every note in triumphant, indignant or sorrowing song. Learned like the older bards in native and foreign literature, he clung to the best traditions of the old while he became the principal founder of the new and popular school which was destined, despite protracted physical enslavement, to keep alive the national spirit. The present volume contains the poems written before 1666; volumes II and III will deal with the feats of Sarsfield at Limerick and Aughrim, and the griefs and hopes of Erin when the flight of the "Wild Geese" left her a prey to the boorish stranger who hunted down priest and bard and all who were loyal to her past.

O'Bruadar's work and story, as expounded in the comprehensive introduction and luminous explanatory notes of Father MacErlean, throw a new light on the most pathetic chapter of Irish history, and will also reveal to outsiders the secret springs of the Gaelic revival. The editor's excellent translation gives some idea of the poet's thought but, he confesses, "the chain of alliteration which binds together for the ear every word connected by sense, and the constant recurrence of vocalic assonance and consonantal correspondence, which arouses the attention of the mind and satisfies its expectations, combine to give every stanza of an Irish poem an harmonious unity and a gratifying completeness which defy reproduction."

Douglas Hyde, who made many a brave attempt, found it impossible "to convey the lusciousness of sound, richness of rhythm and perfection of harmony in another language," especially in that which O'Bruadar, having in mind the psalm-singing Cromwellians, calls "the treacherous lip-dry English, a messy hotch-potch of foreign babbling with stuttering, spluttering sounds." But sufficient has been conveyed to prove O'Bruadar "a learned and true-hearted Gael who in dark and evil days fanned by his genius the fires of faith and nationality and whom no oppression could swerve from loyalty to Mother Erin."

M. KENNY, S.J.

Wandering Ghosts. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.25 net.

This collection of weird tales will probably serve to keep alive their distinguished author's name and fame longer than will many of his numerous novels. Strange stories of praeternatural and uncanny import are not capable of effective telling by every unskilled novice in the art of fiction. The thin and unsubstantial subject matter of the story seems to demand in the treatment sturdy vigor and painful minuteness of detail such as only masters can give. All the classic ghost stories have been written by men who have won great reputations in other lines of fiction. The unsubstantial fabric of the plot calls for a corresponding proportion of solidity in the handling of it.

The ghost story in its perfection is not a sparkling narrative, with a tremor in every line or on every page. Of all stories it must be most matter-of-fact and slowest in its movement; tiresomely so, indeed; with just enough interest to sustain attention till the last crashing page. Persons of a flighty, flibberty-gibbet cast of mind can never enjoy the delicate flavor of a first-class ghost story. It is too tortuous and lengthy in its stately approaches to the horror at the end; it piles up on an Ossa of dry and barren details a Pelion of more dry and barren details; it out-Defoes Defoe in an almost maniacal regard for small things like the shape of a pebble or the exact tint of a whisp of straw. The hasty reader, who is seeking for anguish in a crude state, had better go elsewhere. He probably prefers a three-ringed circus to a play by Shakespeare. He does not understand that fine art which patiently and quietly works downward through the intellect and the sense to the emotion, evoking it at last with the strong concurrence of mind and imagination. For what was all this elaborate preparation? Was it not, by amassing a wealth of realism and adducing facts which no one could deny, to create an atmosphere of credulity and lull the mind into a state of unsuspecting acquiescence? The artful story-teller has been winning our confidence by so much evident respect for truth and so many flattering appeals to our own experience that, when he suddenly springs his surprise, we are taken off our guard, are become ready victims for illusion, have been hypnotized into a mental condition which confuses the lines between the possible and impossible, the probable and the improbable, the real and the unreal. The successful narrator of unearthly happenings must be a master of realism. The realist in fiction has the best chance of succeeding in that most unreal romanticism characteristic of fairy tales and accounts of disembodied and troubled spirits.

This truth indicates how mistakenly the word "realism" may be applied. Surely "Robinson Crusoe" is not more realistic than Scott's fine ghost-story, "The Tapestry Chamber," or his other one, "Aunt Margaret's Mirror," which Tennyson declared to be "the finest of all ghost or magical stories." Marion Crawford has never been associated with any of the so-called schools of realism in fiction; yet we doubt whether any of the leaders in realism could equal him in reproducing, when occasion demanded, photographic accuracy and multiplicity of salient features. Realism is more correctly a point of view than a mode of writing.

The genius of Crawford was of a kind to revel in the ordinarily tedious work of arranging for the plausibility of his story by a careful preparation of its setting in the order of time and place. His was a remarkably active mind; its curiosity was tireless and, in its range, unusually wide. Add to this a retentive memory, tremendous physical energy, experience uncommonly varied, and a feeling of art which he may well have inherited and which he certainly cultivated with rare industry, and it is easy to surmise that, in spite of his over-productiveness, his fiction will always possess an intellectual superiority over that of most of his contemporaries.

This ground quality of mental grasp and range gives certain solid attributes to his most extravagant romances, which may be the means of keeping them alive. In these tales of preternatural occurrences this quality was never displayed by him to greater advantage, because nowhere in fiction is there such a need of it as in stories like these. He carries us to extremes of unreality by extremes of realistic manner. He contrives to pass off his wild fancy on the credentials of a broad learning, a technical knowledge of useful crafts, and familiarity with the life and customs of many lands. Thus, in one of these stories, "The Screaming Skull," which is quite as gruesome as its title sounds and might be harrowing reading in the late stillness of the night, it is curious to note the effective way in which the author applies his special knowledge of seamanship. It is used just as tellingly and with more scope in "Man Overboard"; but here the atmosphere is American instead of English, as in the preceding tale. When the story-teller shifts his scene and takes us with him into Calabria, in "For the Blood Is the Life," the interest awakened by his story is not unmixed with admiration for his versatile genius. He does not shirk the difficult requirements of the ghost story. He gives us first-hand information in the easy phrases of an adept. He takes his time, and, with the leisurely manner of one who is sure of his ground and of his audience, spins his marvellous yarns with so much dignity and painstaking attention to small facts, that conviction becomes a duty for the reader as skepticism becomes a frivolous impertinence. We should conjecture that these tales will become a permanent addition to our already rich literature of the weird.

J. J. D.

La Congregazione Mariana Studiata nei Documenti. P. ELDER MULLAN, S.J. Rome: Civiltà Cattolica.

The clients of our Lady owe a debt of gratitude to Father Mullan for the painstaking care with which he has prepared and edited in recent years a number of works on the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin. His manual entitled "Book of the Children of Mary," his "Hints and Helps" for directors of sodalities; another manual which he edited in 1908 with the title "Under the Banner of Mary," and the "Sodalists' Imitation of Christ," are so many proofs of a zeal to awaken interest in organizations which are credited with the accomplishment of so much good in the lives of those who desire a closer following of Christ through devotion to our Lady. All these books are invaluable for sodalists and directors of sodalities, if they would imbibe the spirit of the association and reap the benefits of sodality affiliation for themselves and others.

The work under review is something more ambitious than any hitherto attempted by this apostle of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin. It forms an octavo of over 500 pages, attractively printed on good thick paper, with generous margins, and so arranged that the paper cover edition might easily be bound permanently in two volumes. As may be gathered from the preface, "La Congregazione Mariana" is a development and a rearrangement of the Latin work "De Congregationibus Marianis" of Father Beringer, of the Society of Jesus. It was originally intended that this Italian edition should be the joint work of Father Beringer and Father Mullan, but the untimely death of Father Beringer in January, 1909, deprived his collaborator of the assistance of the distinguished canonist. Little is lost, however, as the author assures us that the greater part of the work was carefully gone over by both while the Latin edition was in its preparatory stages.

The book is divided into two parts. The first contains a treatise on the Sodality, given in numbered sections, each section forming a documentary text to which are added explanatory notes in Italian. These notes form a distinctive and illuminating feature of the book and may prove to be its most serviceable portion. The second part of the volume contains the documents used in the first. These are reproduced in their entirety, whenever they pertain directly to the Sodality, and are of general application. As to other documents, only those portions of them which have reference to the Sodality are printed in full. The printed documents are of two classes. The first and the more numerous are those emanating from the Holy See. Of course these carry greater weight, as they form the organic law of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin. Then there are documents issued by the Generals of the Society of Jesus, with the authority invested in them by the Holy See over the sodalities conducted by the Jesuits, as well as those which contain suggestions and instructions intended to aid the sodalities and their directors. The second series of documents have no binding force on sodalities that are not attached to the houses or the Colleges of the Jesuits, though their publication will be most helpful for those who wish to make the Sodality what it ought to be.

There is every reason to believe that this work will take rank as an authentic explanation of the laws and decisions of the Church regarding the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, and that as the author piously hopes it will help to make the Sodality better known and will encourage those who are in charge to love it better and to direct it better "always to the Greater Glory of God and the honor of our Queen, Advocate and Mother."

E. S.

A Papal Envoy During the Reign of Terror. Edited by the ABBÉ BREDIER. St. Louis: B. Herder. $3.25.

We have delayed too long our notice of this book. It consists of the Memoirs of Mgr. de Salamon, the Internuncio at Paris during the French Revolution, and relates particularly to his adventures and imprisonments during the period of the Terror and his trial under the Directory. The Memoirs were written at the request of Madame de Villeneuve (née Comtesse de Ségur), and they have the informal and familiar character of personal correspondence, rather than the dignity of history. In that chatty and vivacious style of narration of which the French are naturally masters, the good Bishop recounts the details of his arrest; of the ferocious massacres of which he was witness and from which he escaped as though by miracle; of his release and subsequent condemnation by default; his wandering in the woods about Paris and his final trial and acquittal. Some of the facts revealed are not without importance to the history of this fateful period. But a unique merit is in the first-hand portraits, flashlight pictures of many of the leading actors in the revolution. Most interesting of all, perhaps, is the revelation of the author's own delightful and amusing personality. He was a priest engaged in a somewhat worldly career, yet solidly pious and sincere. By nature timid, and not ashamed to say how he ran when no one pursued and feared so intensely the approach of death in the massacres that his hair shortly fell out, yet in the presence of danger he is cool and courageous, scorning compromise and meeting every new disaster with ready wit and resourcefulness. Far from being insensible to the pleasures of the table, he never fails to note with grateful appreciation the good wine and excellent fowl supplied to him by his old nurse, Blauchet, or other friends; yet he shows unflinching courage in braving the hardships of prison life rather than yield an inch of principle or duty. Altogether, the book is not only important but fascinating, and the house of Herder has conferred a benefit on the reading public by issuing this translation.

* * *

The Childhood of Christ According to the Canonical Gospels, with an Historical Essay on the Brethren of the Lord. By A. Durand, S.J. An authorized translation from the French edited by REV. JOSEPH BRUNEAU, S.S., D.D. Philadelphia: John Jos. McVey, 1910. Price $1.50.

For a long time it was the fashion in the rationalist school to place the date of the Gospels about the middle of the second century. A favorable position was thus prepared for attacking their historical character. It could then be argued that during the period of a century and more which elapsed between the life of the Saviour and the composition of the Gospels, the facts had been distorted by popular imagination and deformed by legendary accretions. Within recent years, however, a retrograde movement has gradually taken place, and the Gospels are now assigned dates which differ but little from those attributed to them by conservative scholars. In spite of this the war on the historical value of the Gospels goes on, as might be expected, since the rationalists on principle reject everything of a miraculous nature. The opening chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke (Matt., i, i-ii-xxiii; Luke, i, v-ii, lvi; iii-xviii-xxviii), containing the history of the conception, birth and childhood of Christ, and now commonly known as the Gospel of the Infancy, are especially made the objects of attack. The human guarantee is not as strong for these chapters as for the history of the Public Ministry. In the latter case the Evangelists relate public events which they themselves or their associates had witnessed; whereas in the Gospel of the Infancy they deal with facts which had few witnesses, and these with, perhaps, one exception—the Blessed Virgin—had passed away at the time of writing. Moreover, the narrative of St. Matthew differs so much from that of St. Luke, that at times there is great difficulty in reconciling them. Lastly, neither the Virgin Birth, in spite of its importance, nor any of the events related in the Gospel of the Infancy, is mentioned in the other writings of the New Testament. For these reasons certain arguments can with some plausibility be urged against the historical truth of these events.

In his "Enfance de Jesus-Christ" Father A. Durand subjects the question of the historicity and credibility of the first chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke to a critical examination, and successfully shows that there are no serious grounds for doubting that they are reliable historical documents. The work is thoroughly scientific in tone and method. The author does not hide the difficulties of the subject, nor weaken the arguments of his opponents, as popular apologists are apt to do; his answers thereby only gain in effect on the minds of the thoughtful readers. As the most prominent topic in the body of the work is the Virgin Birth, the author, by the way of complement, adds a dissertation on the "Brethren of the Lord," in which he defends the perpetual virginity of Mary.

The translator deserves thanks for making the work accessible to English readers. Works on Scriptural questions by Catholic writers are all too few in English, and any addition to the small stock should be welcomed. But a book like Father Durand's fills a pressing want. Educated Catholics cannot remain ignorant of the doubts thrown in the name of historical criticism on the Virgin birth of Our Saviour and other miraculous facts in the Gospels, nor of the attacks on the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin, which even many so-called orthodox Protestants now reject. They meet with them in magazines, newspapers and conversation. An antidote to neutralize the poison of doubt is therefore necessary. The translation of Father Durand's work will undoubtedly be productive of much good.

It is to be greatly regretted that the translator did not have his translation revised by some one better acquainted with English idiom. He not only slavishly follows the original, thus giving too strong a French flavor to his English, but in numerous instances he makes use of constructions and expressions which are decidedly un-English. These defects detract not a little from the pleasure of reading the book, and at times somewhat obscure the meaning. In one case, at least, the translator has mistaken the meaning of the original. "Si les deux versets 34 et 35 ne figuraient pas dans le texte, les exigences du récit permettraient de conjecturer leur suppression" (p. 88 of French text), does not mean "Did not verse 34 and 35 figure actually in the text, the exigencies of the narrative might justify us to suppose that they might be suppressed" (p. 124 of transl.). "The Ferrara group of Mss.," which occurs several times, is no doubt an oversight for Ferrar group. These defects will be corrected, we hope, in a future edition. One remark in conclusion. Little can be said in favor of substituting the (more or less) Hebrew forms of proper names for the Greek forms of the original text of the Gospels. Catholics are unfamiliar with the Hebrew forms, whereas Protestant readers are acquainted with the Greek forms through the King James' version.

F. BECHTEL, S.J.

Mgr. Pierre Batiffol's "Studies of the Development of Christian Institutions" will shortly be issued under the title of "Primitive Catholicism."

BOOKS RECEIVED

- The American Catholic Who's Who. Compiled and Edited by Georgina Pell Curtis. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $2.00.
- Who Are the Jesuits? By the Rev. Charles Coppens, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 50 cents.
- Leaves from My Diary. (1894-1896.) By the Rt. Rev. Abbot Gasquet. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 75 cents.
- Messages of Truth in Rhyme and Story. By Rev. Thomas à Kempis Reilly, O.P., S.T.L., SS.L. Philadelphia: John Joseph McVey. Paper cover, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.
- Children's Charter. Talks with Parents and Teachers on the Preparation of the Young for Holy Communion. By Mother Mary Loyola. Edited by Father Thurston, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 65 cents.
- Early First Communion. A Commentary upon the Decree "Quam Singulari." By F. M. Zulueta, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 50 cents.

Latin Publication:

- Exercitia Spiritualia. S. P. Ignatii De Loyola. Versio Litteralis. Ex Autographo Hispanico. Notis Illustrata Auctore R. P. Joanne Root-haan, Praeposito Generali Societatis Jesu. Cum Approbationibus. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 75 cents.

French Publication:

- La Mystique Agonie du Christ. Par Joseph Haegy. Paris: Alphonse Lemerre, Editeur, 23 Passage Choiseul. Net 3 fr.

German Publication:

- Kurzer Leitfaden. Für den Unterricht im Gregorianischen Choral. Von P. Ludwig Becker, O.F.M. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 30 cents.

EDUCATION

A movement was inaugurated recently in New York City which is well worth imitating in other centres where similar conditions exist. Because many of the Italian pupils in the public schools leave as soon as they reach the age of fourteen to go to work, without having the necessary education to make any progress, there has been organized the Italian Educational League. The league aims to impress upon the Italian parents the importance of thorough education for their children, if they are to make the best of their opportunities here in America. The organization announces other commendable purposes which it will have in view in the interest of the Italian pupils. It will investigate complaints made by parents of lack of school accommodations or tuition for their children; it studies the natural, healthy interests of the pupils, and provides for their encouragement and growth; it will hold parents' meetings, and cooperate with Americans for the welfare of Italian pupils; it will aim to secure a better observance of the compulsory educational law by the parents, relations or employers of the Italian children. The general purpose of the league is to have the coming generation of the Italian children occupy honorable positions, both civil and commercial. Rev. E. Coppo, Rector of the Church of the Transfiguration and Superior of the local Salesian Fathers, is interested in the league's activities.

Miss Rosine M. Parmentier, who died in Brooklyn on January 30, 1908, left by her will the old family residence, No. 342 Bridge Street, with the garden adjoining it, to the Sisters of St. Joseph, who will shortly open there a free commercial school and business college for girls. Miss Parmentier's will also provides for a generous endowment of the school, and as the old residence is a very substantial building, needing but few changes to adapt it for educational purposes, a most important and practical addition is thus about to be made to Brooklyn's Catholic school system. Miss Parmentier was the first pupil entrusted to the Religious of the Sacred Heart when Mother Hardey began her work in New York. She went to the old school in Houston Street, on October 4, 1841. Her father, André Parmentier, came to Brooklyn from Belgium in 1825, and was one of the founders of the first Catholic parish in that village. He died in 1830, and the fortune he left was regarded by his widow and daughter as a sacred trust, to be administered by them for the propagation of the Faith, for the benefit of the poor and in the assistance of the cause of Catholic education. Miss Rosine Parmentier, who was in her seventy-ninth year when she died, was the last of the family, and after a number of charitable bequests, directed the use of the residue of the estate and of the old homestead, as had been her mother's desire, for the practical education of Catholic girls, and so it will be employed after September next, under the management of the Sisters of St. Joseph.

More than fifty professors of Cornell University, teaching widely different subjects in the various university departments, have gone on record in favor of the teaching of both Latin and Greek in high school courses and in all schools in which students are prepared for the advanced work of a university. Their signed statement to this effect has been presented to the Board of Education of Ithaca, New York, by Dr. L. L. Forman, former Professor of Greek at Cornell. Dr. Forman urges the study of Greek as a cure for the gold fever, claiming that it will divert the minds of the young from the passion of money getting, the great obstacle to real scholarship among us to-day. Professor Charles Bennett, head of the Latin Department at Cornell, the well-known author of Latin grammars and text-books, in signing the statement, added: "a knowledge of Greek is indispensable to the study of Latin." Dr. Andrew D. White wrote: "My opinion, formed by long observation of the careers of university and college graduates, is that by the study of Greek, even if it be only through the Greek reader, the probabilities of success in the professional study of law, medicine, theology, teaching and the natural sciences are very decidedly increased."

From a report compiled by Dr. George C. Sprague, Registrar of the University of New York, from cards distributed to the students, the following interesting facts are gathered. The 1,150 students of the University's School of Commerce earned nearly $1,125,000 in 1910 while devoting on an average nine hours a week to classroom attendance and fully an equal amount of time to preparation for recitations. Information tabulated from the cards returned by the students showed that the average salary of the students was $85.58 a month, or $1,026.96 a year. Five per cent. of the men earned their money in the summer vacation. Most of the students have accounting, bookkeeping or clerical positions. One student was manager of a large printing establishment and received a salary of $325 monthly. Another who served as library clerk got the lowest salary, $20 a month. Thirty-four per cent. of the students earned more than $100 a month each. The accountants, as a class, had the highest salaries, their remuneration averaging $114.15 a month.

The average age of the students was shown by the report to be 23.11, the average business experience 6.64 years, and the average age at which the student had left school and began work 16.8 years. Concerning their education prior to entering the School of Commerce, 7.5 per cent. of the entire number reported that they were college graduates, 52.5 per cent. graduates of high schools having a four year course, and 1.25 per cent. graduates of business colleges.

Catholic newspapers are beginning to fly danger signals to warn their coreligionists against a new fad. It is the Boy Scout movement. It is conceded to be an excellent institution for non-Catholic boys; but bitter experience has taught Catholics that non-sectarian often, if not usually, means non-Catholic, and emphasis is laid upon the fact that the Boy Scout organization is non-sectarian. In the New England States meetings of the Boy Scouts are usually held in Protestant churches, the "advisers" of the individual camps are Protestant ministers, and other characteristic signs point to the conclusion that the Scout movement is non-sectarian in the same dubious sense in which the Young Men's Christian Association is known to be non-sectarian.

The excellent little monthly bulletin, The Monitor, published for his parishioners by Rev. J. L. Belford, Rector of the Nativity Church, Brooklyn, has this comment on "a ridiculous bill" in its April issue. "A bill has been introduced at Albany appropriating $15,000 to purchase spectacles for the children in the public schools of New York. We respectfully propose an amendment that will kill the bill. Make the appropriation $20,000 to buy glasses for the children attending either the public or parochial schools. That will settle it.

"But why stop at glasses? Let the State furnish clothing and toys, food and shelter. Take the child entirely. Treat him as property. Do everything for his body. Train him into the highest efficiency, but forget he has a soul. Do this and then—the deluge. The State will not last unto the second generation. Guizot tells us that external education does but arm the human brute with new means to glut his ferocity. That is what we are doing. To what else shall we attribute the lack of discipline, the lack of veneration, the lack of duty, the frequency of crimes and violence? In these, America leads the world. Every nation reaps whereof it sows. We are reaping what the educational system has been sowing for fifty years. The next will tell an awful tale."

SOCIOLOGY

The Archbishop of Westminster, speaking of the Catholic Federation movement in England and of the immense services which may be expected from it in the maintenance of Catholic rights, alluded to the fierce attack on Catholic elementary schools in 1906. Then there was an enormous parliamentary majority against them and most people thought that anything like organized resistance would be hopeless. In those days of danger the Federation grew up. Since then it had extended, but its extension had not been nearly what it ought to have been. It was an organization for the union of all Catholics who desired to take their part in safeguarding the interests of the Church, and he thought that as time went on people who at present might have some apprehensions about it would see that they were groundless. From the beginning it had been a non-political organization. Its idea should not be to absorb other Catholic organizations, but to provide a meeting ground for all, to obtain greater support for them, and to stimulate greater interest in the defence of the Church. He thought that no one looking into the future could possibly ignore the fact that there might be an immense deal to defend and safeguard.

The question merely of education is, for the moment, at rest, but there had been within the past few days public declarations from statesmen announcing their intention of proceeding further with that question, and in a manner hostile to the interests of the Church. Great constitutional changes are now impending and the question will be settled one way or another. If they had to fight as in 1906, it would be from a different position, and unless the Catholic body be strongly united and its efforts focussed to resist the attack, its position would be more dangerous and difficult than ever. Continuing, the Archbishop said that they could see the organized attacks on the Church on the Continent, and it was of vital importance that there should be some sort of international organization to meet them. In England they had the Confederation, and he hoped all would realize that its strength and effectiveness depends on its uniting men of every class, of all political views, as Catholics.

A parliamentary paper issued by the French Government informs us that in the whole country there are 218,458 families with four children; 93,544 with five; 36,358 with six; 13,545 with seven; 4,473 with eight; 1,481 with nine, and 780 with ten and more, making a total of 368,639 families and 1,712,322 children. The average size of the whole family is therefore about six. As the total population of France is 38,887,792, the distribution of these families is about 9.45 to each 1,000 inhabitants or about 57 persons per 1,000. This means that 943 persons in every thousand are either outside family life altogether or else in families of less than four children. It is not wonderful, then, that despite a reduced death rate, the population of the country tends to diminish.

ECONOMICS

A recent census of the city of Shanghai gives the foreign population in the International Settlement, as being 13,536, with a shipping community of about 2,000 persons. In the French Settlement, the foreign population is small, only 1,476. Of the latter, 403 are French, 314 British, 148 German and 105 Japanese. Taking both settlements together, and excluding the shipping in port, the whole foreign population amounts at present to 15,012 inhabitants. The Chinese population in the International Settlement numbers 488,000 and in the French Settlement 114,470, both thus totalling 602,470 persons. Within the native walled city, we may reckon another half million or more. The aggregate population of the city, foreign and native, may, therefore, be set down as about 1,120,000 souls.

The French Ministry of War publishes the following interesting figures touching the carrying capacity of ice. When 1.57 inches thick it is capable of bearing the weight of a man marching alone. At a thickness of 3.54 inches it will sustain files of infantry; at 4.72 inches, light artillery or carriages, and at 11.4 inches, the heaviest munitions which an army may require.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The Archbishops of the United States met on April 27 at the Catholic University, Washington, his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons presiding. There were present Archbishops Farley, of New York; Ireland, of St. Paul; Glennon, of St. Louis; Moeller, of Cincinnati; Messmer, of Milwaukee; Blenk, of New Orleans; Quigley, of Chicago; O'Connell, of Boston; and Pitaval, of Santa Fe. A report prepared by the Archbishops of New York, St. Louis and Boston was read on the tenure of church property, urging a more representative form of church holdings and the desirability of simplifying methods as far as possible in the States. The questions of immigration and colonization were discussed. The Archbishops heartily approved the methods being made to direct Catholic immigrants and home-seekers to settle near churches, and they advised the establishment of Catholic colonies. Archbishops Messmer, Ireland and Glennon were chosen to write a pastoral letter on this important subject. A committee was appointed to study conditions affecting Catholic immigrants. The social problems of the day were likewise discussed, and it was unanimously agreed that all the Archbishops, under the leadership of Cardinal Gibbons, should prepare a pastoral letter to be sent to every pastor in this country.

From Dubuque comes the announcement that the resignation of that see, on account of his long-continued ill health, by His Grace Archbishop Keane, has been accepted by the Holy Father. Archbishop Keane was born at Ballyshannon, County Donegal, Ireland, in 1839, and was ordained priest at Baltimore, Md., in 1866. He was consecrated Bishop of Richmond, Va., August 25, 1878, and accepted a titular see in 1888, when he became first Rector of the Catholic University of America. He retired from this office in 1897, and went to Rome, where he was promoted to the titular archbishopric of Damascus, and resided there for three years as one of the consultants of Propaganda and Canon of St. John Lateran. He then returned to the United States, having been transferred to the vacant see of Dubuque, July 24, 1900.

On May 2, at the Jesuit House of Studies, Woodstock, Maryland, a public disputation on Theology and Philosophy, took place, His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons presided. Rev. Peter Lutz, S.J., was the defender on Theology, and Mr. John H. Fasy, S.J., on Philosophy. Their theses covered the en-the field of both studies. The objectors in Theology were Rev. C. J. Callan, O.P., Rev. Luke McCabe, Rev. Joseph Bruneau, S.S., and Rev. Joseph L. Spaeth, S.J. The objectors in Philosophy were Rev. George Sauvage, M.C.S.C., Rev. Edmund J. Wirth, Rev. Father McHugh and Rev. Thomas I. Gasson, S.J.

The Rev. A. J. Grant, M.A., B.D., formerly minister of the United Free Church at Loch Ranza, Arran, Scotland, was received into the Catholic Church, April 20, by Father Widdowson, S.J., in the Sacred Heart Church, Edinburgh. Mr. Grant is the first United Free Church minister in Scotland to enter the Catholic Church. He retired from his charge in Arran two years ago to do pulpit supply work for the United Free Church in Edinburgh. He is a notable scholar, a fluent Gaelic speaker, and is well known and influential in the Highlands.

Many bequests were made to Brooklyn charitable institutions by the late Charles Engert, real estate operator and hotel proprietor, of that borough, who died in Germany, on March 17 last. The Sisters of St. Dominick, of Brooklyn, receive $10,000, St. Catherine's Hospital $10,000, St. Mary's Hospital $5,000, German Hospital $5,000, St. Peter's Hospital, $5,000, and the Little Sisters of the Poor, $5,000. A number of bequests ranging from $2,000 to $40,000 were made to friends in different parts of the country.

In connection with a government census, taken in New Zealand in April, the New Zealand Tablet, the organ of Catholics in that corner of the globe, reminds the faithful that the only designation by which they are officially known to the State in that land is that of "Roman Catholics." This title, it says, is the last of a series of terms which mark as with mile-posts the course of legislation affecting Catholics living under the British flag. In the 50th of her Injunctions Queen Elizabeth "straitly commands all manner her subjects" "not to use in dispute or rebuke of any person these convicious words papist or papistical heretic." In the statutes of her time Catholics were referred to as "recusants," or "persons in communion with the Church of Rome." During the long drawn-out penal days—from 1692 till the close of the eighteenth century—Catholics were officially known by the nickname of "Papists" and "Popish people." In 1793, after the days of the French Revolution, these epithets were somewhat mellowed down, and Catholics came to be known as "persons professing the Popish or Roman Catholic religion." And in later statutes, they were finally and definitely designated "Roman Catholics." Social usage had in the meantime so far softened towards the Catholic body that in 1812 a writer of the day could say in his "statement of the Penal Laws" that "the reproachful epithet 'Papist,' 'Romish,' 'Romanist,' was no longer applied to Catholics by any gentleman or scholar." The term Roman Catholic, the Tablet continues, is none of our creation. And Catholics, while acquiescing in it as a legal formula, have never taken kindly to it, and in no wise regard it as their legal title. On this account there lies a danger that individual Catholics here and there may omit the term "Roman" and merely write the word "Catholic" in the column set apart in the census paper for information as to the religious belief of the people. This omission, it gives warning, would render the return of members of the Catholic Church incomplete and misleading.

SCIENCE

In the Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4489, A. Miethe and B. Seegert report that they followed Wood's method in photographing the moon in ultra-violet light, and that they corroborate his results. They found quite a difference in the behavior of various parts of the moon's surface. The south pole seems to reflect very little such light, the north pole, on the contrary, very much. The most interesting differences, however, were found in the so-called seas. The rays emanating from Tycho, which are so conspicuous to the eye, were equally so in ultra-violet light, in which they are very rich. The authors withhold further disclosures until they shall have been enabled to proceed farther in their investigations, and they close by suggesting that it may, perhaps, be possible in this way to get some idea of the nature of the rocks on the moon's surface.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

OBITUARY

The Rev. Edmund W. Cronin, rector of St. Lucy's Church, New York City, died at the rectory from pneumonia at the age of 48. He studied in St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, and in the American College, Rome. Father Cronin had been rector of St. Lucy's for eleven years. He built up the latter congregation from a congregation which held its first services in a little shop into one of the largest parishes of the Italian quarter. He had great influence among his parishioners, through the fact that, although he was an American, he spoke the Italian language well.

His Honor, Sir Charles Alphonse Pantaléon Pelletier, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec, Canada, since September 4, 1908, died on April 29, at the Government House in the ancient capital. He had but lately returned from the South in improved health. Born at Rivière-Ouelle, January 22, 1837, educated at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière College and Laval University, he became B. C. L. in 1858. He was made a Q. C. in 1879, bâtonnier of the Quebec Bar in 1892; twice elected president of the St. John Baptist Society, and was for several years major of the Voltigeurs de Québec, which battalion he commanded during the Fenian raid in 1866. He was decorated with the C. M. G. for eminent services as Canadian Commissioner for the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1878 and was created K. C. M. G. in 1898, in recognition of his long and distinguished parliamentary career. A few days before his death the last rites were administered at his own request by the Right Rev. P. E. Roy, Auxiliary Bishop of Quebec. A little over a year ago Sir Charles wrote an open letter to Archbishop Bruchési, of Montreal, withdrawing from the "Alliance Scientifique Universelle," of which he had been elected honorary president. He found that the society, which he had at first supposed to be intended merely for the spread of science, was really an instrument for propagating anti-Christian ideas.

Rev. John F. X. Tehan, S.J., an educator widely known in the Middle West, died in St. Marys, Kansas, May 4. He was in his eighty-fourth year and in November next would have completed his fifty-third year as a member of the Society of Jesus.

The news of the death of this venerable priest, whose name is affectionately revered by thousands who came under his influence in the colleges of the Missouri province, will be noted in other than local surroundings. He was born in Frederick, Md., Jan. 26, 1828, and was the son of a well-known Catholic pioneer in that town of Jesuit traditions. Father Tehan's father was the architect and builder of the Jesuit church and school in Frederick, scene of the devoted activity of many of the most distinguished members of the old Maryland province of the Society. He had besides the privilege of giving three of his sons to the Society of Jesus.

William, born in 1824, entered the Maryland Province, Aug. 31, 1843. In Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, where he was graduated, he had as competitor for the honors of his class the poet George H. Miles. As a Jesuit he was one of the most promising scholastics of his day. Distinguished for excellent classical training and for remarkably correct taste in general literature, he gave evidence of great poetical talent. Mr. Tehan was cut off in the very budding of his promise. When scarcely twenty-six years of age, whilst teaching in Georgetown, he was drowned in the Potomac on July 4, 1850, whither he had gone with some students to bathe. Old timers recalled his death, when Georgetown recently had to mourn another of its brilliant young professors, Mr. Francis Goldbach, who met a similar untimely end.

A second son, James, born Feb. 19, 1826, entered the Jesuit novitiate in his native town of Frederick, Aug. 14, 1844, and after distinguished service in Loyola (Baltimore), Georgetown, and Holy Cross (Worcester, Mass.) colleges both as a teacher and in executive charges, he died Oct. 28, 1879, in the Jesuit Rectory in Providence, R. I., where he had for some years been devoting himself to ministerial work in the parish.

John, the youngest son, and the subject of the present sketch, was of a roving disposition in his early days. As a mere youth he left his Frederick home, and for several years he wandered much and turned his attention to many things. But the call to do as his brothers had done came to him as well, and Nov. 12, 1858, he entered the Society of Jesus, becoming a novice of the Missouri Province in St. Stanislaus, Florissant, Mo. During his studies he gave evidence of similar tastes to those which had marked his oldest brother, and his associates recall the facility with which he wrote graceful English verse. Old St. Mary's boys will remember the exquisite little poems on our Blessed Lady, which Father Tehan used to contribute as his share in the program of the May-day devotions. Father Tehan was a man of versatility, and in many responsible charges in the houses of his province he won the respect and confidence of those about him. His greatest glory, however, was his remarkable tact in handling boys. Most of the years of his long life were spent in St. Mary's, Kansas, and the students of the school, almost from its beginning, revered and loved him as few are loved by college boys. As a confessor, as a Sodality Director, as a disciplinarian, and as a teacher his influence was unbounded. A man of high ideals himself, he was singularly keen to lift the boy mind up to his own plane of principle and integrity. Probably the greatest day in the recent annals of his old college was his jubilee day, Nov. 12, 1908, when his "old boys" gathered from near and far to do him honor. Full of years and merits he has gone to his reward, dying, as he wished, in the house in which his most efficient service in the Master's cause had been rendered.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Could you give me the exact date of Cardinal Newman's ordination to the priesthood, and the name of the bishop who officiated? I have sought elsewhere for the information, but without success.

PAUL JAMES FRANCIS, S.A.
Graymoor, May 6, 1911.

[Newman was raised to the priesthood in Rome by Cardinal Franzoni on May 30, 1847. He had entered the Church October 9, 1844.—ED. AMERICA.]

THE CATHOLIC DIRECTORY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Apropos of the announcement that the Catholic Directory and list of the Clergy which has been published since 1896 by the M. H. Wiltzius Company, of Milwaukee, will hereafter be issued by the firm of P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York, it is of interest to note that the first "Catholic Laity's Directory" was published in New York in 1817 by Matthew Field. The next was issued also in New York but not until 1822, by W. H. Creagh, and edited by the famous Rev. Dr. John Power, rector of St. Peter's Church, Barclay Street, to which street the Directory now returns. There was another lapse then until 1834, when Fielding Lucas, of Baltimore, took up the idea and brought out "The Metropolitan Catholic Calendar and Laity's Directory." It was continued in the succeeding years as the "U. S. Catholic Almanac," until 1838, by James Meyers "at the Cathedral," and then Fielding Lucas, Jr., took hold and changed the title back to "Metropolitan Catholic Almanac." Lucas Brothers, of Baltimore, got it out in 1856-57 and then the publication ceased, to be taken up again in 1858 by Edward Dunigan & Brother, of New York, as "Dunigan's American Catholic Almanac and List of The Clergy." The next year John Murphy & Co, of Baltimore, undertook the work and resumed the compilation of the "Metropolitan Catholic Almanac." In 1862 and 1863, owing to the Civil War, the Almanac was not issued, and in 1864 D. & J. Sadlier & Co., of New York, started "Sadlier's Catholic Directory, Almanac and Ordo," which John Gilmary Shea edited for them. It ceased publication in 1895, owing to the successful rivalry of a similar enterprise started in 1886 by Hoffman Brothers, a German firm of publishers, of Milwaukee, Wis., and of which the Rev. James Fagan, a Milwaukee priest, was the editor. This directory continued until 1896, when the Hoffman Company failed and the plant was purchased by the Wiltzius concern, which has since continued its publication. It now returns to New York and to Hibernian auspices. The clergy lists printed in the old files of these Directories are now most interesting and valuable, but the alleged "statistics" they offer are inaccurate, contradictory, misleading and the bane of the investigating historian. An "Ordo" for the clergy printed in 1801, in Baltimore, by John Hayes, might, in a way, be taken as the precursor of these publications, but it had none of the almanac or directory features of the present edition. T. F. M.

New York, April 19.

THE SENIOR CATHOLIC ACADEMY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It must have been a great surprise to many of your readers to find in the very interesting letter from S. M. A., on the Sisters' Schools in Cincinnati, printed in the current issue, the claim that St. Joseph's Academy, Emmitsburg, and not the Visitation Academy, Washington, was our oldest Catholic convent school. It seems to me that this claim can not be substantiated by the records, unless the dates of the official recognition of the ecclesiastical standing of the two communities in charge of these schools is confused with the beginning of the schools themselves.

During her voyage to this country from Ireland, Miss Alice Lalor discovered a like aspiration to religious life in two of her fellow passengers, Mrs. McDermott and Mrs. Sharpe. After they landed in Philadelphia, January 5, 1795, they began to live in community under the spiritual direction of Father Leonard Neale.

On March 30, 1799, Father Neale became President of Georgetown College and by his advice these three women followed him to Washington and went to live, for several months, in a convent of Poor Clares, during which they assisted these nuns in their school work. Then finding that this arrangement did not satisfy their plans Father Neale secured a house for them near the college where, to the delight of the Catholics of the neighborhood, they opened a school. This was the foundation of the Visitation Academy, which since that time has been in active operation under the care of Mother Lalor's spiritual daughters.

At first they were known as "The Pious Ladies," and they followed an adaptation of the Rule of the Society of Jesus that Father Neale made for them. The official sanction for their community under the Visitation rule did not come until 1817.

Mrs. Seton left New York for Baltimore June 9, 1808, and there opened a school on Paca Street. In May, 1809, she went to Emmitsburg where, on February 20, 1810, the log house that served as the first St. Joseph's Academy was devoted to education. The Rule of her institute was approved January 17, 1812, but the ecclesiastical approval of these communities, and the opening of the schools each conducted are very different propositions.

The date 1799 is certainly earlier than 1810 and confirms the seniority of the Visitation institution. CLORIVIÈRE.

Brooklyn, May 7, 1911.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 6

(Price 10 Cents)

MAY 20, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 110

CHRONICLE

Senate Insurgents Active—New Secretary of War—Mr. Taft and the Farmers—Farmers' Free List Bill—Talking with Denver—Mexico—Loan to Nicaragua Authorized—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—China—France—Germany—Portugal.....121-124

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A May Sermon—Marriage Impediments—War on Religious in Spain—The Mystery of the Naundorffs125-130

IN MISSION FIELDS

An Ancient Shrine in India.....130

CORRESPONDENCE

Italy's Unity Show Does Not Draw—The Dutch-English Jansenist—A Navy for Australia.....131-133

EDITORIAL

Violating the Seal of Confession—The Queen and the Pope—Something to Be Done—The French Turk—Juvenile Depravity Again—Britain's New Civil Pension Bill—The Cardinal's Reminder—Mexico's Variety in Rulers...134-137

LITERATURE

The Clouds Around Shakespeare—Who Are the Jesuits?—Alarms and Discursions—Die Geschichte der Weltliteratur, VI Band, Die italienische Literatur—Chistes y Verdades—Books Received138-140

EDUCATION

New Style of College—Entering Wedge of Socialism—Seventh Annual Report of the Superintendent of New York Parochial Schools—Radical Adjustment of College Athletics Needed—The Scholastic Standing of Fraternity Members140-141

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Bishop McFaul's Sermon on the American Daily Newspaper141

SOCIOLOGY

Filipino and Hawaiian Laborers for Alaska Fisheries—An Australian Experiment with the Referendum141

ECONOMICS

Increase in Exports of Manufactured Articles—The Quebec Asbestos Mines.....141-142

PERSONAL

Rev. Richard E. Ryan, S.J.—Mary A. Butler—Mother Mary Xavier—Sir François Langelier.....142

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

National Conference St. Vincent de Paul Society—New Bishop for Lincoln, Nebraska—State Conventions Knights of Columbus—Centenary of St. Hyacinthe's College, Quebec—Progress in the Catholic Benevolent Legion.....143

SCIENCE

The Sun a Variable Star—Classification of Stellar Spectra—Recent Advances in Chemistry—Synthetic Products143-144

OBITUARY

Rev. John B. Cronin, C.S.S.R.—Archbishop Ferguson Patrick McEvay.....144

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Identifying Catholic Landmarks.....144

CHRONICLE

Senate Insurgents Active.—As a result of the refusal of the regular Republicans to give to the Insurgents the committee assignments to which they believed themselves entitled, five Insurgent Republicans, led by Senator La Follette, on Thursday, May 11, came within a few votes of bringing about the election of Senator Bacon, a Democrat, to succeed Senator Frye, of Maine, as president pro tempore of the Senate. As it was, the Democratic candidate, for the first time in many years, received a plurality of votes, and the rule that a majority is necessary to elect was all that prevented a complete Democratic-La Follette victory. Senator Bacon received 35 votes; Senator Gallinger, nominee of the Republican caucus, 32; Senator Clapp, Insurgent candidate, 4, with 3 scattering. This ratio was maintained throughout the seven roll calls, and the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 15, with the deadlock unbroken. Holding the balance of power, the Insurgents can prevent the Regulars or the Democrats from electing a candidate, and unless they change their determination the Senate will conduct its business at the present session without a temporary president. In the course of the parliamentary wrangle, when it was intimated that Mr. Clapp's supporters had by their own action separated themselves from the Republican party, Senator La Follette declared that he did not recognize the right of any Senator to make the accusation, directly or indirectly, against him or any other Senator that he was voting outside his party. "I do not recognize the right of any secret caucus, held outside the Senate chamber, behind closed doors, with no reporters present, to dispose of the public business or any thing which concerns the public business," he said. "I do not propose to be outlawed because I cannot support the candidate selected by my party caucus." It seems clear that the last vestige of diplomatic relations between the Regulars and the Insurgents has been swept away, and that there will be open warfare from now on.

New Secretary of War.—President Taft gave the country a genuine surprise on May 12 by announcing the resignation of Jacob McGavock Dickinson, Secretary of War, and the appointment of Henry Lewis Stimson, of New York, to be his successor. It was made clear at once by the President that Mr. Dickinson had surrendered his post in the Cabinet entirely on his own volition, and solely because his private business affairs demand his personal attention. Secretary Dickinson was appointed to the Cabinet from Chicago, and was sworn in as Secretary of War March 12, 1909, previously having been general counsel of the Illinois Central Railroad. Mr. Stimson was born in New York, September 21, 1867. He was an associate of Senator Root in the practice of law, and became special counsel for the Government in the prosecution of the Sugar Trust. Like the new Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Stimson represents distinctly the Roosevelt wing of the party, and gives the Cabinet a more progressive cast.

Mr. Taft and the Farmers.—In reply to the protest of a delegation of twenty-five members of the National Grange representing thirteen States, President Taft assured the farmers of the country that benefit rather than disaster was to be expected by them from Canadian reciprocity. The delegates alleged that if the Canadian agreement went through, the farmers would in large numbers desert the Republican party. To this Mr. Taft made the blunt reply that he was sorry to hear it, but that it had nothing to do with the argument for reciprocity, and that any threat affecting his "personal political fortunes" he should entirely disregard. The refreshing directness of this reply, the New York Evening Post calls magnificent. "To tell a 'vote,' farmer or labor, to its face that it can go where it pleases, requires a degree of courage in a public man which we do not often witness."

Farmers' Free List Bill.—The House by a vote of 236 to 109 passed the Farmers' Free List bill, removing the tariff duty from more than a hundred articles, including meats, lumber, coal, agricultural implements and sewing machines. The solid Democratic majority and twenty-four Republican insurgents voted for the bill on its final passage. This action of the House transfers the tariff question to the Senate. Special interests affected by the reduced rates proposed in the bill are already protesting against the measure, and the unanimity which prevailed among the Democrats in the lower branch is likely to be wanting among their party brethren in the Senate. The reduction in revenue that would follow the enactment of the bill as it came from the House is estimated as low as $10,000,000 and as high as $50,000,000.

Talking with Denver.—Direct telephone communication has been opened between New York and Denver, 2,011 miles apart. This is the longest distance the human voice has ever been carried. The line from New York to Philadelphia was opened in 1885, and communication with Chicago, a distance of 950 miles, established in 1892. Hitherto Omaha has been the "furthest west" reached by the long distance telephone. By the use of the Pupin induction coils to reinforce the current and the perfection of the "phantom circuit," it is possible to talk with Denver, and at the same time send telegraph despatches over the same wires.

Mexico.—The fall of Ciudad Juarez, opposite El Paso, Texas, and the surrender of General Navarro to Madero as a prisoner of war, was looked upon as a great step towards the triumph of the Maderist party and the speedy restoration of peace. Provisional President Madero named a cabinet and began to discuss plans for a march southward towards the populous part of the country, first declaring Ciudad Juarez his provisional capital, as it had been under President Juarez in 1865. Madero's armed followers protested against his appointments, and thereupon the cabinet presented their resignations. Seeing his inability to control his men, who were determined to shoot General Navarro, Madero accepted his parole and escorted him to the Rio Grande, where, by swimming and wading, he reached the American shore and, for prudential motives, accepted the hospitality of the American troops at Fort Bliss, which overlooks El Paso.—One of the sad incidents of the defense of Ciudad Juarez was that the ancient and venerable church of Our Lady of Guadalupe, which, thanks to the untiring zeal and energy of the Jesuit Fathers, had been transformed from a wretched, tumbledown ruin into a majestic edifice, was occupied by the Diaz troops and used as a barracks and a fort.—General Bernardo Reyes, the idol of the Mexican troops, is at last on his way home from his enforced European trip. He has declared his determination to take the field and fight for the administration, even if before his arrival the capital should fall into the hands of the revolutionists. This is not so much through love for fighting or for the administration as through dread of chronic civil war, such as has disfigured most of Mexico's century of political independence. Mexico City is in great excitement. Many foreigners have fled, and others have formed military organizations for the protection of persons and property; for, should the revolutionists enter the city, it is feared that they might act as did the more than half-savage "pintos" under General Alvarez in 1855. Vigorous efforts have been put forth to place the capital in a state of defense, but it is painfully evident that the people in general display little sympathy for the administration. The Mexican delegation for the conference on the Chamizal dispute was obliged to proceed to El Paso, Texas, by steamer from Veracruz to New Orleans.

Loan to Nicaragua Authorized.—The newly-elected Constituent Assembly of Nicaragua has authorized President Estrada to contract an American loan. The United States is interested in rehabilitating Nicaragua and, it is said, will exert its best efforts to place that country on a stable footing. The loan, amounting to between $12,000,000 and $20,000,000, will be used for the purposes of funding the internal and foreign debts, building railroads and establishing a gold standard. It will be guaranteed by 50 per cent. of the customs dues.

Canada.—Advices from Ottawa indicate that the reciprocity agreement between the Dominion and the United States will be passed there, if at all, only by a narrow margin. The final fate of the bill will not be determined for some time, as it is expected that the fight on the measure will last well into winter. It is not believed, however, that the Conservatives, should they win in the next elections, will repeal the modifications in the customs laws effected by the reciprocity agreement. By that time, it is said, those changes will have come to be regarded as the status quo.—Meanwhile, the adjournment of Parliament for two months, to permit Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian parliamentary delegation to attend the coronation fêtes in London, will mark the beginning of an educational program for reciprocity throughout Canada, under the direction of the Liberal members of the House. The opponents of the agreement have planned a similar campaign against ratification.—It is understood that Sir Wilfrid was led to propose adjournment chiefly to put himself in a position to insist that the Finance Minister should take a rest. Mr. Fielding has been under a great business strain during the last two years, and his colleagues are solicitous for his health.

Great Britain.—The Festival of the Empire, a combination of an industrial exhibition with a pageantry illustrative of the striking periods and episodes in the history of the different parts of the British Empire, was opened at Crystal Palace, London, May 12, by King George and Queen Mary. It was the first public ceremony of their Majesties since the court mourning for King Edward was ended, and the first of a long series of functions which promise to make the coronation season memorable.—Lord Lansdowne, the opposition leader of the House of Lords, introduced his bill for the reform of the upper house. The bill, which passed its first reading, proposes revolutionary changes. Lord Lansdowne said: "The Unionists desired to demonstrate to the country that they could provide an efficient second chamber which could be trusted to use its power fairly, serve the democracy faithfully, and at the same time be strong enough to resist the gusts of passion and prejudice with which all democracies were familiar." The bill proposes a house to consist of 350 lords, no one of whom shall hold his seat for more than twelve years, but all of whom shall be eligible for re-election. The peers themselves would elect 100 members of the peerage possessing the statutory qualifications. A second contingent would consist of 120 members, to be elected from outside the House of Lords by an electoral college, composed of members of the lower house representing constituencies comprised in the electoral districts into which the country would be divided by specially appointed commissioners. The third section of the house, numbering 100, would be appointed by the Crown on the recommendation of the Cabinet. Princes of the royal blood would retain their seats, as would also the two archbishops. Five bishops would be elected. Including the Lord Chancellor and the ex-Lord Chancellor there would be sixteen law lords.—Sir Eldon Gorst, the British Agent and Consul General in Egypt, in his report on Egyptian affairs, frankly acknowledges that the efforts made to develop self-government have been disappointing. The Legislative Council and the General Assembly, he says, have become "mere instruments of Nationalist agitation against the occupation," seeking "to render the business of the Government impossible."—Fishguard has been made a port of call for vessels engaged in the Cunard Line's Boston service. The steamer Franconia, which sailed from Boston on May 2, inaugurated the new service, landing passengers and mail at the Welsh port on May 10.—Representatives of the sugar interests had an interview with Lloyd-George and asked him to abolish the sugar tax, as a provision for revenue, from the coming budget. The Chancellor was sympathetic, saying he agreed that the sugar duty was oppressive to the poor and interfered with a valuable industry. It was most desirable, he thought, that the tax should be remitted, if he could extract the same amount of revenue from another source. As it is, he could not afford to surrender a tax that was bringing in $15,000,000.

Ireland.—The Church of Ireland and Presbyterian Synods held recently in Dublin entered belated protests against the Ne Temere, but there was little force in their speeches, as the political purpose of the agitation has failed in its effect. The Protestant primate spoke of "the forecasted scheme of isolation" in such a way that he evidently took the passing of Home Rule for granted. The Presbyterian Synod formally withdrew the only specific charge of Catholic intolerance—a case of a Protestant occupant of a boycotted farm—declaring that religion had not entered into the case and that religious toleration and good will exist generally in the South and West between Protestants and their Catholic fellow-countrymen. On the other hand numerous letters are appearing in the papers which show by statistics that in appointing Protestants out of proportion to their numbers to well-paid positions Catholics are overdoing the rôle of tolerance-provers. Mr. Birrell's answers to questions asked by Irish members indicate that the government has been acting similarly. The best paid positions on the local Government boards have been given to Protestants, and the Catholic magistrates appointed have been relatively few.—There has been much protest against the fact that the Financial Inquiry Committee includes only one native of Ireland, but the Irish Party seems satisfied. Questions handed in by Mr. P. White, M.P., as to whether the report would be published and a minority report allowed, were withdrawn. Mr. Ginnel asked why some representative Irish financial experts were not put on the committee, but was told the matter was finally settled.—The Irish Industries Association reports that Irish manufactures have been well patronized during the year, largely owing to the protection of the Irish Trade-mark, and expects a notable increase should the Trade-mark become legally recognized in the United States.—King George personally presented the Board of Trade Medals to Father O'Shea, Curate of Ardmore, Co. Waterford, and his seven companions—Messrs. Neal, Barry, Harris, Power, Lawton, Patrick and Connor O'Brien—who, under apparently impossible conditions, rescued the crew of a schooner wrecked off Ardmore Bay, March 18.

China.—Three years ago England and China agreed to begin a crusade against the opium traffic. It was stipulated that the importation of the drug should be decreased annually by 5,100 chests. To the surprise of the world, whereas the trade from India was, in 1908, 51,000 chests, it was cut down in one year to 42,183. Last year it fell to 30,654. Meantime, China is diminishing energetically her home cultivation of the poppy. A promise has been made by England that when a Chinese province ceases to cultivate the plant, the importation of opium from India will be forbidden. It is hoped that within two years or earlier the whole trade in opium will cease.—The insurrection which began at Canton is spreading rapidly. The rebels had already, on May 1, captured five towns, three of which are of some importance. Murdering, burning and pillage are reported as going on through the whole Kwang Tung Province. Canton is a scene of horror. Bodies of the slain litter the streets. The rebels, after severe fighting, were driven from the city. In the Province of Kwang Tung there are 145 Protestant missionaries, of whom 66 are men and 89 women; 45 of the latter are wives of the ministers, and 34 are single. There are, as yet, no reliable reports as to how they have fared with the rebels.—The Prince Regent has just issued an edict which abolishes the Grand Council and Grand Secretariate by which China has been governed for centuries, and has established a responsible Cabinet modelled on those of Europe. Extreme Radicals are not represented in the new Cabinet, and of the thirteen members none are Manchus. A Privy Council has also been formed.

France.—On May 4, 10,000 rebels attacked Fez. They were repulsed, but they have agents in the city undermining the loyalty of the inhabitants. The cabinet in Paris were deliberating about the situation when a despatch came from Col. Mangin, asking for help. Orders were given immediately to the troops at Casablanca to hurry forward to the relief of the city. There are 2,400 soldiers in Fez, but only one-third are armed. If Brémont has really arrived the number all told will be 2,800, ready for fight. The increase by 2,000, however, will necessitate greater food supplies. For that purpose France is hurrying transports, which are to land at Mehedia, a dilapidated port at the mouth of the Sebu River. Meantime, France has assured Germany that there is no intention of holding Fez.—On May 8 it was reported that Germany had warned France that the occupation of Fez by French troops would have dangerous consequences. The European edition of the Herald prints a story by a Scotch Mohammedan named Mackay, who says that the uprising of the tribes against France is due, not to dislike of the Sultan, but of the French desire of territorial aggrandizement and in opposition to their misrule.—Mystery still lingers about the fate of Brémont. Meantime, another relief party, under Brulard, had been despatched, but so poorly were the French soldiers equipped that it took them twenty days to start. Where they are now nobody knows.—Jaurès and Jules Guesde, the Socialist leaders, were supposed to be solidly united on the platform of opposition to everything bourgeois, but they have just now broken into violent opposition on the question of the Monis Ministry, Guesde maintaining that it is not radical enough, and Jaurès the contrary.

Germany.—May 11 announcement was made that the bill providing a constitution for Alsace-Lorraine had been rejected in its entirety in the committee of the Reichstag. Although the members of the committee have been endeavoring for several months to reach an acceptable compromise, the result confirms prophecies commonly made by the press months ago. The proposed constitution for the two provinces from the beginning failed, for different reasons, to satisfy the mind of the parties in Parliament. The Conservatives were dissatisfied with the compromise granting the provinces votes in the Bundesrath; the Liberals were displeased with the concessions concerning the electoral laws and the language question; and the Centre had been insisting just of late on radical changes in the clauses having to do with the election districts. Time and time again the Government has warned the members of the committee that it would go no further in allowing changes in the draft of the constitution as it had been submitted to them. Whether the Reichstag will attempt to settle the question out of committee is now the question, but the outlook is dubious.—Alarming reports that Germany had decided to send three cruisers to Moroccan waters to watch French movements in those parts were promptly denied from official sources. It is not denied that a warning was conveyed to Paris in a diplomatic way of the dangerous consequences which would be likely to follow the occupation of Fez by French troops. In view of this, significance is attached to Emperor William's action in making from Strassburg a general inspection of the fortresses along the French frontier.—Before leaving for this tour the Emperor gave the students of the University of Strassburg an opportunity for a special parade before him, after which he addressed them briefly. He urged his auditors to place the welfare of their country before partisan influence.—In Frankfurt-on-the-Main on May 10, 1871, there was signed the treaty of peace which formally put an end to the Franco-Prussian war. Special commemoration of the event was made in that city, and the German press generally published exhaustive reviews of the story of the forty years since that important day. Particular stress was laid upon Germany's influence for the peace of the world, which has resulted in an unprecedented progress in the industrial and social status of the Empire.

Portugal.—The Braga administration has authorized the marriage of priests and has promised pensions to their prospective widows and children. The assertion is made that the Holy See will grant a small subsidy to those priests who, deprived of government aid, may have no means of support while discharging the functions of the sacred ministry. Would such priests have so slight a hold upon the affection and regard of Portuguese Catholics? The story looks absurd on the face of it.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A May Sermon

During the month of May the favorite altar in Catholic churches is that of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Here local devotion, in the large parish of the city or the little mission of the countryside, strives to express with the means at its command, in flowers and laces and various other forms of decoration, its ideal of Mary's beauty, goodness, and Divine and comprehensive Motherhood. Not content with this public and, as it were, collective homage to the Mother of God, the children of the Church yield to what may be described as a pious individualism and a blessed selfishness; they take her away with them to their home, to the classroom, to the monastery or the convent, and, if circumstances permit, to the workshop and even to the streets and highways along which they are wont to pass. Thus all over the world, in the bedrooms of crowded tenements, in marble oratories, in roadside shrines, in huts amid distant jungles, in schools and colleges, the statue of our Lady rises serenely and benignly above fragrance of fresh-cut flowers and lit tapers and human hands folded in prayer, praise and loving reverence.

We sometimes catch ourselves imagining what impression some casual glimpse of this devotion of faith and love and purity must create in the mind of one who has been reared outside the Church, knows nothing of her spirit or traditions, and, perhaps, regards her as a sinister political entity or a mere superstitious agency of self-seeking priestcraft. From mere negative ignorance to mistaken prejudice and hostility the difference is wide and capable of endless gradations; and we take it for granted that the stranger happening upon a May altar will be affected sometimes to venomous resentment, sometimes to contemptuous pity, or sometimes merely to surprise and bewilderment, as his peculiar ideas of the Church and her practices are few or many.

But one thing will be true of every such stranger: his mind will grope in vain for some slight foothold of understanding. To him there is only a lifeless image, in wood or plaster or marble, perhaps indifferently executed; or a cheap chromo, or an uninspired painting, or a wretched copy of a masterpiece; and he sees men and women, boys and girls, and little children placing flowers or lighting candles before it, nay, kneeling down reverently and praying as if they were in a living presence. And many of those who act thus are his friends, as intelligent and as normal as himself; morally, they may be better or worse; but, better or worse, they are no fools. Thus he sees objectively the extraordinary reconciliation of sheer childish folly and hard common sense; his intellect is staggered; it strains itself in a vain effort to find a clue to a mystery so palpable, to seek some way out of the unheard of necessity of having to admit the existence of a self-contradictory phenomenon. He is like a native of China, adept in the barbarous music of his country, who hears orchestral music for the first time and puzzles over its din of multifarious sound. He cannot detect melody or harmony, beginning or end or sequence in the noises of its drums and strings and wind-instruments. The players seem to be sensible persons, they certainly take pains and are not creating sounds at random; the audience bears evidences of intelligence and appears to find something worth listening to in all this wild confusion and fanfare.

If the traveler from China is wise, he will not dismiss the puzzling problem from further attention by the hasty conclusion that this intricate medley of notes is a racial or tribal convention, neither better nor worse than average Moro or African efforts at musical expression, concerning which he may have curious conjectures, but sees no profit in serious investigation. He will recognize, without understanding, the superior claims to attention of a form of musical art which has been built up on a civilization more enlightened, farther advanced and more resourceful than his own. His baffled intellect will enter upon a quest after the key which will unlock the harmonies now latent and inaudible. This ambition, founded on half-blind respect, will be the measure of his intelligence, just as derision and mockery would have been the measure of his indifference to refining and civilizing influences.

The stranger who has wandered into the Virgin Mary's shrine has a similar difficulty to solve. For centuries the entire civilized world practised the devotion whose reasonableness now eludes him so completely. His own forefathers knelt here after making their offering of flowers and lights. Modern heresies, infidelities and demoralizing luxuries still leave a large proportion of cultivated men and women who join pure youth and childhood and those who wrestle bravely with adversity in praying here. The faith involved in this act, which seems so alien to his reason, is so wide in its range of devout adherents as to include types of all mental capacities, temperaments, dispositions, tastes and developments of education and intellectual pursuits. To flout this testimony of some high reasonableness, which he cannot now encompass, is on its face more certainly irrational than would be a dubiously rational attitude of acceptance, too idle or too careless for inquiry.

If this waif, who has strayed into his Mother's presence with cold and unresponsive regard, be without faith in God and the Divine Incarnation, his search for understanding must begin with an earnest and prayerful study of Christian evidence. We may add that his search will end here without finding need of going farther. The Christian sects, who admit the Godhead of Christ and discourage devotion to Christ's mother, practise a form of inconsistency which lives by reason of inherited prejudices and misconceptions and will not recommend itself to him. If he once admits, on the strength of the superhuman history of Christ and His Church, that God so loved us as to become Man for us, taking His human nature from Mary, the Catholic's piety towards the Mother of God will no longer be a stumbling-block to his reason.

The seeming exaggerations of Catholic writers, from St. John Damascene and St. Augustine to Suarez and the promoters of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, will take on their natural outlines of mere logical corollaries to the central truth of the Incarnation. He will not be surprised to learn that God loves the Blessed Virgin Mary more than all his other creatures taken together, angels and saints, the noble and good of every age, past, present and to come. He will be able to assign no limits, except those which fall short of Divine attributes, to the beauty and perfection of her who was chosen and prepared to be the Mother of Christ. He will see that here at last is a reality transcending human ideals, and that, in sounding its depth and conjecturing its breadth, fancy and imagination can wander forever, hand in hand with reason, nay, yielding to reason their own ordinary functions of leading the way upon undreamt adventures in the discovery of truth.

Stranger no longer, he will find fault, not with supposed excesses in Catholic devotion to her whose unutterable beauty and power of Motherhood Christ has shared with all of us, but with its defects. He will note the tawdry hangings, the faded lily, the extinguished taper, the irreverent posture and idle gaping; his soul will turn with resentment against them who, in ignorance or folly, detach themselves from their sonship to her and cast slights upon her greatness and her honor. He will be seized with a very passion of devotion to her; he will fling himself at her feet, and gaze into her mother's eyes, and feed upon the love in them and get strength in the promise of intercession in them, and find no language to say what is in him except the broken, plaintive, struggling accents of the Church's prayer: O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria! JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Marriage Impediments

Some ideas current outside the Church, even among the well meaning, concerning its matrimonial legislation are distressing. They seem to take for granted that marriage impediments are the invention of perversely ingenious ecclesiastics, either to provide the great with the means of getting rid of vows that weary them, or to enable the clergy to tyrannize over the multitude by separating ruthlessly those who would remain united, and holding together remorselessly those who would be parted, unless favor be bought with money. Let us see the truth of the matter.

Impediments are twofold. One kind prevents a valid marriage; the other makes it merely unlawful. Of the first class, in which the world is chiefly interested, some come from God's law, either natural or revealed, and are admitted more or less by all. Over them the Church has no power; but must enforce them without fear or favor. With them, therefore, we have nothing further to do than to point out how seriously the State errs in ignoring them. Others are founded in God's law, but they exist formally by that of the Church. They are founded in God's law, for the Church cannot manufacture impediments at will. For reasons drawn from that law it may determine consanguinity in the second, third or fourth degree to be a prohibitive impediment; it cannot found such an impediment on, for example, mere utility, to make difference of race and weak health such. Here again the State falls into error in its legislation, and it will fall deeper still if it listens to the clamor of certain people. On the other hand, consanguinity in the above degrees is not an impediment imposed by divine law, as is that of the first degree, i.e., of brother and sister, etc., but is made so by ecclesiastical law.

The remote reason of the jurisdiction of the Church over matrimony is that this, of its nature, is a sacred thing. The formal reason is that in the Christian dispensation Christ our Lord has raised marriage to the dignity of a sacrament. In guarding it the Church must secure its essence, by insisting on a true matrimonial consent, on the exclusion of antecedent compacts destructive of its nature, and on its indissolubility except by death. In discharging this duty the Church has no choice, though in doing so it comes into conflict with the world continually.

Our Lord has established in the Church the evangelical counsels as the rule of the highest type of life, individual or social. To protect it the Church has made the solemn vows of religion and the character of sacred orders impediments to the validity of marriage. Again, the family is a divine institution, not only for the propagation of the race, but also for the nurturing of its members in the Christian life by the mutual help and example of these as well as by their united action. In its strictest sense the family is confined to the single household. In the broader sense that has always been recognized by the common sense of mankind, it includes all near relatives and connections; and, if a reality in this sense, it is much more efficient for good than if restricted within the narrower limits of the term. If sons and daughters, on marrying, are held to be not entirely separated from the parental society, the traditions and practices of the Christian life pass necessarily from thence to the new home; and when many such homes are bound together by ties of common origin or of contracted affinity, not only is the influence of each upon the others greatly strengthened, but also their united influence upon society at large. This broader idea of the family is founded in the natural and the supernatural order. It implies evidently a free intercourse amongst the members incompatible with the possibility of future matrimonial relations; and this is one, at least, of the reasons why the Church has instituted the impediments of consanguinity and affinity.

From the obligations of watching over the sacramental character of marriage, of protecting the religion of the contracting parties and of insuring it for their children, comes the impediment to the marriage of the baptized with the unbaptized. Upon this the world may not look with favor, but it must acknowledge that from the Catholic point of view it is of the utmost importance. There is, however, a matter upon which all agree. The welfare of society, natural and supernatural, requires publicity in every marriage. The modern State refuses to recognize as valid any marriage contrary to its laws for obtaining this publicity. It should not complain, therefore, that the Church, far older than it, has legislated for the same end. Clandestinity, according to canon law, nullifies marriage, and to preclude it the Church requires its children to make their contract before their proper pastor and, at least, two witnesses.

The reasonableness of the chief matrimonial impediments being established, a word may be added concerning their application. The world does not trouble itself about the dutiful children of the Church, but it is deeply interested in the rebellious. Though these defy the law, the Church is still their mother, and of all mothers the kindest, receiving them when they return in the spirit of Christ. The first thing to be done is to rectify their sinful union. It is clear that public authority can neither allow subjects to trifle with its laws nor trifle with them itself. But once the majesty of the law is in safety, the Church is far more indulgent to lawbreakers than the civil power; probably because the more august authority is, the more easily can it condescend. Usually, then, if there be no impediments in the way other than ecclesiastical, the Church is far from separating sternly its repentant children, and one imbued with popular notions would be surprised at the number of invalid marriages rectified. But it may happen that impediments of divine law intervene from which the Church is powerless to derogate. It happens, too, that the parties find their irregular union a mistake and one wishes, or both, a separation. Evidently, in such cases the separation is not to be attributed to the Church.

But what of the innocent children? Are they to be declared illegitimate? Illegitimacy is a matter, not of sentiment, but of fact, for which only the parties to an unlawful union are responsible. The State declares marriages invalid and, consequently, their offspring illegitimate, and nobody complains. Why, then, such an outcry against the Church? This is the more unreasonable as the Church is far more generous in legitimatizing children by a subsequent marriage than the civil law, at least, that of England and of those regions which follow English common law in the matter. Moreover, many who clamor against us know that numbers of children to-day are really illegitimate, notwithstanding the legalizing by the State of their parents' so-called marriages. It seems, then, that the world regards illegitimacy as a matter of sentiment rather than of fact, and dreads its social effects rather than the thing itself. This is but another of its many errors.

In the agitation concerning the Hébert case Canadian Protestants have found a mare's nest. "The 'Ne temere' decree," they say, "binds all baptized in the Church, even though they have fallen away from it. Hence for these marriage is impossible in Quebec. They will not go to the priest, and it is useless to go to a minister, since the civil court will follow the canon law and declare such a marriage invalid."

As we explained in a previous article, the object of that decree is to unify the marriage law, which was perplexed by, among other things, the declaration of Benedict XIV, which declared valid the marriages not only of Protestants, but also of Protestants with Catholics, even though the law of the Council of Trent against clandestinity had not been observed. Three courses were open to the Pope: to extend that declaration to the whole Church; to abrogate it entirely and return to Tridentine legislation, which, many canonists held, affected all baptized Christians; or to take a middle course by abrogating the declaration and declaring that the Tridentine legislation should bind Catholics only. The first was obviously objectionable. The second, in view of the great changes in the status of Protestants since the Council, was no less obviously inconsistent with the benignity of the Church. The third, therefore, was chosen. Now, in Quebec three classes of fallen away Catholics can be distinguished: that of those who have abandoned the Church negatively by withdrawing from its worship and sacraments; that of those who have abandoned it indirectly by joining some forbidden society; and that of those who have abandoned it positively by joining some Protestant sect. The condition of the first two classes is unchanged by the "Ne temere," since they never came under the Benedictine declaration. Moreover, as they are not Protestants, but, on the contrary, generally continue to call themselves Catholics, there is no reason why Protestants should worry about them. If they are really in the proposed dilemma, they are so of their own free will. As regards the third class, it is too much to ask the Church to admit that rebellion withdraws the rebel from its jurisdiction. This may be in accordance with advanced Liberalism; it is contrary to all sound morality, and would threaten the very foundations of society. Nevertheless, should a Catholic join some Protestant sect there is reason to suppose that the civil courts would recognize his marriage before a minister of that sect. The fact that the civil code recognizes Protestant denominations seems to imply the civil liberty of individuals to adhere to them.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

War on Religious in Spain

We are about to enter upon a period of acute anti-clericalism, for with the reopening of the Cortes on May 8, the president of the Council of Ministers, Señor Canalejas, will present his projected law on religious associations with which he has been threatening the country for several months. That your readers may have a better understanding of our present condition, we shall briefly review what has been done, or attempted, in Spain since the first eruption of anticlericalism.

It was in December, 1900, that Canalejas first waved the standard of anticlericalism in the Spanish parliament; it was then that Spaniards first heard the word "anticlerical," a new word to them, a word that had not until then been pronounced in their land. It was under this banner of anticlericalism that the Liberals rose to power in 1901. On January 31 of that year there was handseled in Madrid the vile drama, "Electra," of Galdós, a production that raised a sudden and violent storm of opposition on the part of the Radicals to the religious orders and all that they represented. While discussing in the Cortes the speech from the throne, Don Alfonso González, one of the members of the commission appointed to prepare the address of the Cortes, came out so strongly in favor of an anticlerical policy that he was rewarded with the portfolio of government, from which Moret was promoted to the presidency of the lower House, or Congress. In September, 1901, González published his famous decree against the religious orders, a decree which he had drawn up behind the back, as it were, of the nuncio, without even having the courtesy to inform him of it. Premier Sagasta had to make all kinds of excuses for this violation of the established usage, while the decree itself remained inoperative.

In March, 1902, Sagasta handed in the resignations of his cabinet and proceeded to the formation of another, from which he excluded the mischief-making González, whose rabid anticlericalism had caused so much unpleasantness. In the new cabinet thus formed Moret was minister of government and Canalejas was minister of agriculture. A month later the cabinet arranged a modus vivendi with the Holy See, in which the legality of all the religious institutes then existing in Spain was fully recognized. On this occasion Canalejas conveyed the impression that he had been deceived, and Moret spoke strongly in favor of the orders. Sagasta, as was his custom in difficult matters, maintained an equivocal attitude.

In May there was some discussion of a proposed law of association; but as its trend was not to the liking of Canalejas, he resigned from the cabinet and threw himself into the open arms of the Radicals. His next move was a tour of the country on a speech-making campaign under anticlerical auspices. Upon the reopening of the Cortes he charged his former associates on the "Blue Bench" (where the members of the cabinet sit) with inconsistency and levity, because they had not pressed their anticlerical measure; but the premier retorted that the Liberal party was not made up of extremists, and that Radicals had no place in it. Thus was Canalejas read out of the Liberal party at a session of the Cortes.

Thereupon eight or ten cronies of his withdrew from the Liberal party and, with him, constituted an ephemeral Canalejas squad, open to offers.

Upon the death of Sagasta the Liberal ex-ministers adopted a new platform, in which there was no mention of the clerical question or of the religious problem, and under the leadership of Montero Rios they found themselves again in power in 1905, after an interval of Conservative government. Canalejas and his little band had cast their lot with Montero Rios, and when he was forced to retire after less than a year in office, they conferred their distinguished patronage upon his successor, Moret.

During his tenure of office Moret had not a word to say about clericalism or anticlericalism; what he aimed at was to be the recognized leader of the Liberals. He had to resign after six months in office, and gave way to General Lopez Dominguez, whose minister of government, one Señor Davila, proposed a measure against the religious which aroused a storm of protest throughout the country and caused the downfall of the ministry. Again Moret found himself premier, but at the expiration of forty-eight hours he had to give way to the Marquis of Vega de Armijo. This worthy came to grief over another association law, and retired to make way for Maura. We have seen how Moret succeeded Maura and how Canalejas superseded Moret.

Such is the history of the attempt at anticlerical legislation in Spain. We see that on two occasions the Liberal party have undertaken to legislate against the orders, and that on both occasions they have failed ingloriously; we see that the religious problem is one of the chief causes of the divisions, the weakness, and the failures which constitute the history of their party. What will be the result of this third attempt to saddle an association law on the country? Will Canalejas carry the day?

At the outset, we may say that the Catholics of Spain, and even the religious orders themselves, who are naturally most concerned in the matter, do not manifest any great alarm or uneasiness. Why this placidity? Because we are intimately persuaded that the whole affair will not come to a vote, that the one object of Canalejas is to stop the snarling of the Radicals, and the members of the newspaper trust, who, day in and day out, are goading him to undertake an anticlerical campaign. We think that we can foresee the course that his proposed associations law will take. As soon as it shall have been presented in the Cortes it will be referred to the proper committee, who will study it and report it to the house. A part of their duty is to ask the advice and opinion of distinguished people not connected with the Cortes; that is, to feel, as it were, the public pulse. But, as during May the appropriations for the coming fiscal year come up for consideration, the associations law will be pushed aside for the time being; then will come the summer recess; in the autumn the committee will call for advice and opinion, a proceeding that can be continued indefinitely. It follows, therefore, that in all likelihood the measure will not be reported to the Cortes before 1912. Now, in a country like Spain, where a ministry is subject to so many vicissitudes, who is the prophet that will venture to foretell what a year, or even a month, may bring forth? Will the Liberals be in power in 1912? Will Canalejas be president of the Council? Canalejas himself most surely has all this in mind; hence his constant effort to pose before the Radical elements of the country as an "advanced" statesman, ready to give battle to clericalism and to square off before Rome.

Supposing, however, that nothing that we have surmised or suggested should happen, that Canalejas should remain in power and that some associations law hostile to the religious orders should be placed on the statute-books, would the religious be driven from Spain as they have been driven from France? We think not. They will be nagged and harassed, their legitimate expansion will be made as difficult as possible, but we are decidedly of the opinion that no ministry could be backed up by the country in a wholesale attempt to use violence against them. They are too firmly established and the Carlists are too numerous.

The danger, if danger there be, is not in cabinets, but in the laboring classes of the great industrial and manufacturing centers, for they are offended and angered at the sight of a friar, a religious. The Radical press, which here in Spain enjoys unbridled liberty and absolute impunity, is untiring and unceasing in its efforts to hold up before the working classes the friar, the order priest, as their greatest enemy, and to this end no calumny is too vile.

At this writing the course of events in Morocco promises to create for Spain a state of affairs analogous to that in 1909. The Republicans and the Socialists, who are becoming daily more unified in their political program, have given notice that they will oppose any sending of troops to Africa. If to this Republican-Socialist campaign we add the ugly feelings stirred up by the proposed associations law, and if the cabinet does not proceed with the greatest prudence, circumspection and energy, it would not be strange if we should have occasion to lament a repetition of the acts of vandalism and outrage which gave its name to the "bloody week" of Barcelona.

NORBERTO TORCAL,

Editor of El Noticiero, Saragossa, Spain.

The Mystery of the Naundorffs

The newspaper reading French public in general and a small class of earnest believers in particular have been greatly interested in the petition addressed to the Senate by the Naundorffs, who request permission (not, indeed, to wear the French crown) to assume what they claim to be their family name, the name of Bourbon.

Prince "Charles Louis de Bourbon," as his partizans call him, is, if we believe the latter, the lineal descendant of the unfortunate little King Louis XVII who was supposed to have died in prison, in June, 1795. Visitors to the quaint Dutch town of Delft may have noticed a tomb emblazoned with the lilies of France, bearing an inscription to the effect that here rests Louis XVII, "King of France and Navarre, son of Louis XVI and of Marie Antoinette of Austria." The grandson of the man buried in the Dutch churchyard now petitions the Senate for leave to assume officially a name that only his followers have given him hitherto.

Experience teaches us that the limits of human credulity are boundless, and during the last century various adventurers claiming to be the unfortunate prisoner of the Temple have, by turns, secured a certain number of adherents. Only three years after the Revolution, in 1798, the first of these claimants, the son of a Norman tailor, named Hervagault, was during many months treated as their lawful sovereign by the royalists of Châlons, but among these "false Dauphins" one only, the Prussian watchmaker, Naundorff, has left descendants who are enterprising enough to support his claims. But Prince "Charles Louis de Bourbon" cannot command many hundred partizans, and so far his pretensions have not moved the official world of the Republic. Nevertheless, for some years past he has come before the public at intervals. Thus, on the anniversaries of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette a Mass for the repose of their souls is celebrated by his desire, besides the Mass at which the French royalists assist, and after it the Naundorff "King" and "Queen" receive the homage of their followers. Through the medium of M. Boissy d'Anglas, Senator for l'Ardeche, who is an ardent believer, the Naundorff's petition was presented to the Senate last month, and a commission was appointed to examine the justice of their claim to the name of Bourbon.

This incident, as may be imagined, gave rise to much controversy; the newspapers were filled with articles on the subject; the bulky volume printed by the "Prince" in order to substantiate his demands was examined and discussed by competent authorities, but as a result of the controversy that ensued the fable of the "Naundorff" King seems, at last, literally to fall to pieces.

Curiously enough, the commission of Senators appointed to decide the question was at first somewhat dazzled by the quantity, rather than the quality, of the papers contained in the bulky volume upon which M. Boissy d'Anglas based his action in the matter. Many important public characters, Popes and Kings were quoted as being favorable to Naundorff's claims, and numerous anecdotes, pathetic and sensational, added a touch of romance to the tale. Evidently this mass of evidence bearing on a story "too strange not be true" acted upon the imagination even of the Senators of the French republic. Then as, one by one, the accumulated evidence was sifted, the startling statements disproved, and the pathetic anecdotes shown to be pure fiction, the "conscript fathers" drew back, their favorable attitude was modified, and they prudently refrained from giving the favorable decision to which at the outset they had seemed inclined.

Among the writers who contributed to enlighten their judgment with regard to the question in hand are several well-known historians who have made the French Revolution their special study: M. Gustave Bord, M. Frédéric Masson, a member of the French Academy; last, not least, M. Lenôtre, whose books on the Reign of Terror have a European celebrity. M. Lenôtre is inclined to believe that the child buried on June 8, 1795, was not the little King, but a substitute. However, he, so far, refrains from expressing any opinion as to the ultimate fate of the escaped prisoner, except that he was not, and could not be, Naundorff. Finally, a writer who signs "G. M." seems to have closed the subject. Writing in the Débats, he shows that the first Naundorff, who, according to his argument, was a certain Carl Werq, was born at Halle in 1777, ten years before the prince whom he attempted to personify.

If, as now seems certain, this Carl Werq, alias Naundorff, was the man whose tomb at Delft is emblazoned with the Bourbon lilies, his story is another proof of the extraordinary extent of human credulity. Apparently, when the idea dawned upon him that he might better himself by posing as Louis XVII, he had not the trump card in his favor. He was ten years older than the son of Louis XVI; he was absolutely penniless; he had got into trouble twice with the German authorities, who accused him of being an incendiary and of coining false money; moreover, he could hardly speak French! Yet a certain success did attend his efforts. The long, lame, confused story of his adventures did impose upon a small number of well-meaning people, and now, after nearly a hundred years, the same story, with its discrepancies, contradictions and absurdities, has, up to a certain measure, impressed the republican senators of twentieth century France. Whether or not the adventurer's descendants believe themselves to be what they say, they have succeeded in founding a small party, and, though without large means or a wide influence, have secured a hearing before the Senate. At any rate, they are not wanting in confidence. It is probable that their recent failure will not discourage these believers and that "Charles Louis de Bourbon" will still be recognized by a few imaginative and romantic spirits as the lawful King of France.

Let us add that if the claims of the Prussian watchmaker have been shown to repose on no other foundation than the blind credulity of well-meaning individuals, they are indirectly supported by the mystery that even to this day surrounds the death of the unfortunate son of Louis XVI, a mystery that able and penetrating searchers after truth like M. Lenôtre have hitherto failed to explain satisfactorily. If, as is stated by the official documents, Louis XVII really died in the Temple, how is it that during the months that followed boys of ten and eleven years of age were arrested in different parts of France because they were supposed to be the little prisoner, whose official death had taken place?

These and other points are still involved in obscurity, and will probably never be completely cleared up, but the particular Naundorff mystery may now be considered as thoroughly sifted. The rejection of the petitioner's request by the Senate is the only sensible solution of a vexed question which for so long a time aroused the interest of French historians, archeologists and royalists.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

IN MISSION FIELDS

AN ANCIENT SHRINE IN INDIA.

At the beginning of Lent the Bishop of Mylapore, India, made his pastoral visitation of the Church of Mae de Deus, Mylapore, where he was received with great enthusiasm by the pious Christians. The diocese is in the territory that hitherto has been under the protection of the Portuguese government, and attention is naturally drawn to it at this time when the attitude of the home government towards the Portuguese missions in India is still a matter of conjecture. The Catholic Register of Madras gives in part an address to his Lordship on behalf of the congregation of Mae de Deus (Mother of God), in which the speaker said:

"The unfortunate overthrow of the Royal House of Portugal we cannot but deplore, when we reflect upon the fact that it is the Portuguese clergy, liberally supported by the Royal House, that were the first to plant the Catholic Faith in the Far East and West at great self-sacrifice, and to maintain it in all its integrity these past centuries. The sad occurrence, we have no doubt, has been a matter of anxious concern to Your Lordship, and we therefore take the opportunity to express our deep sympathy with Your Lordship, and pray that it may not in any manner impede the many measures, both in progress and in contemplation by Your Lordship, in connection with the educational and religious institutions attached to the See of Mylapore."

His Lordship in reply thanked the people for their kind and sympathetic expressions, and asked them to pray for the peace and well-being of his mother country. He then told some historical facts connected with their own ancient Church. He told them that it is recorded in the ancient writings of the Society of Jesus that they had a college attached to the Church of Mae de Deus three centuries ago; that their celebrated ancient scholar, Father Robert Nobili, spent his last days at this College, and was buried in this church; that there is a special day in the year dedicated amongst the Portuguese Jesuits to Our Lady of Mylapore; that in those days the fame of this "Lady" spread outside the Catholic community of the place, and the surrounding Hindus flocked to this church to implore the favor of our Lady.

CORRESPONDENCE

Italy's Unity Show Does Not Draw.

ROME, APRIL 30, 1911.

The Exposition! The Exposition! Always the Exposition! And yet the multitudes will not come, and the gate receipts are low. However, we have parades, banquets and speeches galore. Close on the heels of the departing Prince and Princess of Connaught arrived the French Commission, headed by General Victor Michel, the Commander-in-chief of the French army, to deliver an autograph letter of President Fallières and the felicitations of the Republic of France. There was much military saluting, and the King of Italy, toasting his guest, referred feelingly to France's share in the achievement of the independence of United Italy. In reply General Michel averred that this bond of blood, shed in the common cause of civilization and human progress, was a secure basis of peace and concord between the two nations. Exit France and enter King Gustavus V and Queen Victoria of Sweden. This was the time for the small boy; for a school holiday was declared and several thousand of Italy's best soldiers were brought in on parade.

These were really a fine looking body of men, young, active, clean-cut, well-groomed and fairly well drilled infantry and some cavalry and mounted carabinieri, who were strikingly handsome. The behavior of these men, when off duty and about town, is positively edifying, due, I am told, to the strict discipline under which they are trained, but due in part, as far as those quartered in Rome is concerned, to the labors of the Redemptorist Fathers at the Church of St. Joachim, near the barracks, who look after their spiritual welfare, and have many of them frequently to Holy Communion. At the dinner tendered to the King of Sweden, the King of Italy complimented Sweden on her heroic deeds in the past in behalf of liberal principles, and her present importance as an element of equilibrium for the peace of Europe. The best Gustavus could find to say was that humanity owed a debt to the genius of the Italian people for the precious treasures of art and human progress, and to Emmanuele and his forbears for the power and prosperity of United Italy. Really it is a hard task to toast three nations within six days, and the King of Italy is no orator, not to say no genius.

At the end of the week the notables were all off for Turin, where on Saturday the King opened the Turin section of the Exposition before the entire diplomatic corps, including, of course, our own Mr. Leishman, a large parliamentary representation of senators and deputies, with princes, counts and cavalieri innumerable, and last but not least, the insuppressible, if not irrepressible Mayor Nathan of Rome. The latter was down for a speech, but alas! the press reports in Rome cut it out to make room for the long discourse of the new member of the Ministry, the Honorable Signore Nitti. He dilated on the economic problems and progress of the nation, and, strange to say, took pride in the revival of the migratory spirit among his fellow-countrymen and the fact that Italy's fertile energy was now supplying five million souls to labor in South and North America. And yet, but the day before, the papers were clamorous with protest over the Italian Government closing "The Labor Information Office for Italians" in New York, though it only cost the country last year twelve thousand dollars, whereas it formerly eat up thirty thousand a year.

A notable figure at the Turin opening was Signore Marconi, who himself superintended the sending forth to the world of the wireless message announcing the Turin Exposition as formally open to all comers, and here's hoping that they'll come! Meantime, our American commissioner to the Exposition, Mr. Harrison S. Morris, has kept his wits about him, and remembering the advertising value of Expositions and the omnipotence of the newspaper, had all the representatives of the press, both foreign and domestic, to dinner at the Castle of the Cæsars on the Aventine. We are told that the proceedings at the festive board were most animated and cordial, and that over the champagne the dean of the press corps congratulated America on her fine exhibit and patted Mr. Harrison on the back as a rare good fellow for his hospitality to the hungry, not to say thirsty, press.

Just at this time the twentieth pilgrimage from Italy to Lourdes started on its way, two thousand strong, full of piety and enthusiasm. In the company are Cardinal Maffi and eight bishops of Italy. They have with them some twelve cripples, for whom they wish to solicit the largess of our Blessed Mother. Synchronous with this public testimony of faith and piety, the apostate priest, Romolo Murri, member of the Chamber of Deputies, issues a call for an anti-clerical convention in September, "to formulate a clear, lofty and serene conception of human life and human activities, extrinsic to the content of special religious creeds and doctrines." Yet on the same day in the Cathedral of St. Mark, in Venice, in the presence of Vice-Admiral Faravelli, sent to represent the Minister of Marine, the flag of the new man-of-war San Marco is solemnly blessed with the benediction of the Catholic Church.

To-morrow, the First of May, is looked forward to with some anxiety, owing to the question of a possible strike on the government railroads. The labor proclamations from the socialist sections are uncompromising. The Catholic Workmen's Union of Rome, while announcing a program of speeches on the high cost of living, universal suffrage, proportional representation, and against the threatened anti-clerical attack, is most eloquent in declaring that while it stands for sacred ideals of religion, patriotism and popular betterment, it will, as a Catholic body, never cease to battle for the sacrosanct and inviolable right of security for their religious principles. To this the Catholic Workmen's Union of Italy adds, that it will never tolerate tyrannical violation of liberty of conscience.

At the Vatican the Holy Father's indisposition still forbids his holding public audiences, but he daily receives the Cardinal Secretaries of the different Congregations on business of moment. He also received the new ambassador from Austria to the Holy See, Prince John, of Schonburg-Hartenstein, who came to present his credentials. On leaving the Pope and after presenting his compliments to the Cardinal Secretary of State, he went into Saint Peter's to do reverence at the tomb of the Apostles, Peter and Paul. This is somewhat more intelligible than the royal wreaths on the tombs of Victor Emmanuel and Humbert I.

The Holy Father also received His Excellency, Rafael Merry del Val, the father of the Cardinal Secretary of State, himself once the Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See, who, with his family, has come for a two months' visit to Rome. Father Bandini, a missionary to the Italians in the United States, was also received to obtain the Papal blessing, and an autograph letter from His Holiness to his dear Italian children in North America. Finally, there was a solemn reception of the Patriarch of the Armenians, Mgr. Paul Peter XIII Terzian, who, according to unbroken custom, has come to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the Sovereign Pontiff.

Apropos of his visit, an eastern press agency announced the call of the Grand Vizier of Constantinople on the Papal Delegate, Mgr. Sardi, to thank him for a letter written by the Pope to the bishops of Albania, bidding them to allow Catholics to have nothing to do with the uprising in that unhappy land; to this was added the item that the Turkish Minister to the Vatican had been instructed to present similar thanks to the Pope in person. Needless to say that this is a canard manufactured out of whole cloth, as no such letter was ever sent to the bishops of Albania.

The week closed with a solemn religious celebration in Capua of the jubilee of Cardinal Alfonso Capececiattolo de Castelpagano, son of the Duke of Castel Pagano, who is to-day, though eighty-seven years old, hale and hearty. He has been a priest for sixty-four years, Archbishop of Capua for thirty-one years, and cardinal for twenty-five. His mental activity during all these years is witnessed by twenty-seven volumes and thirty-two pamphlets of his published works, ranging in subject from "Cardinal Newman and the Catholic Church in England" and "The Mistakes of Renan in His Life of Jesus" to "Catholic Patriotism in Italy," "First Communion for Little Children" and "The Passion of Our Lord." The character of his soul is in part displayed by the closing lines of a letter of thanks which he addressed to the cardinals, archbishops and bishops, who cooperated in the production of a volume commemorative of his jubilee,—"I beg that Your Excellency recommend me in your earnest prayers to God that so much of life as is left to me be spent entirely in the love of Our Lord Jesus, the Church and the souls for whom Jesus died and rose again."

The trodden worm has turned at last and the Jesuit, Father Bricarelli, who was accused in the anti-clerical papers by the most recent convert of the Via Venti Settembre, ex-Father Verdesi, of having violated the seal of Confession, has instituted proceedings in the courts against Verdesi for criminal libel. The city would not be surprised to see this followed up by civil suit for damages against the five Socialist papers which published the libel. There is some semblance of law left in the Italian courts, and it is high time that, like God's rain, its blessings descend upon the just and unjust alike.

C. M.

The Dutch-English Jansenist

MARIENDAAL, April 30, 1911.

In AMERICA of the 18th of March I read the following communication: "Arnold Mathew, who calls himself Bishop of the Autonomous Church in Great Britain, etc., and Herbert Beale and Arthur Howarth, who received episcopal consecration from him, have been excommunicated by the Pope." The name of this Mathew has become sadly prominent in the ecclesiastical annals of our country, and has cast a sombre light on Jansenism, which is here dragging out a painful and shameful existence. Before discussing the matter of Mr. Mathew I should like to say a few words about this remnant of Jansenism in Holland. When I say Holland I conform to the usage universally adopted by foreign countries. The real name of our country is Nederland, meaning low-country. Holland in the proper sense of the name consists of two provinces: Noord Holland and Zuid Holland. But when I make mention of Holland in this sense I will add to the provinces the adjectives north and south.

The Dutch Jansenists are the direct issue of Jansenius, the Bishop of Ypres, inasmuch as his doctrine was brought hither in the seventeenth century by those Jansenist leaders who were compelled to leave France and Belgium. The father of Dutch Jansenism is the Oratorian Peter Codde, who, in 1688, was sent to Utrecht as Vicar-apostolic, and who, although belonging to the Catholic Church, was already infected with the heresy. In 1723 the pseudo chapter of Utrecht, which was also tainted, nominated the Vicar-General Cornelius Steenhoven as Jansenist Archbishop. He, a short time after, received episcopal consecration from the hands of Monsignor Varlet, and was suspended. It was then, especially, that Jansenism scattered its seed in Holland; but it cannot be said that it took root to any large extent, for, according to the statistics recently published, the Jansenists are very restricted in number. They claim three dioceses: Utrecht, Haarlem and Deventer.

(1) The Archbishopric of Utrecht is divided into three sections, under the jurisdiction of an arch-priest. The Utrecht section consists of six parishes, three of which are in the city itself. It has 2,473 people belonging to it, of whom 1,340 are said to be communicants. The section of Schieland, in South-Holland, has seven parishes, two of which are in the City of Rotterdam. It claims 1,404 people, of whom 767 are communicants. The third section is that of Rhinland in Delftland, which has three parishes, with 371 people, of whom 228 are communicants. To the Archbishopric of Utrecht belong also the dispersed Jansenists who are scattered throughout the whole country, and have no fixed parish. Their number is unknown, but it is certainly very small. The largest body of them is to be found in Arnhem, and consists of only 37 people. There are two parishes abroad, one of them in Paris, of 270 people, and another at Nordstrand, a German island in the North Sea, with a congregation of 50, of whom 33 are communicants.

(2) The Diocese of Haarlem consists of ten parishes, two of which are in the City of Amsterdam, and claims 3,732 people, of whom 1,914 are communicants.

(3) The Diocese of Deventer passed out of existence long ago. Perhaps there are some dispersed Jansenists there, but there are no parishes. There is a titular bishop, but he is pastor of the two Jansenist parishes at Rotterdam, which city really belongs ecclesiastically to the Archdiocese of Utrecht.

The Jansenists have a seminary and college at Amersfoort, but there are only eight theological students and seven collegians in it. The total number of Jansenists, therefore, in Holland amounts to 8,352 all told, of whom 4,292 are communicants. They are directed by an archbishop, two bishops and thirty-one priests, and thus cut a small figure side by side with the 1,800,000 Dutch Catholics, who are divided into five dioceses, with one thousand parishes and three thousand priests. As regards the doctrine of these Jansenists, I shall not discuss their errors in the domain of speculative theology, but shall confine myself to the following points: They do not recognize the supremacy of the Pope. They deny the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and Papal Infallibility. They have changed the days of fasting and of feasts. They have suppressed all the impediments of marriage except those recognized by the State. They have translated into Dutch the Pontifical, Missal, and Vespers, and have suppressed in the Canon of the Mass the prayer for the Pope, and in the Credo the Filioque. They have frequently conferred on the advisability of doing away with the celibacy of the clergy, and, although they have not pronounced definitely upon this matter, they have, without protest, permitted one of their priests to marry. At this marriage the incumbent of the Jansenist parish of Gravenhage assisted. This worthy is at the same time professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Jansenist seminary, and has lately been promoted to the dignity of Canon of the Diocese of Utrecht. We Catholics in Holland hear very little about the Jansenists. It is only occasions like that of the Mathew case that bring them into prominence.

Who is this Mathew? Thanks to a sort of public confession which he has made in the Oud Katholiek, which is the official journal of the Jansenists, I can give the following reply to this question. He was ordained a secular priest in 1877. In the following year he entered the novitiate of the Dominicans, and left in 1879. After that he was employed in four different dioceses in England. In 1889 he gave evidence of loss of faith, and in 1890 he went to Paris to consult Father Loyson, who told him that he ought to distinguish between Papalism and Catholicism. With this luminous revelation Mathew returned to England and joined the Ritualists, but he never subscribed to the thirty-nine articles of the English Church. In 1892 he took a wife, and in 1908 he asked Gul, the Jansenist Archbishop of Utrecht, to bestow on him episcopal consecration. According to the joint pronouncement of the Jansenist Archbishop and Bishops of the 9th of April, 1908, he based his request on the declaration that he already had in England nine different Old Catholic societies, directed by twenty priests. It is unnecessary to state that this is a gross exaggeration; but whatever may be the case, Gul declared that he was inclined to consecrate him bishop, and stated that he would do so on the 8th of April, 1908.

The day before the ceremony an unexpected difficulty presented itself. The bishops heard from one of their friends that Mathew was married, a fact which he had not revealed to Gul, who thereupon refused to consecrate him before he had consulted with the other Jansenist Bishops. The result was that they came together and decided that marriage was not an obstacle to episcopal consecration, and accordingly, on the 20th of April, 1908, Mathew was made a bishop in the City of Utrecht. Naturally, there was a great deal of good feeling between the parties to this affair, but soon the Jansenist bishops began to perceive that Mathew was not altogether of their way of thinking. They had hoped, and perhaps had stipulated, that he was to enter into hierarchial relations with the Church of Holland, but to their great surprise and indignation they learned last year that, on the 13th of June, 1910, he had secretly conferred episcopal consecration on Herbert Ignatius Beale, pastor of the Church of St. Edward in Nottingham, and on Arthur Howarth, pastor at Corby in Grantham, although they both declared formally that they wanted to remain Catholics.

The Holland Jansenists protested, saying that Mathew was acting contrary to his promise at Utrecht: First, in consecrating bishops without giving notice to his Dutch confrères; secondly, in consecrating them secretly and alone; thirdly, in consecrating as bishops men who belonged, or pretended to belong, to another church, viz., the Catholic Church. Moreover, they said that he was not permitted to consecrate as bishops those who had not yet been admitted into the Church.

These protests were published in the Oud Katholiek, and a short time after Mathew, who had never signed the Utrecht convention, came out with a declaration in which he separated himself completely from his friends in Holland, and announced himself as the independent head of the Western Orthodox Catholic Church in Great Britain and Ireland. He gave as a reason for this proclamation that the Jansenist Church of Utrecht was altogether degenerate, and to prove it he quoted several points of doctrine, such as I have mentioned above.

Thus, for example, he says that the Church of Utrecht does not admit the existence of the seven Sacraments, denies the Communion of Saints, and does not permit the worship or veneration of relics, including those of the Blessed Virgin. I do not know if these accusations have any foundation. Mathew himself adds in his declaration that he has often discussed the question in the Oud Katholiek, and that his adversaries had admitted that the degeneration had reached the depths, such as he describes them, in the Church of Utrecht. On this account he declared himself independent, and maintains that, with his flock, he forms a branch of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, but is not in any way dependent upon any foreign ecclesiastical power. Hence, he disclaims any associations with the Old Catholics who exist in foreign parts, and denies their right to exact any submission from him.

To complete the measure of his iniquities, he is impudent enough to insult the Catholic Church of England and Holland by saying that the latter, founded by St. Wilbrord and St. Boniface, was originally the Old Catholic Church, and that the Jansenist Archbishop of Utrecht, who conferred episcopal consecration upon him, was the pastor of a small remnant of the ancient Church of England, which is now perpetuated in Holland. It is clear from all this that the Pope was right in excommunicating this schismatic. According to the latest information of the Holland papers, Mathew was living with his wife in a village near London. His followers, who seem to be few in number, are scattered somewhere in the neighborhood.

BATAVUS.

A Navy for Australia.

SYDNEY, MARCH 14, 1911.

The press has given to the public the report which Admiral Sir Reginald Henderson has, at the request of the Minister of Defence, drawn up on the important subject of the Australian navy. He recommends the creation of a fleet of 52 vessels, namely, 8 armored cruisers, 10 protected cruisers, 18 destroyers, 12 submarines, 3 depot ships, and 1 fleet repair ship.

The primary object, he says, of an Australian navy, should be the immediate support of the rest of the empire's naval forces, as, once the command of the sea is lost by the empire, no local system of defence could secure Australia. The secondary object must be the protection of ports and shipping from a hostile fleet. The report goes on to say that the fleet should be divided into two divisions, eastern and western, of about equal strength.

Such is the scheme put forward by Admiral Henderson for the defence of Australia. It is certainly both ambitious and costly.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Violating the Seal of Confession

An unspeakable individual in Rome named Verdesi has recently added to his other offenses—and they are many—by accusing Father Bricarelli, S.J., of divulging the secret of the confessional. Five Italian newspapers hastened to herald the welcome news to the world. Of course there is no truth in this outrageous charge. The facts are as follows:

Verdesi was originally a pupil of the Apostolic School, at St. Paul's Outside-the-Walls. From there he went to the Benedictines and became a monk. One day he was missing from his cell, and after some time was found in the now unhappily famous Methodist refuge for sinners, whose chief occupation consists in exploiting people of the Verdesi stripe. Men of the world will say it was a pity he was not left there, but he was persuaded to withdraw, and was then received into the Roman Seminary of the Apollinare to study theology, and was finally ordained a priest.

Here most churchmen, if not all, will gasp for breath. It is nothing less than amazing that such a wretch should be advanced to the priesthood, who not only was a fugitive from his monastery, thereby incurring excommunication ipso facto, but who posted off to the Methodist clique that makes a trade of debauching the faith of unfortunates like himself, who are drifting around the cities of Italy, and who will do anything and say anything for shelter or pay. It matters not how many tears he may have shed or how effusively and dramatically he may have protested his absolute repentance, it is simply inconceivable that an unwise pity for the miserable man's soul should have caused his patrons to forget the rights of Holy Church in this instance. The results have shown the folly of their action.

Verdesi was ordained in 1907. In 1908 he came to see Bricarelli, and in the course of a conversation, which was not at all understood to be confession by either one or the other, it came out that he had been in the habit of attended meetings of Modernists which were held in the city. When told that delinquents in this matter were obliged to inform the authorities of the fact, Verdesi made out a written statement, but to avoid being known, asked Bricarelli not to send the original paper, but a copy of it. This was done—Bricarelli, fortunately, keeping the original.

Two and a half years passed by, during which time scandal was busy with Verdesi's name, when suddenly the accusation appeared in the papers that Father Bricarelli had broken the seal of confession by betraying his penitent to the ecclesiastical authorities. It is needless to repeat what we have said, that there was no question of confession at all in the whole affair. The vile charge is merely the act of a bad priest to besmirch the Church, to do harm to souls, to stab the reputation of Father Bricarelli, who had for years befriended him, and to get money from his Methodist friends.

The case has been brought to court. The five foremost lawyers of Italy have been engaged to prosecute Verdesi, and when he is disposed of and sent to jail, then the papers which published the slander will be sued for libel. Meantime, Verdesi's family is disowning him, the Church is bowed down with sorrow and shame over the infamous life and apostacy of one of its priests, and the Methodists of Rome are exulting in their success in preaching what they call the Gospel.

The Queen and the Pope

The Queen of Holland seems also to be the Queen of Hearts. Her exquisite womanly tact, her strength of character and her wisdom in the administration of the affairs of her vigorous and prosperous little kingdom are constantly in evidence. An instance is at hand in the difficult matter of felicitating the King of Italy, on the Fiftieth Anniversary of Italian Unity. In doing so she has shown more delicate diplomacy than perhaps any of the other sovereigns. She pleased Victor Emmanuel, but at the same time she framed her words of congratulation so deftly as not to hurt in the least the sensibilities of her devoted Catholic subjects.

The diplomatic usage of the Low Countries requires that on such occasions a number of dignitaries selected from the court, or the army, or the civil service should be sent to convey the royal message. She selected three Protestant gentlemen of the court, knowing instinctively that a Catholic would have felt very uncomfortable on such a mission, and that his fellow-Catholics would have watched him with anxious concern, whereas this courteous arrangement makes them feel that the embassy is more of a personal delegation of the Queen herself than a national representation.

It has not escaped the notice of the world also, that this royal act coincides with a renewal of diplomatic relations with the Vatican by the reestablishment of a Papal Internunciature at The Hague. It would have been a Nunciature had not circumstances made that impossible.

It will be remembered that when the First Peace Congress was convened at The Hague in 1899, Italy intrigued to prevent the Pope from being represented in it. Holland protested against the exclusion, but was overruled by Russia. The result was that Leo XIII withdrew his Internuncio, who was then at The Hague, and the office was handed over to a Chargé d'Affaires.

When the Second Peace Congress was held the exclusion of the Pope was still maintained; but now, just as Italy is celebrating its Jubilee, the Internunciature is reestablished. Naturally the question immediately suggests itself: what will happen if the Pope is not invited to the Third Peace Congress? Will there be another rupture of diplomatic relations? That contingency has been skilfully provided for. The Nuncio of Brussels will be the Internuncio at The Hague. The reason of this apparently verbal distinction is, that were he Nuncio at The Hague, as well as at Brussels, he would outrank all the other ambassadors, which, of course, would be resented by the Protestants of Holland, who make up two-thirds of the population. Hence, he will continue to reside in Brussels, but will be represented in Holland, not by a Chargé d'Affaires, but by a Chancellor or Auditor. Thus diplomatic entanglements will be forestalled. Nothing is sure, of course, but it is possible that an attempt may be made to have the Pope represented at the Congress.

The outlook is so encouraging that the Catholics of Holland are looking hopefully towards the reestablishment of the Dutch Legation at the Vatican, which was abolished in 1874. In any case the beloved Queen can be sure that she has not only a still greater claim than heretofore on the affectionate loyalty of her Catholic subjects, but has won for herself the admiration and gratitude of Catholics all the world over.

Something to be Done

What dull, apathetic, unprogressive, unenterprising people we American Catholics are, in some things at least! In one respect especially it is very noticeable; namely, in our attitude to Catholic literature. We are building churches, of course, with feverish haste and lavish expenditure, but a certain great Cardinal does not hesitate to make the startling announcement that it is just as necessary to support a Catholic newspaper as to build a church. We are spending millions on schools that vie in the splendor of their equipment with those that public money pays for, but Pope Pius himself warns us that it is useless to build Catholic schools if we do not accustom the pupils who frequent them, and the parents who patronize them, to take pleasure in Catholic reading. We are preaching missions against sin, but the daily papers reeking with sin litter our houses. In brief, we are erecting magnificent monuments to Catholicity in stone, and filling our ears with countless exhortations to virtue, but, as Archbishop Ireland puts it in his forceful fashion, we are losing our Catholic intelligence and heart.

But Catholic newspapers are so dull and uninteresting! They are indeed for those who prefer the pictures of actresses and the records of divorce courts. They are not on our literary level! That also is true for those who never read anything but the trash of popular magazines, or the coarsest and most vulgar of papers. We cannot afford them, is another excuse. Yet the poorest among us find means for the daily paper and the Sunday supplement, and very few, either rich or poor, have ever seen the publications that would instruct them in what is most essential to know.

We are continually patting ourselves on the back for the thoroughbred Catholicity of the United States. Some things, no doubt, we do fairly well, but in this particular we might well take a hint from our friends the Europeans. Thus, for instance, there is one country with only 22,000,000 Catholics, where they sell a million of Catholic pamphlets every year. Or if we prefer to take Great Britain and Ireland as an example we shall find that although they have only about 6,000,000 Catholics, yet since they have begun to organize in behalf of Catholic literature they have sold a million and a quarter copies of a devotional series, 868,000 of a book of meditations, 1,700,000 copies of a simple prayer book, 900,000 pamphlets dealing with Protestant misstatements, 389,000 discussing the various aspects of the Anglican controversy, 2,500,000 Catholic story books, 1,879,000 of a biographical series, 100,000 of a religious and scientific series, to say nothing of pamphlets dealing with Art, Music, Education, History and social questions.

Have we anything like that to show in the United States, with our 15,000,000 Catholics? There is only one instance that we know of, and that is the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, which publishes over 150,000 copies a month. Its June issue runs up to 160,000 copies. It has the organization of the League behind it, and that explains its success. Why cannot something similar be attempted for other publications?

The French Turk

On his recent visit to Algiers, M. Fallières, the President of the French Republic, received with the greatest kindness and courtesy a very large deputation of the official representatives of Mohammedanism. They filed before him, reciting prayers, swinging censers and performing the various ceremonies that are prescribed by the Moslem ritual. Fallières was charmed. He was all graciousness to them, and not only assured them of the protection of their worship and his unwillingness to hurt in any way their religious sensibilities, but went down into his pocket and presented them with a check of a thousand francs for the maintenance of their schools, in which, it goes without saying, not the Gospel, but the Koran, is taught.

It is this same curiously constructed individual who, on leaving France, chose Easter Sunday for the moment of his departure, to show his contempt for the day. Everyone, of course, had to dance attendance on him; the harbor of Toulon was filled with ships to give him a proper send off, and the great church festival was ostentatiously and offensively ignored. Less kind to his own countrymen than to the unspeakable Turk, he puts a ban on the smallest Catholic procession in France, and instead of contributing anything to support the schools, where Christian morality would be taught to the young rascals of the cities and towns, he seizes the buildings, turns out the teachers, puts up the property at auction and pockets the proceeds for the Government. After destroying the Church of France, he sends detectives out to discover if there may be anywhere two or three of these old monks, or friars, or nuns, who are clubbing together to stave off starvation, and gives orders to clap them in jail if they dare to defy the law which he and his friends have formulated.

Someone suggests that if these unhappy French citizens, who are hunted like wild beasts in their own country, would tell the policeman who comes to arrest them that they are Mussulmans, M. Fallières might be tempted to send them a thousand francs to start their schools again. Thus have things changed since King Louis of France set out to conquer the Moslems. The successor of St. Louis has become a Turk, and if he is logical he might try to convert Notre Dame into a mosque. It was put to a worse use before.

Juvenile Depravity Again

A New York newspaper presumed recently to criticise sharply a judge of the Criminal Court of the metropolis for certain views which the latter had expressed when interviewed regarding the "crime wave" lately sweeping over our city. AMERICA, of course, holds no brief for Judge O'Sullivan, who, no doubt, will himself say whatever he deems necessary in reply to the criticism. One may remark, though, that certain insinuations against the Judge, because of his frank comments on the American public school system, drawn one may suppose from his rich experience in dealing with results of the crime wave, come with exceedingly poor grace from an editorial writer who is wont to spare neither high nor low in his own criticisms of existing conditions.

However, there occur in the article referred to certain cocksure statements, glibly and sweepingly affirmed, that ought not to be permitted to pass without question. When the writer states, for example, that "the public schools in America are the best schools in the world, and they have given the best results in the world," he is simply pitifully begging the question. Those of us who assert the need of religious training in our public schools, and who claim that the failure to emphasize the child's responsibility to God, is responsible for the growth of juvenile depravity, bluntly deny the writer's boastful claim. Excellent though our public schools may be in the mental training they provide, they are, as schools, lamentable failures so long as character formation is not a detail of their program. Unless reverence be the result of education—reverence for God and the truths and commands and ways of God, as well as reverence for all forms of authority, parental, civil and ecclesiastical, character formation is unthinkable and education is worse than a failure. It is an unparalleled misfortune. But to fashion the minds of the young to habits of reverence conscience must be educated, since the reverence of conscience is the norm and exemplar of all reverence. Conscience cannot be educated without teaching morality. Morality cannot be taught unless explicit religious instruction is a part of the curriculum of the school. There is no more possibility of teaching moral obligation without teaching the existence of a supreme legislator than there is of teaching the duty of filial love without admitting the fact of a father.

When we affirm this we do not mean to permit the Judge's critic to cloud the issue. We do not contend that in our republic it shall be "for public school teachers to say what a child shall believe, what its idea of God shall be, or what religion it shall adopt." There is another way out of the critic's dilemma. They who insist upon the religious education of their children ask merely that the stupendous sums, drawn by the state from the taxation of all the people for educational purposes, shall be so used that the just demands of all the people shall be heeded. Mr. Balfour, the distinguished leader of the English Conservative party, recently expressed the idea of those favoring religion in education in that land, and we in America can cordially accept his proposal. "We are all persuaded that the State, which seeks by its legislation to effect a divorce between religion and the elementary teaching of children, is following the worst conceivable policy for the service of future generations. Let us then frankly face the situation, recognizing, as we must, the insistent demands of parents for the Christian education of their children, let us map out a public school program in which the legitimate claims of parents will be acceded to, and provision will be made to render possible religious instruction at the expense of the State." This, be it said, is the sole solution that appeals to one as strictly compatible with the true idea of religious liberty, of parental responsibility, and of the primordial necessity of religious training in children's education. Any other course spells religious oppression of the vast Christian body among us, in favor of those who are not Christian.

Nor do we claim that religious instruction will at once and forever do away with crime in the land. Unfortunately human nature is frail, and even at its best it will never be impeccable. One does not contend that proper living in times of pestilence will absolutely ensure the individuals of a community against its ravages. Yet one does not, therefore, neglect to use the safeguards of proper living. A Christian education will not save from crime the individual who uses his freedom deliberately to reject in his conduct the principles of moral living that education imparts; still it were an unspeakable offence against logic to conclude thence that a Christian education is worthless. If, even under its influence moral rectitude and upright citizenship be difficult to attain, what shall be our state when its wholesome safeguarding is eliminated from our lives?

Britain's New Civil Pension Bill

England's Chancellor, Mr. Lloyd-George, early this month launched his projected civil service bill for the sick and unemployed of the British Isles. Despite the repeated rumors of his physical breakdown, bandied about after the last elections, he made, we are told, an excellent speech introducing the measure. It lasted nearly two and one-half hours, and is admitted by everybody to have been the most daring advance toward social revolution in England ever proposed in Parliament. His scheme overshadows everything else in politics, and stands out as the greatest thing in English political life to-day. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, in his correspondence, speaks of the amazement with which the Chancellor's insurance proposals fills the Britons. "The gigantic size," he says, "the daring conception and the thorough and exhaustive machinery of the scheme come with a crashing surprise, even on a public prepared by preliminary announcements for weeks for the proposal."

It is too early yet, without the text of the bill, to analyze it in detail, but one can easily deduce from Lloyd-George's speech that the measure implies a tax laid upon him who has for the benefit of him who has not. And the tax will be a huge one,—huge, one may venture to predict, beyond the tentative estimates of the author of the bill. One needs but recall that the original estimate made by the Chancellor of the expenditure under his old age pension act was $30,000,000 a year, and that it already involves an outlay of $65,000,000, and still is rising.

Perhaps the apparently unanimous chorus of praise with which, remarkable to say, the measure is received is due to political expediency rather than to political economy,—the beneficiaries of the proposed pension list are all powerful at the polls. So far, as cable messages to the press declare, no man, even among the Conservatives, seems possessed of the nerve or inclination to challenge the proposal. Probably enough, another story will be told when the details of the plan begin to be discussed. John Bull has long been known to have rather fixed notions regarding property rights; and there will be not a few, we venture to predict, who will assail the measure on the plea that thrift has some rights for protection against what must eventually come to appear to many a premium on idleness and irresponsibility.

The Cardinal's Reminder

The need to-day of Catholic men and women who will courageously and intelligently, in public and in private, stand for Catholic faith and Catholic practice must be evident to any one who walks with his eyes open. A world that is dangerously close to a lapse into materialism must be taught the worth of the supernatural; a world that sacrifices everything in its unreasoning rush after ease and comfort and pleasure must be shown the worth of principle and integrity; a world that is slipping away from its Christian moorings and drifting out upon the uncharted seas of indifference and religious unrest needs to have evidence of the peace and vigorous strength that belong to them who abide within the shadow of the immovable rock of the Church.

No wonder that Cardinal Gibbons emphasized the opportunity facing the Catholic layman to-day, whilst expressing his deep gratification at the splendid reception arranged for him last week by the Catholic Club of New York. His Eminence is ever wont to show a keen sense of the fit word to be spoken, and the representative body of the Catholic laity that night greeting the great prelate of Baltimore should find excellent inspiration in the reminder he addressed to them: "A zealous and enlightened laity is the glory of the Christian Church. The most luminous periods of the Church's history have been epochs conspicuous for laymen who have vindicated the cause of Christianity by the eloquence of their writings or by the splendid sanctity of their lives."

Since the acknowledgment of Mexican independence in 1821, fifty-four different men have been nominally at the head of affairs in Mexico. Thirty-one of these were generals, ten were lawyers, eight were private individuals, and five were ecclesiastics. The shortest term was that of President José María Bocanegra, who ruled for only five days, but seven others did not last for an entire month. Of the whole number, twenty-nine reached the end of their tether in less than a year. Almost half the period has been taken up by Benito Juárez, who ruled and reigned for fourteen years, five months and eleven days, and Porfirio Díaz, who is now in the third month of the thirtieth year of his administration. General Santa Ana, whose name was identified with Mexican politics for so many years, was President for less than five years. Four of the ecclesiastics were bishops, the most distinguished being Pelagio Antonio de Labastida y Dávalos, who died Archbishop of Mexico. The Mexican Constitution now excludes ecclesiastics from the presidential office.

LITERATURE

The Clouds Around Shakespeare. By Rev. GEORGE O'NEILL, S.J. Dublin: E. Ponsonby. 20 cents.

The purpose of this well written booklet is not to disperse the clouds, but so to mass them together and deepen their color that Shakespeare will vanish from view. The plea is dignified, able, and often eloquent, but, in spite of evident sincerity, more specious than convincing. The point most vigorously urged in disproof of Shakespeare's authorship is the poet's accurate knowledge of legal phraseology, but when his character has to be assailed, we are told he was continually engaged in lawsuits, and even kept a lawyer in his house. He had, then, rare opportunities to learn much about law. The objection that a man so keen on money making as Shakespeare is alleged to have been would have published his plays is also easily met. Poetry was not lucrative in those days—even later Milton got but £5 for Paradise Lost—and publication of the plays would have deprived Shakespeare of the exclusive rights of his theatre to produce them. The main argument, that the Stratford rustic and London actor-manager could not have acquired the varied learning and finished workmanship manifested in his reputed works, and that the sentiments in the plays are nobler than his character, would prove much literature spurious and overlook the power, creative and acquisitive, of genius. There was a poet in Father O'Neill's city of Dublin who, without teachers or familiar intercourse with literary men, acquired intimate knowledge of several languages and of general literature, and a mastery of the English tongue that enabled him to give exquisite expression to noble thoughts and enshrine in pictured verse the spirit of peoples of whose languages he was ignorant. His habits, too, were out of harmony with his works. A priori it would be easy to prove that Mangan's poems were not written by Mangan. In a previous pamphlet: "Could Bacon have written the Plays?" the author essayed to prove that Bacon could; the way is now open for direct proof that he did. We fear it will be "love's labor lost," if not "much ado about nothing."

M. K.

Who Are the Jesuits? By the Rev. CHARLES COPPENS, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price 50 cents.

The numerous books that have come from the tireless pen of Father Coppens are distinguished in a striking degree by two excellent qualities, timeliness and condensed and lucid precision. His latest work, undertaking to answer the question proposed on its title-page, "Who are the Jesuits?" displays to a marked extent these admirable characteristics. One is often met nowadays with the query: "Where can I find some brief and reliable book on the Jesuits?" The inquiry has not been easy to satisfy. While numerous works exist which treat of one or another side of Jesuit activity, there is in English, we believe, only one which endeavors to give a comprehensive history of the Society of Jesus in a readily available compass. We refer to the "Jesuits, Their Foundation and History," by B. N. This most readable narrative, following in the footsteps of the French history by Crétineau-Joly, was issued in two volumes; and, even if its length were not forbidding to many casual inquirers about the Jesuits, the fact that it has long been out of print makes it somewhat rare and not easily obtainable.

For this reason there can be no doubt that "Who Are the Jesuits?" has the merit of being opportune. That, however, important though it be, is an extraneous and accidental recommendation only; a more valuable asset, so far as author and reader are concerned, is the little volume's singularly skilful condensation of salient facts and essential explanations. In treating the history and life of the Jesuits, and the vast literature of calumny that has been written against them, the author has exercised extraordinary power of analysis and selection. We have here in the small space of a hundred pages a clear, straightforward and interesting account of the origin, aims, achievements, trials, persecutions, and present condition of Jesuits, with a closing chapter dealing with the principal slanders against them, and a bibliographical appendix of books and articles in English, to which the reader may refer for more detailed information. In the chapter on slanders we have not only the old answers to the old lies about the Monita Secreta, the "Jesuit Oath," and the end justifying the means, but also neat and adequate paragraphs on such popular fallacies as that the Jesuits are rich, are a body of ambitious men, are perniciously active in politics, and are too independent of hierarchical control.

Father Coppens's little book is principally and, in view of its dimensions, necessarily one of information rather than apologetics. Still, it contains in essence the best possible answer to all the malicious attacks against the Society of Jesus. It gives the end and scope of the Society as discernible in its founder's purpose, its rules and constitutions, and in the vows which its members make. If individuals here and there in the Society during its eventful history have put mei for Dei in the motto, Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam, which formulates briefly the spirit of the Society, if they have so far forgot themselves as to jockey for position and yield to pride of place in the Society itself or beyond its frontiers, seeking personal kudos at the expense of the Society's good name and of the Church's mission, they have done so in the despite of their training, their profession, their vows and the explicit prohibition of their rules and their superiors, and consequently have acted not as Jesuits. They have yielded to that illegitimate individualism which in general is so admired by the class of writers who affect to be scandalized by its very exceptional appearance in the history of the Jesuits.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Alarms and Discursions. By GILBERT K. CHESTERTON. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Mr. Chesterton has been living in the country. He has taken unto himself a rustic and meditative seat in —shire, a yellow-brick country-seat, he tells us, of the architecture of year before last. There he has been dwelling in rural quietness and country peace. Every week—one reads between the lines—the sharp, insistent call for "copy" reaches his ears from afar, and he starts incontinent from cheerful ponderings on fields and marshes and meadows, to spin a cunning web of entertaining discourse for the Saturday columns of the Daily News. Thence, in the main, has been gathered this sheaf of pleasant essays, so the breath and the imagery of the country are everywhere on its pages. "I was walking the other day in a kitchen garden," is the agreeable and fitting prelude to his somewhat gargantuan reflections upon "The Appetite of Earth." The roses in his flower-garden give him occasion for some thoughts upon "The Wrath of the Roses." Again, he tells us, of an essay about a half-built house upon his private horizon, that he "wrote it, sitting in a garden-chair."

These may seem trivial and slight details, whereby to characterize a whole series of papers; yet to those who know their Chesterton, they hint very well the atmosphere and color of this book. The high vivacity and bouncing courage of attack which make his former volumes at once effective and amusing, are tempered and subdued to a less personal strain. Our author is deep in the fields and the woods, and his antagonists are all afar. London itself, with its fogs, bodily and of the mind, its clang of traffic and of disputation, its clatter of wheels and of tongues, rises only as a fond and distant memory, a foil and contrast to the bucolic peace.

Of course, neither the dominant subjects nor the trend of thought which we have come to look for in Mr. Chesterton's reflections are missing here. Religion and Philosophy still enter largely into his musings, but they enter in a country dress. The cool and friendly face of Nature stirs his chivalric spirit to fewer knightly onslaughts, nor can the too-distant challenge of the presumptuous sages move him so easily to wander Londonwards in search of wars. He yields more often to the spell of mild discursiveness; he drops his charger's rein upon the neck betimes, and lets him crop the clover.

We do not mean, to be sure, that anyone should imagine that all is rural and bucolic here. Some essays sound the old familiar strains, some passages still provoke to martial glee. The Chesterton we have known is there, though in a changed environment. Mirth and paradox and surprise, balance and antithesis, a warmth and color of words, a wealth of imagination, no need to say that these still haunt his pages. Nor has his view-point nor his teaching varied. The glory of adventure and romance, the strangeness of the usual, the wonder of the commonplace, the praise of the good times gone by, and a noble scorn of snobbish and smug modernity, ring out in his sayings as of yore. Politics, too, and economics are touched on here and there, and he has a whip for greedy capitalists and selfish landlords, and swings it vigorously when he meets them by the way.

In conclusion it is interesting that certain passages in these essays remind one rather strongly of the manner of the author's bosom friend, Mr. Hilaire Belloc. Very possibly it is the adventurous and descriptive strain which we have come to associate with the latter writer. EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

Die Geschichte der Weltliteratur, VI Band, Die italienische Literatur. VON ALEXANDER BAUMGARTNER, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder, $5.15 net.

The sixth volume of the History of the World's Literature, by Father Baumgartner, S.J., deals with the verse and prose of Italy. It is the last work from the pen of the great critic. Shortly before his death he had reviewed the proofs of his chapter on Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," and to a fellow religious, who entered his room, he quietly quoted the passage from a letter of the poet: "What will my dear Antonio say when he hears that his Tasso has died? and according to my thinking the news is not long to be expected." It was the last interest he was to show in his monumental work, which, as a history of universal literature, remains without an equal in any language.

Death has left the last portion of the present volume slightly incomplete. Nothing essential, however, is wanting, although we miss the intended summary of modern Catholic writers and the "Dante Redivivus," which latter chapter was to have dealt with the Dante revival and the Dante literature of our day. Here, if anywhere, there is need of an Ariadne thread, such as the great poet-critic could best have put into our hands, to guide us safely through this modern labyrinth.

The volume before us shows no abatement of the author's powers. The same critical insight, the same profound and scholarly research, the same clearness and felicity of language which characterized his previous volumes are equally conspicuous here. His practised hand seems never to have grown weary in detailing with the utmost patience and fidelity the countless uninspiring minutiae which a work of this nature demands, while his genius expanded as ever when brought into contact with the world's supreme achievements in the realm of letters.

All periods receive from him the same careful and intelligent treatment. Readers whose predilection leads them to the classic age of the Italian renaissance will find here masterly treatises upon Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, Tasso and others whose names are familiar upon the lips of all. Those whose interests incline them to the study of earlier poets will follow with pleasure the descriptions of the gentle Saint of Assisi and of the eccentric but brilliant career of his poet-son, Jacopone da Todì. For such, however, as cast their eyes upon the present age, there is interest sufficient in the closing chapters, perhaps the most vivid of all, and written in words that come forth flaming from the author's soul. They describe for us the wantonness and Satan-worship of Carducci; the unholy fire glowing in the verses of Gabriele d'Annunzio, whose angel wings are sadly trailed through every pool and mire; and, finally, the self-commissioned spirit of reform within the Church of God which animates the author of "Il Santo," who dubs himself "Knight of the Holy Spirit" in the same moment that he boasts of fighting side by side with Heine and that modern Table Round whose Knights are Victor Hugo, Darwin, Spencer and even, as we at length come to find, Zola the unspeakable. There is, however, in the soul of the priestly critic, no least suggestion of prudery or severity, no more than there is ever question of compromise or quarter where the call is sounded for the defence of the eternal verities against the assaults of error and immorality.

Of the figures that most rivet our attention in modern Italy, the most conspicuous is that of Alessandro Manzoni. Amid all the Babel of voices that fill these latter days the echoes of the magnificent "Hymns" of this elder poet seem ever to be ringing in the author's ears. We acquire something of his own enthusiasm as we follow him in his stirring account of the transformation of the reckless Voltarian and Parisian Encyclopedist into the chaste romancer of the "Promessi Sposi," who struck from his masterpiece the lines which he considered the most artistic, because he feared they might prove offensive to innocence and purity.

We have, therefore, in the present volume a contribution which worthily takes its place in the memorable series which Father Baumgartner has now left to the world. The four remaining volumes, as planned by him, are already under preparation by fellow members of his order, while a supplement to his own portion of the work is to be offered in a collection of monograph studies, published at various times, and dealing with the national literature whose history he has not lived to trace more comprehensively with his own master hand.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Chistes y Verdades. Por BERNARDO GENTILINI. Segunda Edición Corregida y Aumentada. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, 70 cents, net.

"Mamma, how do wars begin?" The speaker was a little Chilean boy, whose mother was preparing a meal while his father looked on complacently.

"Suppose," answered the mother, "that some Argentines should make some Chileans strike their flag. . . ."

"But, my dear," broke in the father, "the Argentines would never do such a thing."

"Excuse me, but they might do it."

"Who ever heard of such a thing?"

"Be kind enough not to interrupt me."

"See here, madam, you are putting wrong notions into the child's head."

"Don't you 'madam' me."

"I'll do as I see fit."

"You are a low fellow."

"You are a coarse woman."

"Now I know," said the boy, as he made his escape through the back door.

Then the author gives a few wholesome words of advice for peace and quiet in the family. Nearly three hundred little stories, some of which we remember that we saw under the spreading chestnut tree befo' the wah, enliven the pages and drive home lessons as only stories can. One at a time, all the various duties of a Catholic are taken up, illustrated and explained in a way to instruct any reader of Spanish. Without doing much violence to the title it might be rendered, "Jokes in Sober Earnest."

* * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

- The Clouds Around Shakespeare. By Rev. George O'Neill, S.J., M.A. Dublin: E. Ponsonby.
- Down Our Street. By J. E. Buckrose. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Net $1.35.
- The Claw. A Story of South Africa. By Cynthia Stockley. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Net $1.35.
- A Room With a View. By E. M. Forster. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Net $1.35.
- The Juniors of St. Bede's. A Preparatory School Story. By Rev. Thomas H. Bryson. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 85 cents.
- Ecclesiastical Chants. In Accordance with the Vatican Edition. Collected and Annotated for the Use of Clerics. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 35 cents.
- The Eucharistic Liturgy in the Roman Rite. Its History and Symbolism. Adapted from the Italian of Rev. Giovanni Semeria. By Rev. E. S. Berry. Illustrated. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net $1.50.
- Jesus, the Bread of Children. Chats with Father Cyril about Holy Communion. By F. M. Zulueta, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 35 cents.
- Elementary Lessons on the Holy Eucharist. By Dom Lambert Nolle, O.S.B. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 45 cents per dozen.
- The Purple East. Notes of Travel. By the Rev. J. J. Malone, P.P. Melbourne: W. P. Linehan, 309 Little Collins St. Net 3s. 6d.
- Doctrine Explanations; the Commandments. Part 1. New York: Benziger Brothers.
- Society of St. Vincent de Paul. Sixteenth Annual Report of the Central Council of Philadelphia. Year Ending December 31st, 1910. New York: Superior Council, 375 Lafayette Street.

Latin Publication:

- Processionale Romanum. Sive Ordo Sacramum Processionum. Ex Rituali Romano Depromptus. Accedit Appendix, quae Benedictiones cum Processionibus Conjunctas, aliaque similia ex Missali et Pontificali Romano extracta, continet. Editio Quinta. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 55 cents.

EDUCATION

An editorial in the New York Times (May 7) confesses that for those who seek through hard work to attain a really thorough training in the art of thinking and study, which is, essentially, education, "the present provision in the United States is pitifully inadequate." Because of their misguided eagerness to specialize and to do vocational work rather than to seek thorough culture, the writer affirms his belief that our colleges have retrograded during the past fifty years. Before the civil war college students, it says, generally were confined to those who were seeking to enter one of the three professions then recognized. For these general culture in a limited course was deemed sufficient, and usually proved so. But the saving condition in the relatively modest institutions of those days was that nearly all the students went through the college at substantial cost and sacrifice to themselves and their families, and were disposed to work hard to make the most of what was a real privilege.

The occasion of the editorial in the Times is the announcement of a new form of college described in a recent issue of the Independent. In it the number of students will be strictly limited; only the most promising among applicants will be selected; the high standard set at entrance will be rigidly maintained, and the resources of the college will be devoted not to buildings and grounds and "expansion" generally, but to securing enough pay to professors to get the very best in their several lines. In other words the "new college" is to be organized to give the best culture by the best teachers to young men best adapted to take it and most eager and efficient in pursuit of it.

With the Times writer we cordially agree that this "is in the right line." But we question whether the proposal made will result in any radical betterment in college conditions as they are to-day. The lack in our country just now is not one of institutions in which there exists an influence potent for broad general culture, in opposition to training that shall serve as preparation for any special vocation. Most of our so-called "small colleges" are capable of doing just this work quite as well as it was done in the days before the civil war. But there is lacking what the Times writer terms the "saving condition" of the old days. The lust of money and the resolve to prepare themselves to enter as speedily as possible the avocations in which that lust may be satisfied have driven out of the minds of students the old eagerness to work hard in the tiresome way that leads to general culture. Our stupendously endowed state universities, encroaching as they do by their system of specialization on the real territory of the college, are largely responsible for the decadent spirit which the "new college" would strive to correct. Let these and other professional and technical schools insist that students matriculating in them have, as in the old days, a testimonial of completed work in the old four year course of general college work, and the interests of true and broad scholarship will be amply conserved.

Men to-day are so incessantly occupied with the world's achievements in material things that the presentation of principles, unfortunately, claims little more than a passing attention. The recent controversy in Wisconsin in which Catholics and Lutherans united to defeat legislation intended to introduce free text-books into public schools offers us an illuminating illustration of this. Nowhere, probably, in the United States, are the Socialists making so intensive a campaign to spread their propaganda as in Wisconsin, and yet, with eyes wide open, many of the citizens of that State, entirely untainted by Socialistic principles, were pressing in their demands for the enactment of the free text-book law. Did they not see it involved a kind of state paternalism which will lead logically to the most absurd demands of the most advanced socialism? Unless one is willing to run into the Utopia of the full-fledged socialistic state, it is imperative that there be drawn a clear and definite line between state enterprise and the private and individual activity of its citizens. Archbishop Messmer, whose splendid letter to his people formed a notable contribution to the controversy, very lucidly drew this line. His conclusion is well worth reproduction, containing as it does a repetition of the sound principle of political economy, to which men to-day ought to pay more respectful consideration. "There is absolutely no need for free text-books, just as little as there is any for free meals or free transportation. It is a false and dangerous policy," says the archbishop, "for the State to assume, without urgent necessity the duties essentially inherent in the parents and in the family, as long as these are well able to comply with them by their own personal efforts."

* * *

Continuing, his Grace of Milwaukee makes an appeal to the sense of fair-play supposed to be characteristic of Americans; a plea, it may be noted, which ought to avail in other phases of the school question as well. "Now, when Catholic and Lutheran citizens of Wisconsin, because of their religious convictions and for the sake of bringing up a Christian generation and people in our State, make one year after another the tremendous sacrifice of fully three million dollars, while at the same time they pay their full share of taxation for the public schools, are they to be still more heavily taxed just in order to furnish the public schools with free text-books? Are we to be compelled to make still greater sacrifices for our schools by furnishing our pupils also with free text-books,—a necessary consequence if the proposed measure passes the legislature? Do the 541,000 Catholics and the 216,000 Lutherans of Wisconsin deserve no consideration in this matter on the part of their fellow-citizens of other denominations?"

The seventh annual report of the condition of the parochial schools of the Archdiocese of New York, covering the period from January 1 to December 31, 1910, has just been published. The archdiocesan Superintendents of schools, Rev. Joseph F. Smith and Rev. Michael J. Larkin, deserve congratulations for the excellent presentation it gives of general and detailed statistics of all the parish schools within their jurisdiction. We referred to these a few weeks ago in reviewing Father Thornton's article on the Parochial School system of New York written for the Evening Post. Other features of the present report that merit commendation are the discussions introduced by the Superintendents of practical details of the system which has been carried to a high degree of thoroughness in Manhattan and the other districts of the archdiocese. Such questions as: Conditions of Increase in Registration, Condition of Buildings, Number of Teachers, Endowment of Schools, Catholic High Schools, Meetings of Principals, Studies, The Teaching of Religion, and Elementary Branches, are dealt with in a manner that affords evidence of that close attention to methodical progress which a helpful educational system demands. One is particularly gratified to note the suggestion that deeper consideration be given to the uses to which school buildings and the facilities which they "offer" may be put outside of regular school hours. "As each pastor studies the needs of his own parish," says the report, "and sees the good to be accomplished and the dangers to be avoided by keeping a watchful eye on the pupils committed to his care and the amusements which they search for, the wider use of the school building will appeal for careful consideration."

* * *

The report contains this informing statement of Catholic school statistics of the United States: "It will not be out of place to record here the latest official statistics of the Catholic Elementary Schools, of the United States. There are in this country at the close of the year 1910, 4,972 parochial schools, with an enrollment of 1,270,131. Every diocese and every State is herein represented, even far away Alaska being credited with five schools. It is no wonder that a prominent Archbishop should have declared that 'the greatest religious fact in the United States to-day is the Catholic School System, maintained without any aid except from the people who love it.'"

An old student of the University of Pennsylvania wrote recently to the Board of Athletics of the school urging certain changes involving a radical readjustment of college athletics. The communication suggests the abolition of gate receipts, professional coaches, trainers, etc. The writer, too, would have students to pay for their own athletic clothes, board and traveling expenses. The weekly review of the University of Pennsylvania, Old Penn, seems not disinclined to accept the writer's proposal. "We have long felt," it says in its issue of May 8, "that athletics as conducted at our great universities are degrading to university life, and we have pointed out that they are in the strict sense of the word professional. Furthermore, they encourage the development of organizations that are dangerously exclusive and aristocratic, in what are supposed to be democratic institutions of learning.

"We can see no reason why Pennsylvania should not do a fine thing, and make an official proposal to the great universities of the East to hold a conference for a consideration of the state of college athletics with a view to bringing about much-needed reforms. We venture to prophesy that some such proposal will be made, if not by Pennsylvania by some other university. For, if we mistake not, the trend of sentiment is in that direction, especially among some of the most prominent educators."

Last year, President Schurman of Cornell University, commenting on the comparative scholastic standing of the fraternity and non-fraternity men for the year, rather sharply warned the former that their records were not satisfactory. The report for the present year, 1911, must be considered as a second reminder of delinquency. The President points out that of the eighty-four men dropped by the university in February, as the result of the midyear examinations, the fraternities furnished 40 to 45 per cent., whereas the number of male undergraduates belonging to fraternities constituted but 29 per cent. of the entire male student population. The figures are about the same as those of last year, and Dr. Schurman announces again that it is not a good showing for the fraternities.

Of the 3,587 regular students of Cornell, excluding graduate students and women, 1,048 belong to the fraternities, and 2,539 do not. Forty fraternity men and forty-eight non-fraternity men were dropped because of low marks in the February examination lists. The distribution among classes shows that the sophomore year is the dangerous one for fraternity men.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

In an editorial on the sermon preached by Bishop McFaul, at the nightworkers' commemorative Mass, in St. Patrick's Cathedral, on May 7, the Evening Post says:—

"Bishop McFaul's analysis yesterday of the American daily newspaper is almost startling in its soberness. Unlike the usual critic of the press, he did not exhibit sensationalism in the act of denouncing it, but judged newspapers by the same standards which a reasonable man would apply to individuals, to corporations, and to human institutions in general. This does not mean that he found nothing to condemn. On the contrary, he used fitting language with reference to 'some of our great dailies' which 'pander to the morbid desire of reading the demoralizing details of divorce, impurity, suicide, murder, and theft; exaggerate the luxury and the extravagance of the rich, as well as the privations and misery of the poor,' and 'are an incentive crime.' He also struck at the giving-the-people-what-they-want fallacy, by pointing out, on the one hand, that the men engaged in the publication of newspapers are presumably above the average in intelligence, with a consequent duty of elevating rather than playing upon passions, and, on the other, that most men and women are not seeking the trivial and the vulgar. The remedy for the abuses of the press he sees, not in drastic libel laws, but in the development of a code of ethics among newspaper men. Such a development will be materially hastened by criticism which, like the Bishop's, is made 'after an extensive study' of the subject, and displays a temper which the most ambitious of our newspapers might well emulate."

SOCIOLOGY

We mentioned a short time ago that the Alaska Fisheries expected to hire suitable workmen to carry on the fish-packing business, hardly attractive to whites on the Pacific Coast, among the mixed laboring class of Hawaii. The steamer Senator reached San Francisco a couple of weeks ago with 126 Filipinos and Hawaiians on board. The ship, Star of Italy, was waiting in the stream to take them to Bristol Bay. Nearly a hundred refused flatly to embark, and insisted on their right as American citizens to be landed in San Francisco. Their demand could not be refused.

About a year ago the Labor Party came into power in the Australian Commonwealth. One of the chief causes of its victory was the treatment of the leaders in the New South Wales coal strike, who were sentenced to considerable terms of imprisonment. It passed two measures in parliament: the first, intended to curtail the powers of state courts and thus prevent the recurrence of the possibility of the imprisonment of Labor leaders, made the Federal Arbitration Court the supreme tribunal of appeal in all industrial matters. The second, directed against the coal owners, conferred upon parliament the power of declaring by resolution any business to be a monopoly, and of making laws to regulate it under the control of the Commonwealth.

As these laws affected the constitution, they had to be submitted to the people. They have been both rejected by an overwhelming majority, Western Australia being the only State to support them. Sangguine defenders of the referendum among conservatives see in this a confirmation of their theory that the people will vote wisely enough if professional politicians and platform speakers will only leave them alone. It may be so; but "one swallow doesn't make a summer."

ECONOMICS

The exports of manufactured and partly manufactured articles maintain the remarkable increase which began within the last few years, that for March having been at the rate of more than 1 billion dollars a year. The actual figures were $84,844,851, made up of $57,499,206, the value of completed manufactures, and $27,345,645, that of partially manufactured goods. The proportion of manufactures to raw material exported continues also to grow, having been during March, 53½ per cent. During March, 1910, these exports amounted only to $69,750,000, and were less than 50 per cent. of the total export.

The chief increases are iron and steel, 5½ million dollars; copper nearly 2 millions; agricultural implements and cotton manufactures, both over 1 million; cars, carriages and automobiles, 1¼ million dollars and refined mineral oils, nearly 1 million. Russia took the largest share of agricultural implements, 1½ million dollars, and Canada came next, taking $750,000. It also took the same value in automobiles.

A Canadian Government publication deals with the asbestos mines of the Province of Quebec. These contain the largest known supply of this mineral, one deposit at Black Lake showing about 45 million tons. In 1880 only 380 tons were mined: in 1909 this had grown to 63,000 tons, worth $2,300,000, nearly 80 per cent. of the extraction throughout the world. Asbestos is, as all know, not only non-inflammable and non-fusible, but also an almost perfect non-conductor of heat. Its uses, therefore, are manifold. It coats boilers and steam pipes, and is used in building, especially for roofing. Hence the demand will almost certainly increase, and asbestos will be a source of wealth to the great province of the Dominion.

PERSONAL

The press gave various and in some instances conflicting accounts of the heroic rescue of a drowning man off the Battery, New York, by the Rev. Richard E. Ryan, S.J., on May 4. The following is the statement of Mr. Timothy Daly, an eye witness, given in a letter to the Sun:

"The newspaper reports of Father Ryan's rescue of Verian off the Battery are inaccurate as to the principle fact. I was on the ground from beginning to end of the incident; simply as an onlooker, however, so that I have no personal heroics to make known. I saw the man Verian as he rushed toward the water. When yet twenty feet distant from me he turned upon the small pier running out from the Battery wall. He had hardly thrown himself into the water when the priest ran quickly along the asphalt walk. I had already reached the entrance to the dock. Without stopping Father Ryan drew off both hat and coat and threw them toward me.

"As the priest hurried to the stringpiece there was no one between him and myself. When I got to the end of the stringpiece Father Ryan had the man already well in hand. One arm supported him, his face being under the water. I called attention to the fact. At once the rescuer turned the man over. While drifting rapidly toward the East River the priest's hard swimming brought him toward the Battery wall. The high westerly wind swirled the water into spray that covered both men. Father Ryan had no help for something like ten minutes. He called for none. A newspaper account of the affair reads:

'With apparent difficulty Father Ryan was still making his way out to the drowning man when police launch No. 5 rounded the Battery. The clergyman was having hard work to keep afloat although he was trying to get nearer the man.'

"On the contrary, with hands above his head the priest had dived and come up directly alongside Verian. The lacerations of Father Ryan's arm and hand (later bandaged by the ambulance surgeon) came about from contact with the rubble bottom against the wall. That happened as the priest gave his charge over to the officers of the patrol and reached the sharp rocks, where he lay almost in collapse under his dry coat that was returned to him. Pilot McSweeney and Nelson, his patrolman, deserve credit for their assistance in completion of the priest's final efforts. Neither officer had hesitated one moment to plunge into the water. Let the policemen have the honor due them, but it is to the Jesuit priest, Father Richard E. Ryan (who gave me his name only on persuasion), a man almost frail, yet fired with zeal of purpose, that one's hat is raised."

Mary A. Butler, who died recently at the Convent of the Sisters of St. Joseph, Germantown, Philadelphia, bequeathed $20,000 to the novitiate and Academy of St. Joseph at McSherrystown, Pa.

The Golden Jubilee of the Profession of Mother Mary Xavier of the Presentation Convent, St. Michael's, New York, was celebrated May 7 and 9 by the parishioners of St. Michael's and by over seven hundred graduates of its parochial school. Mother Xavier entered the Presentation Convent of Terenure, Dublin, 1858, and volunteered in 1874, with eleven other Sisters, to come to New York and open a parochial school for Father Donnelly, then Pastor of St. Michael's, who had gone to Ireland to get a sisterhood that was exclusively devoted to teaching. On September 29, 1874, six hundred children marched in a body from the neighboring public school and entered the new institution. There are now seventeen hundred in attendance, and one of the items of the jubilee program was rendered by fifty grandchildren of the first graduates. Though Mother Xavier served four terms as Superioress, she never relinquished the classroom, having been teaching consecutively for over fifty years. From various parts of the country her pupils came to greet her, among them being the celebrant of the Mass, the preacher and many of the clergy. St. Michael's has been a nursery of vocations, over fifty priests and as many Sisters having graduated from its schools. The remarkable tributes, both in composition and delivery, paid to Mother Xavier by graduates and pupils illustrate the Presentation Sisters' reputation for efficient teaching, and also the devotion they inspire.

Sir François Langelier, Chief Justice of the Superior Court, Province of Quebec, recently named Lieutenant-Governor of the Province to succeed Sir C. A. Pelletier, has accepted the appointment. Sir François Charles Stanislas Langelier has been in the public eye for nearly half a century. Born at Ste. Rosalie, P. Q., on Christmas Eve, 1838, he studied law at Laval University and was called to the Bar in 1861. Two years later he was appointed Professor of Roman Law at Laval, and afterwards of Civil Law and Political Economy. He practiced at the Bar in Quebec and was created a Q. C. by the Provincial Government in 1878, and by the Marquis of Lorne in 1880. Sir François has held many distinguished positions. He was secretary of the first colonization society established in Canada, Mayor of Quebec from 1882 to 1890, and a member of the Joly Cabinet, holding the office of Commissioner of Crown Lands and Treasurer successively. He was created a Knight Bachelor on Dominion Day, 1907.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The National Conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul is to be held in Boston on June 4, 5, 6, 7. Invitations to attend the National Conference have been sent to Most Rev. Diomedeo Falconio, D.D., Apostolic Delegate to the United States; to all the archbishops of the United States, and also to a large number of the clergy in the Boston archdiocese. The five sessions of the Conference will be held in Lorimer Hall, Tremont Temple, while the headquarters of the delegates will be in the Hotel Bellevue, Beacon Street. On Sunday afternoon, June 4, the Catholic Union of Boston will tender a reception to the visiting delegates and their friends. They will also be the guests of the City of Boston and their local brethren on an excursion down Boston Harbor, on Tuesday, June 6, which for many of the delegates, especially those from the Central West and other distant inland points, will be a unique experience.

Arrangements have also been made for a big public meeting on Sunday evening, June 4, in the beautiful Majestic Theatre. The speakers at this meeting will include His Grace, the Archbishop of Boston, Hon. Eugene N. Foss, Governor of Massachusetts, Hon. John F. Fitzgerald, Mayor of Boston, and the President of the National Conference of the Society.

The corner stone of the new St. John's Hospital in St. Louis was laid with public ceremonies on May 7. The speakers on the occasion were the Most Rev. Archbishop Glennon and the Rev. Christopher Byrne. The new hospital, which will be conducted by the Sisters of Mercy, has a frontage of 420 feet on Euclid Avenue and 200 feet on Park View. It will cost $400,000.

Announcement was made at the Vatican, May 11, that the Right Rev. Mgr. J. Henry Tihen, Chancellor of the Diocese of Wichita, Kansas, had been named Bishop of Lincoln, Nebraska, in succession to the late Right Rev. Thomas Bonacum. The Bishop-elect, who has been Rector of the St. Aloysius Pro-Cathedral of his diocese for some years, was born July 14, 1861, in Oldenburg, Indiana. He received his college training at St. Benedict's College, Atchison, going thence to St. Francis' Seminary, Milwaukee, Wis., for his philosophical and theological studies. Mgr. Tihen is well known as a lecturer on social topics. He has filled the important post of Chancellor under Bishop Hennessy since 1898, and was, at the latter's request, raised to the purple as Monsignor in 1905.

At the fourteenth annual State Convention of the Knights of Columbus of Illinois, at Dixon, Ill., May 9, 240 accredited delegates were in attendance, and the convention hall was crowded with 1,500 Knights when Bishop Muldoon of the Rockford Diocese, State Chaplain of the organization, addressed the convention.

"The country needs men of character and religious principles more than ever before," said Bishop Muldoon. "Men are needed who will stand forth as bulwarks against socialism and anarchism and who in the face of a veritable gale will stand for respect for law and authority and for the rights of their fellow men, of property, and of the home.

"The Knights of Columbus can and should exert all their forces to be felt throughout this State. They should work to destroy the canker gnawing at the vitals of this country by demanding legislation which will strike at divorces, which will make divorce difficult to obtain, and in the end make it impossible, by the practical application of the spirit and teachings of the Catholic Church."

The eighteenth annual convention of the Massachusetts State Council, Knights of Columbus, was held in Boston, on May 9. State Deputy William J. O'Brien, who presided, reviewed the progress of the Order and reported an increase of 18,015 members during the year, the present total membership being 255,028. There had also been a gain of eighty-three councils, bringing the total up to 1508. Councils now exist in Canada, Newfoundland, the Philippines, Panama, Mexico, Cuba and Porto Rico. In Massachusetts the increase in membership for the past year was 1,309 and four new councils were added. The $500,000 fund, which is being raised for the Catholic University, has already reached $255,023, of which Massachusetts paid $18,000.

The College of St. Hyacinthe, Province of Quebec, Canada, will celebrate next month its one hundredth anniversary. The educational work of St. Hyacinthe was begun a century ago by the Venerable Father Girouard, in the village of Petit Maska, the present city of St. Hyacinthe, and from the school which he founded has developed the present thriving Seminary with its corps of distinguished professors and its three hundred and fifty ecclesiastical students. The celebration will last three days, beginning on June 20, and an interesting program, published in the May issue of Le Collégien, is being sent to all former students whose present whereabouts is known to the faculty. The committee in charge of the coming event extends, through the columns of AMERICA, a cordial invitation to all who have ever attended the College to join in the festivities.

At one of the sessions of the Supreme Council, Catholic Benevolent Legion, in Newark last week, the report of John D. Carroll, Supreme Secretary, showed that during the last year there had been an increase in membership of three hundred. The total membership is now 16,726. John E. Dunn, Supreme Treasurer, reported a balance of $424,680 for the payment of death claims and a reserve fund of $400,000.

SCIENCE

In the Astrophysical Journal for April Abbot and Fowle say that according to their observations, the sun is a variable star, its light and heat, outside of our atmosphere, varying to the extent of 8 per cent, or 0.03 of a stellar magnitude.

The same journal gives the opinions of twenty-nine of the foremost spectroscopists of the world, among whom we see two Jesuit names, Fathers Sidgreaves and Cortie, of Stonyhurst College, England, concerning the unification of the classification of stellar spectra. Many of the writers refer to Father Secchi's pioneer work in this line, and say that his original plan is still the best fundamental one upon which to build our modern classifications. The opinions were unanimous in favor of what is known as the Draper classification, in which the letters O, B, A, F, G, K, M and N are used to designate the sequence of the spectra. Numerals from 1 to 9 after the letter denote intermediate spectra; thus B3 would be assigned to a spectrum between B and A, but more nearly resembling the former.

This expression of opinion on the part of spectroscopists is the result of the decision arrived at on Mount Wilson last September by the International Union for Cooperation in Solar Research, of extending its activities to include general astrophysics, instead of limiting itself to solar physics.

The April Observatory reports that at the meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society on March 10 Professor Turner, of Oxford, suggested that as it had become necessary to redetermine the positions of fundamental stars which had been observed with great labor by visual methods about 20 or 25 years ago, it seemed most reasonable to him to do this work by photography and introduce its superior accuracy into meridian work. A year or two ought to be spent in finding out the exact particulars of the method to be adopted. If its superiority over visual methods were solidly established, and of this he had no doubt, science would take an enormous step forward. If it turned out to be a failure, only a year or two would be lost instead of the many that would be necessary for carrying the visual work to completion, which, in order to be at all useful, when begun would have to be finished, but which, before being half-finished, might be declared to be behind the age by methods that might spring into being at almost any time. It behooved us therefore to pause and give the matter weighty consideration before committing ourselves to such a laborious, and to him antiquated, campaign. He illustrated his remarks by referring to the case of Halley, after whom the comet is named, who was deputed by the Royal Society to go to Danzig to confer with Hevelius, and "see whether he could not settle this dispute as to which was the best method of observing, with the naked eye or with the new-fangled telescope. Halley decided in favor of the eye-method. The observations of Hevelius were so good, he was so expert that Halley, delighted with his skill, reported in favor of the eye-method. It is difficult to realize how Halley could have made such a mistake. The death-knell of naked eye observations had been already struck by Flamsteed at Greenwich; and it was not long before every one realized that the only way to make accurate observations was to use the telescope. It is easy to be wise after the event; but it does seem strange that Halley did not see that the eye was naturally limited, with no power of increasing its magnification or sensitiveness, whereas the possibilities, at any rate, of the telescope were very great.

Whatever might have been done, or not done, in the way of success up to this time, yet there was an almost unlimited future in the expansion of the instrument. However, whatever may have been the reason, he made a mistaken report, as we now know." Professor Turner's speech was heavily attacked by Sir David Gill, Mr. Hincks, the Astronomer Royal and others, who, while admitting his principle, said that at present no photographic measuring telescope constructed could at all compete in accuracy with a visual one.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

RECENT ADVANCES IN CHEMISTRY.

Is the high cost of living due to the cheap production of gold? Some say it is. If so, let us prepare for the worst. John Collins Clancy, the Chemical Engineer of the Moore Filter Co., of New York, is the inventor of a remarkable improvement in the cyaniding of gold and silver ores. In 1891 McArthur and De Forrest proved the feasibility of recovering the values of gold and silver bearing rocks by using a solution of potassium cyanide. Lixiviation is very much more difficult of application than the older processes; yet, in twenty years it has become so perfect that to-day, under favorable circumstances, ores can be profitably treated which run only two or three dollars to the ton. The Clancy process bids fair to do even better.

In the cyanide treatment as now conducted in Australia, South Africa and the United States, little of the precious cyanogen escapes in the air, but much is converted into cyanates, isocyanates and other products, all of which are useless as far as the solution of the precious metals is concerned.

Mr. Clancy extracts the valuable cyanogen from these compounds and electrolytically regenerates the spent solution of potassium cyanide. The main chemical needed in the operation is calcium cyanamide, a cheap by-product of another industry. It cannot be doubted that the new method has given successful laboratory tests. For the first time it is to be tried on a large scale this summer in the Cripple Creek district, Colorado. The mining world is awaiting with the keenest interest the final verdict of the experts.

* * *

SYNTHETIC PRODUCTS.

The fabulous price of rubber and the ever-increasing demand for this substance have been lately a powerful incentive to the production of what is called in chemical parlance "synthetic" rubber, namely true rubber produced in the laboratory without the gum of the tree.

Fortunately the solution of this most important problem cannot be far off. Dr.

F. Hofman and his colleague, Dr. C. Coultelle, both chemists of the Elberfeld Dye-works, Germany, make artificial rubber out of isoprene, a mobile liquid somewhat similar to benzene. Isoprene, which is itself a synthetic chemical, when properly treated by heat in closed vessels, yields genuine rubber. So declared Professor Harries, of Kiel, to whom samples were submitted for analysis. Mr. Harries is an expert, having discovered independently another method of preparing rubber. This, however, has not been divulged to the public.

If we remember the fate of such substances as indigo, madder dyes, urea and others, we cannot help thinking that very soon synthetic caoutchouc will finally be able to compete successfully with the natural product.

A. W. FORSTALL, S.J.

OBITUARY

The Rev. John B. Cronin, C.S.S.R., who died at Ilchester, Md., April 6, was born June 8, 1849, in Fayette Co., Pa., and entered the Redemptorist Novitiate at Annapolis in 1868. He made his religious profession April 15, 1869, and received Holy Orders September 1, 1877. For several years he taught classes at the Preparatory College of the Redemptorists, and next labored in parishes, and on missions in Canada and the United States. During the past two years he suffered several strokes of apoplexy, which incapacitated him for the exercise of sacerdotal functions.

The Most Rev. Fergus Patrick McEvay, Archbishop of Toronto, died on May 10, at the Episcopal residence in that city, after an illness of many months. His Grace was born at Lindsay, Ontario, December 8, 1852, and made his classical studies at St. Michael's College, Toronto. His theological course was taken at the Grand Seminary, Montreal, and he was ordained priest July 9, 1882. His first assignment was to Kingston, but later he was transferred to the diocese of Peterborough and given charge of the missions of Bobcaygeon, Galway and Fenelon Falls. In 1887, when Bishop Dowling succeeded Bishop Jamot of Peterborough, Father McEvay was appointed Rector of St. Peter's Cathedral, Peterborough, which he renovated, and purchased property for the future hospital, and houses for parochial and episcopal uses. In the midst of his strenuous labors in Peterborough, in 1889, Father McEvay was moved to Hamilton, where he filled the offices of secretary to the Bishop and Rector of the Cathedral. Here, too, honors from Rome were accorded him, when he was appointed private chamberlain to His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII, domestic prelate, then vicar-general of the diocese.

When Bishop O'Connor of London was promoted to the Archbishopric of Toronto Father McEvay was named his successor in London and was consecrated its Bishop on August 6, 1899. Here again his administration was eminently successful, and when Archbishop O'Connor resigned the Mitre of Toronto Bishop McEvay was transferred from London to Toronto as his successor, on June 17, 1908. During his incumbency at Toronto, in spite of indifferent health, he formed a number of new parishes, accepted the office of chairman of the Catholic Church Extension Society, founded St. Augustine's Seminary and did an amount of organization and development incredible to all those who are not acquainted with his work.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

IDENTIFYING CATHOLIC LANDMARKS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Affixed to the building at the northeast corner of Forty-ninth street and Madison avenue is a bronze plaque, on which, surmounted by a crown, is this inscription:

"Columbia College, chartered in 1754 as King's College, occupied this site from May, 1857, to October, 1895."

I understand that one of the organizations of the Knights of Columbus, having for its purpose the encouragement of the study of Catholic history, intends to mark, in the early future, some of the historic spots of New York's pioneer Catholic period, and this plaque suggests an appropriate example.

On the west side of the avenue, just a block further north, could be placed a memorial telling that from 1810 to 1813 the New York Literary Institution, our first collegiate school, was located there. This section was then known as the village of Elgin, and the site of the Literary Institution was described at its opening as "the most delightful and most healthy spot of the whole island, at a distance of four small miles from the city, and half a mile from the East and North Rivers, both of which are seen from the house; situate between two roads which are very much frequented, opposite to the Botanical Gardens which belong to the State." The Botanical Gardens, which ran along the west side of what is now Fifth avenue, were soon after acquired by Columbia College through a State authorized lottery, and Columbia still owns this most valuable land.

T. F. M.

New York, May 13, 1911.

NOTE.—The date 1844 instead of 1845 for the conversion of Cardinal Newman is of course a misprint, as everyone knows who is familiar with the Mozley correspondence, particularly the letter written at 5 o'clock on the morning of October 9, 1845.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 7

(Price 10 Cents)

MAY 27, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 111

CHRONICLE

The Arbitration Treaty—Standard Oil Decision—Justice Harlan Dissents—Standard Oil Trust—Boycott's Technical Victory—Aviation Disasters—Dr. Lucas Chosen Director—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—France—Spain—Portugal—Germany—Austria-Hungary—China145-148

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Fez—John La Farge—Carlist Program Modified—Catholic University of Louvain.....149-155

CORRESPONDENCE

Portugal on the Eve of the Elections—Successful Mission Work in Jamaica—General Congress of Catholics in Mayence.....155-157

EDITORIAL

The Light-House—William Emmanuel von Ketteler—Best Hundred Catholic Books—Bishops, Justices and Marriages—Another Word to the Peace Society—Newspaper Hoaxes—Notes. 158-162

LITERATURE

Meditations and Instructions on the Blessed Virgin—Meditations on the Blessed Virgin—The English Lourdes—Recollections of Abraham Lincoln—The Job Secretary—Saint Charles Borromeo—The Chief Ideas of the Baltimore Catechism—Books Received162-164

EDUCATION

Preparations for the Annual Meeting of the Catholic Educational Association—The Problem of Morality and Religion in School Teaching—New York's Proposed Paid Board of Education—Serious Defects in the System of General and Free Schooling164-165

SOCIOLOGY

Who Benefit by the Growth of Land Values—Catholic Immigrants from Holland for Minnesota 165

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Need of a Catholic International Press Agency 165-166

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Vicariate Apostolic of Erythrea—Fire at Creighton University—Conversion of Rev. R. M. Edwards166

PERSONAL

Bishop Neils Stensen—Rev. W. J. Ennis, S.J.—Rev. John H. O'Rourke, S.J.—Amedée C. Fargis166

SCIENCE

Platinum Record Level—Are Comets Optical Phenomena?—Halley's Comet Still Visible—Coal Dust Explosions—Purification of Water by Clay 166-167

OBITUARY

Very Rev. Mother M. Josephine Digby—Very Rev. James McGill, C.M.—James Smith.167-168

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

The Senior Catholic Academy.....168

CHRONICLE

The Arbitration Treaty.—Public interest in the subject of international arbitration was increased by the announcement that the completed draft of a general treaty of arbitration had been submitted by our Secretary of State to the Ambassador of Great Britain and the Ambassador of France for submission to their governments. This step marks the opening of formal diplomatic negotiations on the subject and constitutes the proposal on the part of the United States. The ground covered by the proposed treaties is divided into two parts—those questions which are clearly arbitrable and questions of the application of governmental policies which involve complications. Provision is made in the treaty that questions of the first class shall be referred to The Hague tribunal after the failure of direct diplomatic negotiations. Questions of the second class, such as the application of the Monroe Doctrine or the English colonial policy in India, are to be considered by a committee consisting of the representatives of both countries on The Hague tribunal, together with other members of the court, which shall decide whether the question may be submitted to arbitration. The treaties provide that the compromise on the part of the United States shall in each case be submitted to the Senate for approval. The treaties submitted to Great Britain and France are substantially identical.

Standard Oil Decision.—The Supreme Court of the United States, by a practically unanimous decision, declared that the Standard Oil Company is a "combination in restraint" of trade and a "monopoly" within the meaning of the anti-trust law, and ordered its dissolution within six months. This applies to the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, and thirty-three allied corporations, having an aggregate capital of $110,000,000. The court holds that corporations whose contracts are "not unreasonably restrictive of competition" are not affected, and that other great corporations whose acts may be called into question will be dealt with according to the merits of their particular cases. The decision is remarkable for the succinctness and clarity of its reasoning. The court interprets the Sherman Anti-Trust law so as to limit its application to acts of "undue" restraint, finding justification for this limitation in the method of interpreting, "in the light of reason," the common law and the law of the United States at the time the Sherman law was passed. Chief Justice White declared that the Sherman act did not go further than the common law. It thus followed that the court was competent to show intent. Accepting this principle of interpreting the common law, he demonstrated that the tendency of the combination was to monopolize the business in a certain industry. It then became a question for determination as to whether the restraint exercised to procure a monopoly was reasonable or unreasonable, which in the light of facts submitted to the court was easily demonstrable.

Justice Harlan Dissents.—The decision of the court was read by Chief Justice White, seven of the Associate Justices concurring with him, both as to the finding of fact and the application of law. Justice Harlan alone dissented. He agreed with his colleagues as to conclusions, but radically differed as to the construction of the law. He took a more drastic view, disagreeing with the conclusion of the majority that a restraint of trade must be shown to be "undue" in order to come within the purview of the statute, and objecting to the extent by which the remainder of the court was guided by the common law in this respect.

Standard Oil Trust.—The company has 8,000 miles of trunk pipe line, 75,000 miles of feeders and controls 75 per cent. of the refining business of the country; its twenty-two refineries have a daily capacity of from 15,000 to 30,000 barrels. It has erected and maintains oil supplies in nearly 4,000 stations in the United States, holds 80,000,000 barrels of oil continually in reserve, and requires 9,000 tank cars and 5,000 tank wagons to handle initial domestic distribution. More than one-half of the company's refined products is consumed abroad, 200 vessels, including sixty ocean tank steamers, being engaged in transporting its products, and this foreign business has brought to this country more than $1,000,000,000 of foreign gold. The Company employs 70,000 men, and in forty years of corporate existence has had no labor troubles.

Boycott's Technical Victory.—The sentences of imprisonment imposed on Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell and Frank Morrison, president, vice-president and secretary, respectively, of the American Federation of Labor, for alleged disobedience to a boycott injunction, were set aside as erroneous by the Supreme Court of the United States. The basis of the court's opinion was that the proceedings brought against the labor officers was for civil contempt, which could be punished only by the imposition of a fine. The sentence of the lower court to imprisonment was the penalty for criminal contempt, and, therefore, it was not a legal punishment. In thus reversing the decision, on purely technical grounds, the higher court pointed out that if the lower court felt itself aggrieved it could bring an action for criminal contempt and inflict sentences of imprisonment. Justice Wright, of the District Supreme Court, who imposed the sentences upon Messrs. Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison, has already instituted such an action against the three labor leaders.

Aviation Disasters.—Second Lieutenant George E. M. Kelly, of the United States Signal Corps, one of the four army aviators on duty with the division of regulars mobilized in Texas, was killed when a Curtiss aeroplane he was flying got beyond control and crashed to the ground, burying him in its wreckage. He is the second American soldier sacrificed to aviation, Lieutenant Selfridge having been killed at Fort Meyer, Virginia, at the time of the Wright experiments in 1909.—René Vallon, a French aviator, fell from a great height in Shanghai, China, where he had been giving exhibitions, and was instantly killed.—Herr Bekemuller, an aviation pupil, was killed at Berlin, when his aeroplane struck against a building that had been hidden from view by a heavy early morning mist.

Dr. Lucas Chosen Director.—Dr. Frederic Augustus Lucas, since 1904 Curator in Chief of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, has been chosen as the Director of the American Museum of Natural History, New York City. The new director previously held various positions in the United States National Museum, and rendered important service on the Government commission on the fur seals of the Behring Sea, and in preparing the Government exhibits of natural history at the exhibitions held in New Orleans, Chicago, Atlanta, St. Louis, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Omaha and Louisville. His writings cover a wide field and include two volumes of a popular nature, entitled "Animals of the Past," and "Animals Before Man in North America." Dr. Lucas was born in Plymouth, Mass., in 1852.

Mexico.—Three weeks ago, President Diaz issued an address to the Mexican nation, in which he declared that he would not resign while the country was in the throes of civil war, but that he would resign when his conscience should dictate that step. War still exists, and even in an aggravated form, but on June 1, Minister of Foreign Affairs De la Barra, will become acting president, pending new elections. The cessation of hostilities in the Northeast has not affected the revolutionists in the Northwestern or the Southern parts of the republic. General Navarro, who surrendered Ciudad Juarez to the Maderists, urges in defence of his action, that ammunition and rations were short, that the revolutionists had cut off the water supply, and that he had grave fears of the loyalty of three of his subordinates. A newspaper called El Demócrata Mexicano, accused Minister Limantour of grave irregularities in managing the finances of the country. The paper has been suppressed, and the editor is in jail under a charge of criminal libel. Heavy shipments of gold and bullion from Mexico on the Ward Line steamers seem to indicate that some wealthy Mexicans are preparing to leave their country and seek a milder climate. General Reyes, spoken of as Minister of War, reached Havana, where he stopped, in compliance with directions from Mexico. Madero, who was on the point of setting out for the capital, was advised to delay his departure, for reasons not given out. Rumors of assassination were in the air, and some were rash enough to say that the compliance of Diaz with the popular will was a political trick, for the purpose of gaining time and furthering desperate schemes of retaliation and vengeance.—Ex-President José Madriz of Nicaragua, in whose favor Zelaya resigned, died in the City of Mexico on May 15, at the age of forty. He left a widow and four children.

The account of his funeral makes no mention of any religious services.

Canada.—Attempts at conciliation in the Alberta and British Columbia coal strike have failed. A strike of structural steel workers is threatening in the West, which will affect seriously railway construction by the Grand Trunk, Pacific and Canadian Northern.—The Government proposes to acquire a number of smaller railways connecting with the Intercolonial and to organize them into one system.—Mr. Borden, Leader of the Opposition, will spend the parliamentary recess in a political tour through the West.—The prospect of an immense crop is leading holders to get rid of their surplus stocks, and the grain pouring into Montreal is taxing all the capacities of the port.—The Protestants continue their agitation over the Hébert marriage case. They pretend to have a grievance which they find it impossible to put in words. Thus the Protestant bishops laid their heads together to produce what is called a pastoral letter, in which, after pouring out a flood of angry verbiage full of presumptuous insinuations only their ignorance can excuse, attempt to come to the point, as follows: "The Church and the State must unite in protecting those who have been married by a duly competent officer authorized by the State." But in the Hébert case the minister lacked this qualification, and therefore, according to the principle to which they have proclaimed their adhesion over and over again, that the capacity of a minister to solemnize a valid marriage depends solely on his authorization by the State, they should admit the Hébert attempt to have been no more valid than if they had contracted before the first man they met in the street. A silly pride, mortified at finding the authorization of their ministers restricted to Protestants, seems to be at the bottom of the whole affair.

Great Britain.—The Government retains the Barnstaple seat by a reduced majority on an increased poll. At the general election the majority was 882 in a total poll of 11,590; it is now 468 in a poll of 12,010. As the election was due to Sir J. Soares' taking office under the Government, the Unionists drew some comfort from the result.—Lloyd-George's National Insurance against Sickness and Unemployment has been received with great good will. It makes insurance compulsory on all whose wages are under the income tax limit (£160 per annum). For insurance against sickness the general rate of assessment is 4 pence a week for men and 3 pence for women; the employers are to pay 3 pence a week for each person employed, and the State is to contribute 2 pence a week for every person insured. Earners of less than 2 shillings and 6 pence a day will pay less, and their employers will make up the difference. The sick benefit is to be 10 shillings a week for 3 months, then 5 shillings for 3 months, and the same amount for permanent disablement. For women it will be 7 shillings and 6 pence for the first period, then 5 shillings, as for the men. For maternity cases involving absence from work of over 4 weeks, 30 shillings will be paid. Provision is made for medical attendance and medicines, and for consumption hospitals. For insurance against unemployment each workman is to be assessed 2½ pence a week, his employer the same amount, and the State will contribute one-fourth of the whole cost. The benefit is to be 7 shillings a week for a maximum of 15 weeks. By 1915 the schemes will cost the taxpayers 5½ millions sterling per annum, according to Mr. George; according to others, holding that in such matters Government estimates are generally too sanguine, they will cost double. The old age pensions now amount to 13 millions a year, and as Mr. George hopes to reduce the qualifying age from 70 to 65, they will increase considerably. It seems, therefore, that the permanent charge will be between 25 and 30 millions a year. In addition to their share in this, employees will have to provide some 8 millions a year for their assessments. The total number of those compulsorily insured will be about 13 millions; arrangements for voluntary insurance will admit 1½ million more. The good will towards the scheme is mixed with considerable criticism. The Friendly Societies are anxious about its effect on their interests. Large employers of labor do not see how they are to meet its heavy charges, amounting in some cases to from £5,000 to £8,000 per annum. They will try to get these out of prices, but hint that wages may suffer.—A memorial to the Government, signed by 166 Liberal and Labor members, asks power for local authorities to tax land values.—Lord Lonsdale has written a vigorous letter, saying that Government methods will leave property-owners no other course than to sell all their possessions and invest beyond the tax gatherer's reach.

France.—In presence of 200,000 people on the aviation plain of Issy-les-Moulineux, M. Berteaux, the Minister of War, was killed, and M. Monis, the Prime Minister, was severely injured by a monoplane falling upon them, as it was about to start on a race in the air to Madrid. Besides the Prime Minister, two other persons were injured, the Prime Minister's son, Antoine, and an aged patron of aeronautics, Henri Deutsch de la Meurthe. The two occupants of the wrecked machine escaped uninjured. M. Monis suffered compound fractures of two bones of the right leg, his nose was broken, his face badly contused; there were also bruises on the breast and abdomen. M. Berteaux was badly mangled. His left arm was cut off, his head crushed, his throat gashed, and the whole of his left side cut and lacerated. All this happened at 6 o'clock Sunday morning, May 21st.

Spain.—In an authorized interview, Premier Canalejas takes an advanced stand in his anti-religious projects, and proposes to ignore the Concordat. He raises his customary mendacious wail about the excessive number of religious in Spain, and echoes the old-time Know-Nothing whine about "foreign" interference in domestic affairs. Canalejas is food and drink to the desperate newspaper reporters, for he is always ready to talk, especially when he has nothing to say.—Some influential newspapers are urging the cabinet to repudiate the Algeciras Convention regulating Moroccan affairs, and to invite the interested nations to another conference for the purpose of outlining different spheres of influence or of parceling out the sultanate.—The reiteration of the wild rumors concerning the health of King Alfonso have finally called forth an official declaration that he is suffering from polyps in the nasal passages, and not from tuberculosis. His second son, Jaime, whom vague report had declared a deaf-mute, is to be treated by a Swiss specialist for an impediment that prevents free articulation.—Canalejas has presented his long-heralded Associations Law to the Cortes. It is quite as radical as was expected, and will make slow progress, if it does not fail entirely.

Portugal.—The important African colony of Lourenço Marques complains of being ignored by the Braga administration and threatens to set up an independent government.—All possible precautions are being taken at home to secure the triumph of the party now in control at the elections to be held for drawing up a Constitution. Arrests and threats of exile on trivial pretexts are the chief weapons employed.—The clergy have been warned that if they close the churches as a protest against the seizure of all Church property, they will be proceeded against for high treason. If this were actually done, a few clerics might suffer, but the Church would gain immensely. Braga, therefore, will not attempt it.

Germany.—The Prussian Diet adopted the Greater Berlin bill, which will combine the capital city and the suburban municipalities, forming a metropolitan area, with a population of close to 3,500,000. The union thus brought about will move Berlin from the sixth to the third position among the great cities of the world in point of population. The German capital will now rank next to London and New York.—German Stock Exchanges received the news of the Standard Oil decision with a pronounced sense of relief. For weeks markets had been in a state of stagnant suspense while awaiting the Supreme Court's final action. The feeling of financiers throughout the empire following the long looked for decision is that both the American and European financial worlds are now relieved of the hesitancy which had stood in the way of operations, and that the effect cannot but be favorable to the markets generally.—The Potsdam agreement between Russia and Germany is about to be supplemented by a treaty based on the two fundamental principles of "friendship" in Europe and material support in the near and middle East. Germany and Russia both undertake to remain aloof from any combination of powers that has an aggressive tendency. Germany recognizes that Northern Persia is a Russian sphere of influence, while Russia acknowledges Germany's commercial interests in the district and guarantees the maintenance of the "open door" policy within that sphere of its political influence.

Austria-Hungary.—According to despatches received early last week, the Heir-Apparent, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, has in large measure taken over the public duties of the aged monarch of the empire-kingdom, now in his eighty-eighth year. This has been brought about by the insistent commands of His Majesty's physician that the latter spare himself as much as possible, and take the much-needed rest, for which he retired to the royal palace Gödöllő, in the vicinity of Budapest. To quiet rumors resulting from the seeming regency of the Archduke, which created disturbance on the European bourses, Francis Joseph's physicians sent out official denials that the health of His Majesty was such as to arouse any extraordinary solicitude.—The controversy regarding the fate of Archduke John Salvator of Austria, otherwise known as John Orth, was legally settled last week. The Supreme Court of the kingdom decided that his death must be presumed to have occurred July 21, 1890. Archduke John was the younger son of the late Grand Duke Leopold II of Tuscany, and was born in 1852. He renounced his rank and titles and, calling himself John Orth, he married out of his station in London, July, 1890. Immediately after his marriage he sailed, with his wife, for Chile. Nothing has since been heard of him, and the vessel on which he sailed was reported lost with all on board. Last July the courts declared him officially dead, allowing six months for the filing of a protest against this assumption.

China.—The first meeting of the Plague Conference took place at Mukden on April 3. Experts representing ten Powers attended. The official language adopted by the Conference is French, but English and German may be also spoken.—The Russo-Chinese crisis is over. The Russian demands made three different times were acceded to by China. There will be a Russian Consulate at Kobdo, and perfect freedom of trade is granted in Mongolia and Ili. The troops stationed in these two countries will depart, as agreed to by Russia. The representatives of "the Four Nations' Syndicate" have not yet signed the loan for $50,000,000. They still claim the right to appoint advisors on questions for the reform of China's currency. The recent collapse of several native banks in Shanghai, and their refusal to honor their own orders, show how wise is this attitude.—The rice riots that occurred at Hangechau on May 8 are by some attributed to the Revolutionaries.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Fez

The eyes of the civilized world are at present watching with considerable anxiety the course of events in and around the little city of Fez, in Morocco, an almost forgotten place, situated about one hundred miles east of the Atlantic and eighty miles south of the Mediterranean.

For the Mohammedans of older times Fez was a sacred city, second only in importance to Mecca; indeed, when the pilgrims were unable to reach the tomb of the Prophet they wended their way to Fez. It was founded somewhere in the eighth century by Edris, of whom, however, very little is known except that he was an important personage among the followers of the Crescent.

Fez at one time boasted of 90,000 houses and 785 mosques. It was a resting place for the distinguished dead, and the ruins of their tombs may still be seen there. For hundreds of years it was the capital of the Mohammedan States of Western Africa, and Europeans called its Sultan the Emperor of Morocco. It began to decline only about the middle of the nineteenth century. At one time it possessed a great university, and the fame of its schools of medicine, philosophy and astronomy extended to Southern Europe, so that even Christians followed its classes. Its influence was greatest after the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, the sacred character of the city being one of the chief attractions for the exiles. With this increase of learning and population there followed also a corresponding growth in the mechanical arts and industry, and Fez then reached the summit of its glory.

It is situated on the slopes of a pear-shaped valley, through which the Wad-el Jubar, or the River of Pearls, flows, dividing the city into two parts. Some vestiges of its former greatness still linger in the region, for the low hills around are crowned by the ruins of ancient fortresses, and from the turreted walls of the city stand out in bold relief countless minarets and flat-roofed houses, and as the eye ranges on the country around, it rests on the crumbling ruins of once splendid buildings, cells of recluses, broken columns, massive stone aqueducts, domelike tombs and dilapidated forts. On the north, east and west the land is carefully cultivated, and clusters of orange, pomegranate and other fruit trees cover the surrounding hills, and travelers tell us that as you approach the city you pass through beautiful gardens arranged in amphitheatres on the slopes above you.

Seen from a distance, Fez has the usual attractiveness of most Oriental cities, but inside the walls the charm is dispelled. The houses are two or three stories high, with blank walls on the street, the windows all looking on the courtyard. The streets are narrow, six or nine feet being considered ample enough for traffic, and, though dark already, they are often covered over with vines or awnings. The dirt is indescribable, and the wonder is how its 45,000 people can live in such defiance of the most elementary hygienic conditions. It has a system of sewers, built, it is said, by an apostate Frenchman, which open not on the streets, but, strange to say, into the houses, making the odor at the entrance of these dwellings an unpleasant thing to remember. Fortunately, the abundance of water with which the city is supplied staves off the pestilence which otherwise would seem inevitable. The gloom of the streets and the foulness of the air impart a pallid look to the inhabitants, but that is regarded as a mark of distinction.

In spite of its drawbacks, however, Fez is an important place commercially, as commerce goes in Africa. It is a centre for the caravans from the countries south and east. Even Timbuctoo sends its merchandise thither and Europe does not neglect its markets. From it go out to the world almonds, and gums, and raisins, and dates, and other fruits, and olive oil, and honey, and elephant tusks, and ostrich feathers, and gold, and gold dust, and slaves. It manufactures the famous woolen mantles of the Kabyles. Its sashes and silken kerchiefs and wonderfully tanned leather are considered to be valuable, but not so its coarse linen and earthenware. Carpets and saddles and articles in brass, and, of course, the cap which all the world knows as "the fez," are to be found in its bazaars. The shops in which these articles are sold are, however, small and dingy and mean. There is no hurry or zeal on the part of the merchant, who sits cross-legged among his wares in a corner of his booth, in such a spot that he can easily stretch out his hands to lay hold of the article to be disposed of. The workers are in the cellar beneath.

The glory of its university has long since departed, but there are still schools which are fairly well frequented. Of course, there are mosques, one of them in which there is a court for women—a very unusual thing for Moslems—is named after Edris; another is the famous Karoubin or Karueen, with its 366 pillars and its lustre of 500 lamps, the spoil of some Christian church. Very appropriately, the latter is a refuge for criminals. The palace of Lallah Almina, with its beautiful gardens, is two miles from town. There is even a lunatic asylum, which is richly endowed, with a curious obligation, however, in its deed of gift; so curious, indeed, that it would seem to have been suggested by one of the inmates of the institution. A sum of money has been provided for the care of sick storks and cranes that wing their way to the city, and also to bury them when they give up the ghost; for ghosts they give up—the supposition being that these birds are animated by the souls of men who have died in foreign parts, and have adopted this method of aviation to reach the sacred city. Perhaps it is the origin of the stork-fancy that is cultivated in civilized countries.

There are about 10,000 Jews in the city, but their lot is a hard one. They are confined to certain quarters, and are shut in behind gates at night. In the daytime they do not dare to enter the Moorish sections without taking off their shoes and walking barefoot in the sacred streets. The Europeans who are believed to be in Fez just at this moment are very few in number. There are no more than 11 French officers, and they are employed in training the Sultan's troops. Another 30 complete the French contingent. There are besides 14 English, 1 Swiss, 9 Germans, 12 Italians, 6 Spaniards and 1 Austrian. Of the 16 Algerians, 13 are Jews. There are only 14 white women in the place, and 12 children, eight of whom belong to the Italian colonel who is commander of the ammunition factory.

It is this miserable place which is causing consternation in all the cabinets of Europe. The Sultan, Mulai Hafid, is the individual who a few years ago dethroned his own brother, and who had the nations of Europe to meet at Algeciras to make a treaty whose purpose was to check each other's aspirations for the conquest of the country. He is now cooped up inside the fortifications of Fez, while great numbers of his wild tribesmen are in revolt outside, clamoring for his abdication. They have learned the lesson he taught them. He has only about 2,400 soldiers with him, one-third of whom have neither arms nor ammunition. France, which has been commissioned by the Powers to be Morocco's policeman, has sent 2,000 men under Major Brémont to relieve the beleaguered city, in order to save its European inhabitants and to strengthen the tottering throne of Mulai Hafid. The road thither is through a dangerous region, among fierce tribes whose loyalty cannot be counted on; nor are there any means of connecting with the outside world of Europe. Hence the unreliability of the news in the press for the past month or more. Rumors are circulated one day and denied the next. Sometimes Brémont was said to be unable to proceed on his journey, his supplies having given out; at others he was surrounded by the tribesmen and his troops were cut to pieces; at others he had reached the city, and had succeeded in entering its gates, only to increase the sufferings of the besieged, for he brought no provisions with him. Even after he was supposed to be within the walls the city was attacked by 10,000 rebels, who, however, if the report can be trusted, were repulsed. France, meantime, is in the wildest excitement. It is dispatching new reinforcements, but they are so poorly equipped that the second relief column set out on its journey fully twenty days after its departure was announced. Transports are hurrying from Marseilles with foodstuffs, but meantime what is happening in Fez no one can say with certainty. The besiegers have been repulsed, we are told, but their secret emissaries have worked their way into the city and are breeding disaffection everywhere. At any day Mulai Hafid may be assassinated and the narrow streets of Fez may be littered with the mangled bodies of the foreign inhabitants.

But the most alarming feature of all this commotion is that even if there is no treacherous, underhand work on the part of the Moors in the city, one false step made by France in its attempt at pacification may set all Europe ablaze. Germany, which came so near a conflict with it a few years ago, when Delcassé had to resign his office, is watching every move on the board, and already France has had to assure the authorities at Berlin that there was positively no thought of the permanent occupation of Fez; but that the only purpose in view was the protection of the resident Europeans and the settling of Mulai Hafid on his throne. Nevertheless, some of the German papers are warning France that she must remember that "she carries the responsibility for the consequences of the measures she employs," and that "a breach of important provisions of the Algeciras Act, even if the breach were brought about by the force of external circumstances and against the will of the Power concerned, would restore to all the Powers their complete freedom of action, and might in this way lead to consequences of a kind which cannot at present be seen."

On the other hand, the English press is talking about necessary alliances between England and Russia, the preparedness of Germany for war, and the need of treating a sensitive nation like France with more than usual care in the present crisis. But whether trouble between the nations occurs or not in consequence of this miserable African squabble, France finds herself now in a most anomalous position. While the Government is persecuting its own Catholic subjects at home for their faith, the nation is risking its existence in behalf of the most bitter foes of Christianity. And yet if war were declared the Sisters of Charity would again be found in the hospitals and on the battle field; the priests would be kneeling in the forefront over the wounded and the dying, and the first to give their lives for their country would be the Catholic youth of the land, though they are now considered less worthy of consideration than the implacable enemies of Jesus Christ.

X.

John La Farge*

Mr. Cortissoz's memoir of John La Farge, which may be more fitly called a biographical study than a "Life" in the strict sense, is of particular interest to those who have known Mr. La Farge, and realize that "the task of painting him," as his intimate friend, Mr. Henry Adams wrote to Mr. Cortissoz, "is so difficult as to scare any literary artist out of his wits. . . . Complexity cannot be handled in print to that degree." The author, however, has been especially fitted to present just the dominant feature in John La Farge's career, his many-sided, yet most distinctive personality, which revealed itself chiefly in his conversation. Twenty years of intimacy enabled Mr. Cortissoz to give us John La Farge in a wonderful totality, as far as any complete portrait could be given of one whose aim was to essay to the utmost, rather than to achieve a success that could be catalogued and graded. Even brief citations from Mr. Cortissoz's book would show at once the difficulty of the task, and the peculiar felicitousness with which it has been done. One point, however, deserves particular mention.

*John La Farge. A Memoir and a Study. By Royal Cortissoz. New York and Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co., 1911.

John La Farge's religion is dealt with briefly,—for such matters are not easy to discuss,—and Mr. Cortissoz, who is a Protestant, wisely judged that a man's religious views would be more aptly presented by one of his own faith. The words of the writer on this point are carefully chosen, and save for certain phrases which may convey a false impression are, in the main, true. They bear witness to John La Farge's unshaken faith and loyalty to the Church. "As his son, Father John, told me," writes Mr. Cortissoz, "Mr. La Farge died with a lively Christian faith."

I, as his son, can testify that I never heard a word from his lips that hinted at skepticism, or even at that desire to compromise, which is natural in Protestant surroundings. Though he was essentially a questioner, one to whom every human assertion had two sides, and very likely three, his faith always appeared childlike, implicit and absolute. Once, during his youth, after visiting Paris, misgivings seemed to have clouded his mind, as they would trouble any young New Yorker who had been flung into an artistic and literary society, such as gathered around his cousin Paul de St. Victor; the Goncourts, Gautier, Flaubert, Saint Beuve, etc. But at that very time, after his return from Paris, he wrote to my mother, then Miss Margaret M. Perry, an Episcopalian: "The formula the Church uses, (pray do not try not to understand me) is, that there is no salvation out of the Church. Those who have not heard, or rightly heard, the Church does not deal with (recollect this last). But the crime falls on those who have prevented their hearing the truth. Do you see how I should fear for those who, after you, would be nearest and dearest to me? If I do not do my duty by them, what reproaches may I not address to myself?" The instruction which he himself gave to my mother, after their marriage, and her subsequent conversion, seem to have restored his own peace of mind.

His vision of the world was too deep and clear to hide from him the wonderful divine Mind on which he loved to reflect, wondering what He could be who had made things of such beauty in the world. All things were to him imitations of the perfections of the Creator, and this reflection sustained his characteristic reverence for the humble tasks of arts and crafts, and made him believe that the stonecutter, the inlayer, or lacquer-worker should conceive his art as sublimely as the painter. In his last illness, he expressed his great desire to look upon the Author of the world's beauty. "The world of color is always so enormously new and interesting. I have never felt so keen an eye, so intense a delight in all the variations and problems of light, color, and form. New possibilities and new ideas come to me on all sides," he said, shortly before his death, suggesting at the time,—he was seventy-five years old,—the outlines of several new essays.

For the will of God he felt a profound reverence. When a question concerning a vocation came up, he had a dozen difficulties to urge, until somebody pointed out that it was clearly the will of God. "That settles it absolutely," he wrote. "There can never be any question of disputing God's will." In the midst of a hundred nervous frets and complaints he would astonish one by suddenly resigning everything to the will of God, as of one who knew infinitely better what was good for us. His special self-accusation was of over-absorption in the intense earthly delight of art. "From the point of view which may not have come up to you," he wrote in 1906, "a religiously attuned mind might desire a manner of destruction of the ambitions which might appear too earthly." "I no longer fear death itself," he told me in November, 1909, "I fear only the state of my soul in the eyes of God."

Indeed, reverence penetrated his very bones, causing him to abhor levities in speech, to be nobly conservative, and regardful of propriety in religious art, and to venerate deeply the Blessed Sacrament, the Saints, the priesthood. The spirit of prayer revived and grew in him in his latter years. "I try each day to have a pure intention in my work," he wrote to me in 1904, "hoping that it may all be somehow for God's glory, and at night I always ask God's pardon for the faults of the day." His last years found him frequently before the altar, praying for grace and encouragement. "While at Mass at Saint Francis Xavier's last Sunday," he wrote, "I found great happiness in the thought that there were others praying for me." He was singularly grateful for offers of prayers.

Mr. Cortissoz says of him: "Like his own grandmother, Madame Binsse de Saint Victor, he was indisposed to make much of the details of worship. For him belief and cleanliness of soul were the main things." This statement, however, may be misleading, for if he were delicately scrupulous toward the minutiae of art, it is not likely that so consequent a mind should care little for details in the supreme office of life. The details that he shrank from were of a devotional nature; pious pictures, (bondieueries as he called them) non-liturgical devotions, prayerbooks, and the all too frequent apparatus of positive bad taste in churches. The music tormented him. He was doubtless unreasonable, but the really important details of faith and of liturgy were to him sacrosanct. At Holy Mass, he usually followed the missal, answering to himself in Latin. In his last illness he apologized whenever he received Holy Communion for having forgotten some of the answers to the Latin prayers which he used to know so well.

His love for all the beauties of the Church was limitless. His reverence and taste made him scrupulous in guarding the traditions of religious art, so that he would ascertain just what colors certain sacred persons should be vested in, or just what help he could get from biblical archæology, without running counter to tradition. He sought to express the Sacred Mysteries and their lessons, rather than mere human actions and irrelevant details. He had an intense love for the Gospel. One of his desires was to paint all the scenes that had been neglected by most painters. But he was called away too soon.

One can hardly think, therefore, that he would have relished just that "Olympian intercourse," which Mr. Cortissoz in all kindness, wished for him: "discussing religious origins with Renan and Solomon Reinach." Such discussion at any rate could not imply kinship of views. Christ the Lord was to him the divine Son of Mary, in the most obvious Catholic sense, whom he adored and prayed to as God, whether in the mysteries of the Gospel or the seclusion of the Tabernacle. He was never interested in the vagaries of biblical criticism. His historical sense was too accurate to make them tolerable for him. Evolutionary doctrines he looked upon with particular suspicion. His long study of primitive men and their beliefs always inclined his mind in a contrary direction. He was impressed by the complexity of historical tradition. He was always gently sarcastic with those who spoke of ancient stages of civilization as essentially inferior to ours, and delighted in little items that showed how the ancient Greek and Roman gentlemen, the Egyptian gardener, the Babylonian clerk, and the ancient Chinese jade carver were quite like our friends on Tenth Street or Fifth Avenue.

I was always impressed by his vivid sense of the grandeur of the saints' lives, and his enjoyment of their writings, especially his delight in the kindness of a scholarly friend at the Century Club, who used to read to him during meals passages from St. Bernard, and of the great Mystics. Citations from the saints and from Scripture he verified and gathered up as real treasures. It was not always easy to satisfy his desire of further knowledge, as when he interrogated me suddenly about the moral influences that might have entered into the early youth of St. Francis Borgia. Nor were his sympathies confined to the saints of the past. His veneration for Catholic missionaries deepened with his increasing acquaintance with their work.

John La Farge was essentially and immovably Catholic. As Mr. Cortissoz says, "his soul was set upon a rock." He was nervous, fastidious, endlessly questioning. He expressed himself in a somewhat bizarre, and almost self-contradictory way, but he was far from religious skepticism. The real interior attitude of his whole life was shown, I think, in his final words to the Father who attended him for the last time before his death. "Place your hand upon my head; I wish to have the blessing of the Holy Catholic Church rest upon my head before I die."

JOHN LA FARGE, S.J.

Carlist Program Modified

Our readers may remember that when we spoke in a former article of the Carlist party, or Jaimist, as it is now known, we stated that, although it was well organized and endowed with a militant spirit, it seemed to have given up all thought of recourse to arms for the purpose of securing the triumph of its aspirations and hopes.

It is but a month or little more since we made the assertion, and lo, Don Jaime himself comes forward to affirm in a public and solemn manner the correctness of our surmise. The celebrated Carlist writer, Severino Aznar, has just published in El Correo Español, the official organ of the party, a detailed interview which he recently had in Paris with Don Jaime, who has declared officially ended what we may call the heroic age of the Traditionalists, or Carlists, or Jaimists, the age of armed defense of their politico-religious ideals, the age of civil war, which twice during the past century deluged the land with blood and spread desolation throughout the country.

"My followers and devoted adherents," says Don Jaime, the leader and exponent of Spanish tradition, "must not be so lulled into present inactivity by the dream of a future civil war as to refrain from that action which the good of the cause now demands."

Don Jaime, says Severino Aznar, sees in war not an ideal, but a misfortune, which, when just and unavoidable, is for nations what bodily pain is for the individual, a crucible in which his virtue is tested, a chisel with which he carves the statue of his greatness and his glory. In only one contingency would Don Jaime take up arms and lead to battle, and that would be the case in which antimilitarism should permeate the rank and file of the army and turn it to swell the tide of revolution. But this case is so hypothetical and so remote from Spain that he might just as well have passed it over in silence.

Spain's one militant political party is, therefore, in a condition of substantial evolution. During the past half-century it has caused the greatest uneasiness to the reigning house, and has been a continual menace to it. What the Carlists did or said was watched and studied by the ministers of King Alfonso, for Carlist rage and Carlist determination were not idle words. It may be said that the cabinet were always with an ear to the ground in an effort to catch the words and echoes that came from the Vasco-Navarrese mountains, at once the cradle and the arena of Carlist politics and aims.

Thus has Spain lived for the past fifty years. Fancy whether heed is paid to the recent official declarations of the son of Carlos VII. They have unveiled before us what was unknown, and therefore doubly feared, for the uncertainty of what might lurk behind the curtain filled the nation with anxiety and dread. Spain may now be calm and may devote herself with a serenity born of security to the development of her agricultural, industrial and commercial resources.

Undoubtedly, the old warriors, those who still bear the scars of former civil conflicts, will see in the words of Don Jaime a defection, even an apostasy, from the ancient Carlist standard, and will raise a feeble protest; but with him are the young men, the intellectual men of the party. The younger men are elbowing out the ancients, who have outlived their usefulness. A breath of transformation, of fresh air, is whispering through the ancient fortress of Spanish tradition. Books replace guns; ideas crowd out swords; the bloody struggle on the field of battle gives way to the struggle of intellect and labor; a keen sense of present-day problems has seized upon the sons of the grizzled warriors of a former generation, whose sole reliance was the valor of their hearts, the strength of their arms and the fire of their enthusiasm.

The Traditionalist party is like a man who, after a sleep of fifty years, awakens to-day and sees how behind the times he is. His ancient weapons are moss-covered and eaten with rust; his methods of procedure are archaic and useless. Don Jaime wishes to have his followers enter heartily the field of Catholic social action, to study the economic and material needs of the people, to live in continual and intimate contact with them, that in the Cortes and in the district councils they should make themselves the faithful interpreters of the people's legitimate and just aspirations, and that, in a word, they should make themselves faithful and disinterested guardians and protectors of the poor and humble classes.

As it is plain to see, this is a sane and sympathetic policy; it is a reconciliation of Traditionalism with democracy; it is to go forth in search of the people who are now the victims of political gangsters and oppressive despots; it is to work for their moral emancipation and their economic independence. The people of Spain hunger and thirst after justice, and only too often they hunger after the bread that nourishes the body. They live on short rations, for living is dear and work is both scarce and poorly paid. Politics have ruined the country. Hunger and discontent have driven the workingmen into the ranks of the radicals and extremists. The day that a political party offers to Spaniards cheap and plentiful bread, an honest administration and equal justice for all, they will cast their lot with that party.

To-day Don Jaime marks out such a program for his party. Will his party be able to carry it out and develop it? We do not know; we confess to grave doubts. The Jaimist party is so saturated with politics that we hardly dare hope that it will rise to such heights. The program, we repeat, is excellent, in fact the only one, as we understand the situation, that can build up a strong popular party.

Religion would be greatly benefited by this new spirit that Don Jaime aims to introduce; for by blotting out the element of exclusiveness, which has thus far prevailed among his adherents, and which has been, indeed, their distinctive trait, he has taken a great stride towards reaching a good understanding with other Catholics. Until these latter days the Jaimist has considered himself a being apart from all other men; for him, uprightness of life, highmindedness, and all the other lofty moral qualities counted for nothing if to them was not annexed the profession of the Jaimist political faith. To be a Jaimist was everything; to be a Constitutionalist or simply a Catholic was nothing. Naturally, they did not put it quite so bluntly, but that was their political and religious attitude. It was manifest, therefore, that where such principles prevailed the union of all Spanish Catholics was an impossibility, and the consequences of disunion have been deadly. If, then, this new Jaimist program succeeds in blotting out the ultra-conservativeness and exclusiveness of the party, religion will be the gainer, and by a great deal. However the tide may turn, Don Jaime has just broken the antiquated molds of his party and has offered new ones for its acceptance. His authoritative statements in Paris open a new era in the history of the Traditionalist party.

NORBERTO TORCAL,

Editor of El Noticiero, Saragossa, Spain.

Catholic University of Louvain

A principle, assumed as fundamental by the Trustees of the Carnegie Fund for the Advancement of Teaching, denies the possibility of scientific freedom and broad, liberal scholarship in those institutions in which religion is paramount. No one of the eminent body has yet succeeded in giving reasons for this faith that is in him at all satisfactory to the advocates of religion in teaching. These, holding that the most prominent place in education should be assigned to the training of the will, to moral development, to character formation, insist upon the necessity of explicit religious influence in every department of scholastic training up and on through the highest university courses. Theoretically, their position is unsailable; happily they can adduce concrete evidence, as well, of the truth of their contentions and to prove the folly of the axiom glibly quoted in support of the narrow policy of the Carnegie fund.

Catholic Belgium affords the example. In Louvain there exists a flourishing institution, thoroughly Catholic in spirit, whose history is an illuminating argument of the possibility of liberal scholarship and of the broadest scientific freedom in a school vibrant with religious life and activity. Founded in 1426, the ancient university was destroyed by the revolutionists in 1797; restored in 1816, it fell victim a second time to the ravages of the revolution of 1830. After the proclamation of Belgian independence the Catholics, taking advantage of the freedom in educational matters guaranteed by the constitution, with the approval of the Pope on April 8, 1834, reopened the famous school of olden days as the Catholic University. Though seventy-seven years in existence as such it has not, up to this year, enjoyed recognition as an independent corporation, and, in consequence, it has not been able legally to acquire and to build up an endowment such as its effective work would demand. The lack of this has been amply met by the voluntary support assured to it by the Catholics of the country. Although the generosity of these latter is called upon in so many other ways, they have not failed in all these years to contribute the half-million francs annually expended in the upkeep and development of the various departments of the school. A bill granting corporate rights to the institution is now being considered in the Belgian parliament. Its passage, which seems quite certain, will enable those in charge of the Louvain University to find a way to establish a permanent endowment, and thus to relieve their faithful benefactors of this burden.

The Louvain school is to-day a complete university with a theological faculty, the only complete university, be it said, in Belgium. It is a free university, independent of every other control, if one excepts the necessary legal regulation and recognition of the literary and scientific degrees which the school is empowered to grant. This quality it shares with the University of Brussels, like Louvain, a free, but unlike Louvain, not a religious but a freethinking school. Last, not least, Louvain is a Catholic University. Université catholique de Louvain is the official title that appears on the great seal of the institution. Following the ancient Catholic custom, the academic year begins with a solemn votive Mass of the Holy Ghost, at which all the students and the professors of all the faculties are present in their official gowns. Over the professor's tribune in each lecture hall hangs a crucifix. Every lecture opens with a brief prayer, clerical and lay professors alike deeming it the proper thing to sign themselves with the sign of the cross, and to invoke God's light and grace before their lectures. The official program of studies announces a course in advanced Christian Doctrine: "L'explication approfondie des vérités fondamentales de la Religion," lectures in which are given once a week, and are of obligation through two semestres for the students of all faculties, except that of theology. To be sure, all this, if one heeds the Carnegie trustees, is a sign and seal of Louvain's inferiority in scholarly achievement. Let us see whether their contention is true. An official report of the Belgian Minister of Instruction (Situation de l'Enseignement Supérieur, présenté aux chambres législatives le 26 November, 1908. Rapport triennal 1904, 1905, 1906. Bruxelles, 1909), issued two years ago, will be our authority for the statements now made.

The number of students matriculating at a university offers some indication of the place it holds in public esteem, as well as of its reputation as an institution of advanced learning. There are in Belgium four universities: two of these, those, namely, at Ghent and Liège, are State schools; and two, those at Brussels and Louvain, are private foundations. The triennial catalogue reports the number of students during the years 1904-1906 to have been: Ghent, 2,689; Liège, 6,024; Brussels, 3,269; Louvain, 6,484. The universities conducted under private auspices lead the State schools, and the Catholic school shows a registration very nearly double that of the "liberal" or non-sectarian institution of Brussels. Evidently Louvain stands in excellent repute, evidently she is the most fecund Alma Mater in Belgium. Nor may our friends of the Carnegie fund explain the excess by a sneering reference to the number of theological students frequenting the halls of Louvain. The official report tells us that the theological faculty made a rather poor showing with its 115 students, in comparison with a registration of 532 in medicine and one of 595 in law.

But, to be sure, mere numbers count for little in measuring the grade of excellence of a school. Intelligent effort in its classes is what is looked for, systematic and up-to-date progressiveness in every phase of educational work coming within its scope, and, in a certain respect, successful results achieved by professors and pupils. How does Louvain stand this test? The Belgian La Presse, commenting lately on the educational question, congratulated the people of the kingdom on having at hand favorable opportunity to sift the pros and cons advanced by educators in regard to religious influence as a factor in educational work. "We have here at home," it says, "two schools of advanced teaching, the Catholic University of Louvain, and the liberal or non-sectarian or neutral, call it what you will, University of Brussels. Both are equally old, both have enjoyed the like equal rights." One may fairly compare their efficiency in the work they have accomplished." However, it were not unjust to question the equality of condition claimed by La Presse. The Brussels institution is established in the country's capital, and may, therefore, avail itself of the admirable opportunities there afforded. The many hospitals, the rich museums and the numerous splendidly equipped institutions for scientific research work of which Brussels boasts are helps at hand for the university's students. Louvain's abiding place, on the contrary, is a small provincial town, and lacking the facilities available in the lordly capital city, its faculties must perforce provide laboratories and other required equipment almost entirely from the slender resources at their disposal. It would scarcely astonish one, then, to find the record of scholarly achievement largely favoring the "liberal" university.

The opposite is true, however, as a simple analysis of certain published data will show. It is customary, it appears, for the Belgian Government each year to select certain university men, who have completed their course, and to give them, at its expense, two years' post-graduate work at some foreign universities. The selection follows a competitive examination passed by the eligible candidates before an official State Commission, made up of professors chosen from all four universities. The test is partly written, partly oral: for the former each candidate presents a formal dissertation on some literary or scientific topic, while the latter supposes a defense of certain set theses before the Commission in Brussels. During the years 1904-1906, 41 of these post-graduate stipends—bourses des voyages they are termed—were allowed, and the four universities shared in them as follows: Brussels, 5; Ghent, 8; Liège, 13; Louvain, 15. Practically the same proportion holds, we are told, year after year, a change worth noting occurring only in years when Louvain's success is even more strongly accentuated.

From the Moniteur Belge (Feb. 16, 1911) we are able to supplement the record contained in the report of the Minister of Instruction for 1909. That journal publishes the results announced following the competition held in 1910 between candidates from Belgium's four universities. In the faculty of Philosophy four received the prize, two being from Louvain; in the faculty of Law two were awarded the coveted burse, both from Louvain; in that of Medicine, five were declared equally deserving of first prize, two of the victors registering from Louvain; and in the department of Engineering, one of the two successful candidates was from Louvain. Thus, out of a total of seventeen specially distinguished for their excellent work in the four institutions of advanced training in the kingdom, seven hailed from the Catholic school in the out-of-the-way provincial town, and of these four won first prizes. Four of the dissertations submitted were deemed worthy to be printed at the expense of the State, and of the four, two had been written by Louvain men. The name of Louvain's non-sectarian or neutral rival, the University of Brussels, fails to be accredited on the list with any distinction whatever in this latest competition.

Surely, the record thus achieved suggests as legitimate inference a condition of things entirely out of harmony with the narrow dictum of the Carnegie Trustees: liberal scholarship and freedom of broad scientific investigation cannot exist in schools where religious influences are in control. Evidently, too, the professorial body, which makes up the distinguished faculty lists in Louvain's various departments, admits the inference and fails to find in the Catholic life of the university that insurmountable bar to efficiency in advanced educational work which Dr. Pritchett and his colleagues appear to discover in religious schools. And the Louvain faculty lists, in passing be it said, carry the names of men recognized as leaders in their chosen lines of scholarly achievement, names honored in the greatest schools of Europe.

One might add to the foregoing a word of comparison concerning the character of the "student life" prevailing at both universities, Brussels and Louvain, but our theme scarcely requires it. Suffice it to say that uprisings, and uproarious, noisy gatherings, and rows with the police and the good folk of the city, and similar incidents of undignified rudeness not uncommonly to the fore in the roistering experience of schools that enjoy the helpful consideration of Mr. Carnegie's Trustees, are rarely heard of in Louvain. The ideals of Christian manhood ever before its students, the reverence for law and order, which is an essential element of the religious atmosphere permeating their lives in the university, make such excesses practically impossible.

Well may the Catholics of Belgium be proud of their great school, the Catholic University of Louvain. It yields place neither to the richly-endowed State schools, nor to the neutral free school of Brussels, no matter in what phase of educational condition or accomplishment one may choose to compare them. Would it not be well for those among us who advocate non-sectarianism in educational training to tell us why they overlook so evident a rejoinder to the astounding claims they presume to advance?

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

Portugal on the Eve of the Elections

MADRID, SPAIN, May 1, 1911.

I have just returned from a flying trip to Lisbon, where I went with the intention of obtaining first-hand information on the state of affairs in that unfortunate country, so close to Spain through race, blood and history. The following notes are the result of my own observations and the fruit of the interviews that I had with various political personages, both Monarchists and Republicans, to whom I was personally known or for whom I carried letters of introduction from common friends in Spain.

The first impression that strikes the traveler on entering Portugal is the marked economic distress that exists in the country. The sudden revolution which in a few hours transformed the outward appearance of the nation has served only to increase and intensify the misery of the common people. The appearance of the Portuguese capital saddens the visitor's soul. Its fine harbor is almost deserted; its famous theatre of San Carlos is closed, for the theatregoers of other times do not attend; the palaces of the great are silent, for not a banquet, not a reception, not even a simple afternoon tea, summons the society folk to their halls; the very streets have lost the animation of former days; business is at a standstill, and firms with a long history of success and a high reputation for financial soundness are going into bankruptcy day after day; on all sides swarm people out of employment, and the laboring classes are without sufficient food. Yes, the pangs of hunger are felt in many a humble home.

A good friend of mine, who accompanied me through the streets of Lisbon, explained the distressing state of affairs as follows: "Don't be surprised at what you see here. Wealthy families who were devoted to the old régime have left the country, and their absence has paralyzed business. All the Spanish cities near the Portuguese border—Vigo, Tuy, Pontevedra, Ferrol, among them—are swarming with illustrious Portuguese refugees who seek in them an asylum from the tyranny and despotism which the reign of terror of the past few months has introduced.

"Life in Portugal is nowadays a thing impossible not only for persons with religious leanings, such as ecclesiastics and practical Catholics of the laity, but also for all true lovers of liberty, who cannot reconcile themselves to the sight of their native land subject to the caprices of a handful of political partizans who enslave and dishonor it.

"The monumental blunder of the revolutionary government has consisted in foolishly attempting to strengthen the position of the republic by violence and terror and by persecuting political adversaries. It began by suppressing the opposition newspapers, the monarchist press, as if by that means it could stifle the public conscience; and in the field of newspaper suppression it has been guilty of downright enormities. Let one example suffice: There was published in Viseu a review with the title Social Catholicism (El Catolicismo Social), which, as its name indicates, took no part in political strife and no interest in political parties. Now, the civil governor of Vizeu not only suppressed the review, but also forbade, under penalty of the most grievous punishment, the use of that printing office for printing or editing any kind of a periodical publication, whatever might be its class or kind.

"At present writing there exists in Lisbon only one non-Republican daily, A Nação, the organ of the Legitimist (Miguelista) party. Its life has been spared by the Braga administration on the humiliating condition that it shall not busy itself, either little or much, either directly or indirectly, with political questions. All the other opposition papers in Lisbon, Coimbra, Oporto, etc., have been suppressed by ministerial decree, after seeing their offices mobbed and sacked by the rabble, with the undisguised approval of the Braga coterie.

"A similar course has been followed with the leading Monarchists. Under the specious pretext that the government could not be answerable for their lives, they were invited by the authorities to leave the country and take up their abode elsewhere. The more valiant and more calm among them, who have declined to leave their native land at such bidding, are the victims of daily affronts, insults and outrages. The end which is sought by all this is to make doubly sure the triumph of the Republicans in the approaching elections for the Constitutional Convention, so that expectant Europe may be notified that the nation has approved at the polls the work of the revolutionists and the establishment of a new régime."

During my stay in Portugal it was brought home to me with overwhelming force that the Braga administration is greatly exercised over the coming elections. It seemed to it that by putting them off and by taking some time to carry out its policy of persecution against the Monarchists, by suppressing their newspapers and by driving into exile their most distinguished representatives, it could be sure of the victory at the polls on account of having thus summarily silenced all opposition. But precisely the contrary has happened. If, the day after Manuel had been dethroned and exiled, Braga had called upon the people to express their will at an election, he might have secured an immense Republican majority; for the wonderment, the confusion, the anxiety, and the terror of those first days would undoubtedly have produced that result. But the time has passed; public opinion has recovered its wits after that trying period of bewilderment and fright, and the provisional government has done everything possible to prove by its acts that the Republican régime is disorder, violence, the throttling of liberty and the trampling upon right, all bunched together and dubbed a political system. Those of the lower classes who lent willing hands in setting up the republic, because they fancied that its coming would establish a state of abundance, well-being and wealth, realize already that their dreams of future comfort had no solid foundation, and the result has been an anti-Republican reaction, whose effects and consequences fill the administration with uneasiness and alarm.

A Republican in high official position at Lisbon told me, with every indication of disquiet and worry: "The day after the republic was proclaimed the administration ought to have published an edict consisting of a single article, namely, 'It is forbidden to exercise the right of petition.'" As I did not seem to grasp the meaning of his words, he added: "Most of those who assisted us with weapons in their hands to overthrow the monarchy last October had the Republican ideal not in their heads nor in their hearts, but in their stomachs; they fought side by side with us because they expected to have an income and to prosper; now they rain upon the provisional government a perfect storm of petitions for all sorts of jobs, posts, employments and pecuniary allowances. Since the money of the republic does not suffice for all these demands, many are dissatisfied, and the improvised Republicans of yesterday are the Monarchists of to-morrow."

Nobody ventures to hazard a guess on the outcome of the approaching elections. The notion of a possible restoration of the monarchy is gaining ground daily. One thing is certain, and that is that Portugal is not a republic, and that the events of last October have thus far produced nothing definite and stable. It now looks as if the flamboyant Portuguese republic is to follow in the ways of the unrepudiated and inglorious Spanish republic of 1868. One of the most influential Republicans in all Portugal said to me, "The day that the Monarchists sink their petty differences and unite against the republic will be the day on which the Portuguese republic will fade out of sight, and in fewer hours than were required to set it on its feet."

The above opinion is common not only in Portugal, but also outside Portugal, among statesmen who have every reason and every means to know Portuguese affairs and to value them at their true worth. A few days ago Don Segismundo Moret, ex-President of the Council of Ministers, gave a public lecture in the Ateneo of Madrid before a numerous and select audience. His subject was "The Portuguese Revolution, Its Causes and Consequences." His conclusion was that Portugal would soon be a monarchy, as flourishing and prosperous as in the days of its historic glory. NORBERTO TORCAL.

Successful Mission Work in Jamaica

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, MAY 1, 1911.

Buff Bay is a small township on the North coast of Jamaica, in the civil parish of Portland, and on Sunday, April 30th last, there was a dedication there of the pretty little church of St. Agnes, just completed by Father Guiney, S.J., the missionary pastor. Bishop Collins, S.J., officiated at the ceremony, and Father Mulry, S.J., preached the dedicatory sermon. It is the first Catholic church to be erected in the locality, Mass having been said up to this on a portable altar in the house of Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Russel, of the same place. On March 6 of last year, the cornerstone was laid, and energy has in the meantime supplied the place of resources in the construction. Strange to say, no little share of that energy has been located in the person of the Presbyterian husband of a good Catholic lady, no other than the Mrs. Russel just mentioned. The name itself of the church is his choice, because it honors his beloved wife's patroness, and there are signs in abundance that in his case Christ will come into His own again, and John Knox be ousted.

One of the most pleasing events to record in connection with the new St. Agnes' church is the charitable and pious action of five American carpenters, who, after having helped, according to contract, in the rebuilding of the Lichfield Hotel, at Port Antonio, in the same parish, proceeded to Buff Bay, and without any earthly remuneration, pushed through almost to completion what Father Guiney had asked them to do for God's Church in Jamaica. It was only the strict obligation of returning to the United States by a fixed date for other work which prevented them from leaving the building in a thoroughly finished condition. The Celtic cross above St. Agnes is an indication of the racial strain in these five generous benefactors; for in four of them the ancestral tree was of Hibernian growth; Brittany, we believe, gave its sturdy sap to the stock of the fifth.

The Buff Bay River Valley, which ends here at the coast, is well populated. Nine miles further up is the fervent Catholic congregation of St. George's Mission, at Arveat, where five or six hundred of the faithful are visited once a month by the missionary, and where from two hundred and fifty to three hundred or more receive Holy Communion during his stay of a week. At present, in Buff Bay itself, we have only a small membership, but there is every hope, with the blessing of the Sacred Heart, of a great and speedy increase. Moreover, Buff Bay is practically the geographical centre of this mission district, with its five organized mission centres, and its four hundred square miles of apostolic territory to cover. The fourth Sunday of the month is hereafter to be its Mass Sunday, and with a zealous catechist and teacher on the ground to carry out the directions of the priest, there is no reason why St. Agnes' Mission should not become a very garden of the Lord. It is the third church dedicated in Jamaica in the short space of three months, Holy Trinity Cathedral, in Kingston, on February 12th, and St. James' Church, Murtigo Bay, being the other two.

PATRICK F. X. MULRY, S.J.

General Congress of Catholics in Mayence

The Reception Committee having in hand the preparations to welcome visitors to the approaching General Congress of German Catholics in Mayence has issued the following invitation to Catholics throughout Germany:

"For the fifth time it has become the pleasant duty of a committee delegated by their Catholic coreligionists of Mayence, to address to the Catholics throughout the empire a cordial invitation to the General Congress which will convene here August 6-10 of this year. We are persuaded that the call we send out from this ancient Episcopal city, where St. Boniface welded the first links in the chain that was to bind together all German peoples, the call from the birthplace of our General Congresses, will awaken joyful echoes in the hearts of all German Catholics, and that, as in former years, from every district of the fatherland thousands will throng into our city to deliberate upon the works we are called upon to do.

"Our assembly in August will have a sacredness and a dignity all its own, since we are to celebrate this year the birth of our great bishop, William Emmanuel Count von Ketteler. Twenty-seven years, with unyielding fortitude, he carried here in Mayence the pastoral staff of St. Boniface, and in all that period he proved himself a gifted and a fearless leader in the cause of God's glory and the liberty of God's Church. A far-sighted and magnetic leader, too, he was, and Catholic Germany eagerly sought his counsel and heeded his warnings in the perplexing situations that were springing into prominence from the changing relations in the social life of our people.

"The gravity of existing conditions, so often foretold by von Ketteler, cannot escape the attention of any one who walks with his eyes open. That it demands united and harmonious action on the part of all Catholics, aye, of all who possess a Catholic sense, needs no proving. Therefore, we shall gather together to renew our oft-repeated pledge to profess our Catholic Faith in all its purity, to render it a living actuality in our lives and to defend it. We shall meet to renew our hearts and minds in the spirit of obedience and of loyal fidelity to the Apostolic See and to our own bishops and pastors. We shall assemble to confer together upon what is best to be done so to meet the many needs facing us to-day as to assure the well-being of the Church and the best interests of the fatherland.

"Therefore, with most hospitable and cordial welcome, we bid all Catholics and all Catholic organizations to come to Mayence during the days of our approaching fifty-eighth General Congress. Come full of enthusiasm for the Catholic cause; come in a spirit of grateful reverence for the memory of our never-to-be-forgotten leader, Bishop von Ketteler; come in right-minded appreciation of the serious condition of things about us and of the immense importance of the problems we shall be called upon to solve.

"The entire Catholic population of Mayence will do all that lies in its power to receive the Congress worthily. Committees have been formed from all classes of the civic body to make fitting preparations to assure to all visitors attending the Congress a delightful stay in 'golden Mayence on the hospitable banks of the Rhine.' These shall have but one aim—to arrange a program in which the hours given to serious work shall be pleasantly broken by recreative features to make the days happy days as well as profitable days to all.

"THE RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

"Mayence, Easterday, 1911."

The population of Ceylon at the present day, according to the census of March, 1911, exclusive of soldiers and sailors, is 4,092,973, an increase of 527,019 persons over the population in 1901. The soldiers and sailors would add a little over 3,000 to the count. The increase of Colombo, the principal seaport and modern capital of Ceylon, is remarkable. Ten years ago it numbered 154,691. To-day it is 211,184. The figures are taken from the Catholic Herald of India.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by The America Press, New York.
 President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
 Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
 Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

NOTICE

The editorial rooms and the publication office of AMERICA have been removed from 32 Washington Square West, to Nos. 59 and 61 East Eighty-third Street, to which address all communications must hereafter be sent.

The Light-House

Bishop Greer and Mr. Joseph H. Choate, the latter being the chairman of the Blind Workers' Exhibition, have signed a circular letter in the interest of the New York Association for the Blind, calling for $150,000 to build "a house which is to be devoted to the social and industrial needs of the sightless." Very felicitously, the new establishment is called a Light-House.

Such appeals, of course, make straight for the heart and the pocketbook. The very audacity of the figure of $150,000 will appeal to the imagination, and, doubtless, subscriptions will pour into the treasury of the Association in streams. The only regret we feel is that Catholics cannot make such a peremptory demand for funds on behalf of a "Light-House" of their own, which, though small, has for three years been diffusing its beams over the whole United States. Few were aware of it, however, except the far-seeing blind, who have used it, not for the purposes of industrial education or gymnastic development, but for intellectual enlightenment in matters which are essential for them to know and from which they were debarred.

About three years ago a few ladies—they were very few—were apprised of the fact that in all the great Blind Asylums of the land there was absolutely no Catholic literature to be had; not that it was deliberately excluded—on the contrary, it would have been welcomed—but there was none in existence. The Catholic blind were thus shut out of a knowledge of their religion, a comfort which it would be unjust and cruel to deprive them of. It was determined, therefore, to supply the want forthwith. There was no money to be had, but that was a trifle and did not deter the valiant women who had determined to remove the reproach. They formed an association which they called "The Xavier Free Publication Society for the Blind." Archbishop Farley kindly accepted the position of Honorary President and Father Joseph Stadelman, who formerly had been caring for the Deaf-Mutes, but was for years looking after the Blind, consented to do the printing.

A book for the Blind is not a small affair. A "Manual of Prayers," for instance, is about the size of an old-fashioned Family Bible. The raised points which spell out the words have to be distinct from each other, so that the reader, whose eyes are in his finger tips, can feel his way over the page with safety. Hence each volume bulks large, and, besides, printers will tell you that paper comes high. Nevertheless, though the financial resources of the young association were of the most tenuous and impalpable description, and though there was no hope of having any moneyed man back of the heroic effort, the work done in the three years that have elapsed since the organization, in March, 1908, is simply amazing. Thus on the list of books appears the Bible in several volumes; "Wayside Stories" (73 stories), in 4 volumes; "Selections from Cardinal Newman," 2 volumes; "The Following of Christ," 3 volumes; "Fabiola," 3 volumes; "Pioneer Priests of North America"; "Faber's Works"; Father Tabb's "Lyrics"; "Tom Playfair," and so on through an array of several columns. The editions vary from fifty to one hundred copies, and let it be remembered these books are sent free not only to Institutions for the Blind, but to a great number of Public Libraries, beginning with the Congressional Library at Washington. The length of the library list is surprising. Added to all this is a monthly magazine running since 1900, which, of course, nobody knows anything about except the happy blind people who revel in its pages, shedding light, as they do, over the darkened sea of their lives.

How these associates have contrived to do so much with the few dollars at their disposal is a mystery. It is a pity they have not some strong man of national repute, like Mr. Choate, to step out on the highway of the world and compel the public to stand and deliver $150,000 or more for this kind of a Light-House!

William Emmanuel von Ketteler

The invitation issued to the fifty-eighth General Congress of the Catholics of Germany reminds those to whom it is addressed of a fact that should not be overlooked by the individuals charged with preparing the program of our own Catholic gatherings. On December 25, of this year, the Catholic people of Germany will commemorate the centenary of the birth of one of the greatest and noblest sons of that land, William Emmanuel Baron von Ketteler.

Bishop of Mayence for twenty-seven years, he was a leader among his fellow-religionists in the dark days when Austria's defeat at Sadowa (1866) filled the Catholics of Germany with consternation and proved that their dream of an Austrian Germany was quite over. He it was who then sought to revive their courage, advising them to meet half-way the inevitable changes, and to permit no one to surpass them in their love of the German Fatherland. Meantime, he was strenuous in his efforts with Bismarck to secure for Catholics in the new empire such liberties and guarantees as the Constitution granted to them in Prussia. By word and pen he exercised potent influence in Kulturkampf days, his share in the memorable episcopal conferences at Fulda having been a predominant one. Von Ketteler, it was, with the venerable Archbishop Melchers of Cologne, who, in 1873, succeeded in bringing the bishops of the country to decide upon absolute passive resistance to the persecuting May laws. He, too, was largely responsible for the platform drawn up at its inception for the guidance of the great Centre party, and he was, until his death, a wise and prudent counsellor in its brave fight against the Bismarckian ideal of political absolutism.

Quite as ardent an opponent of the modern spread of capitalistic absolutism in industrialism, it was in the sociological field that von Ketteler won his chief renown as the friend of the "plain people." Early in his career he came to be conspicuous by his broad and discerning intelligence of the social movements of his time. Catholic to the core, he pleaded always the necessity of the intervention of the Church in the name of faith, morals, and charity, for the removal of the blighting evils of the day. The Mayence prelate was among the first of the able mid-nineteenth century reformers to advocate urgency of relief in the problems of increased wages, shorter hours of labor, prohibition of child labor in factories, and the prohibition of women's and young girls' labor. In all these needs he counted upon the initiative of Christian charity for the organization of productive co-operation associations destined to restore social justice on a more equal scale, but he made clear, as well, the right of workingmen to legal protection from the public authorities.

Theoretically, Bishop von Ketteler based his social system upon the teachings of the Catholic Church regarding property and the duties of Christian charity, developing the sociology of St. Thomas Aquinas, and demonstrating the manner in which it meets every social need of the time.

He was among the first to urge that in every diocese some priests should be selected to make a special study of economic questions. This fact suggests a feature that may be considered not amiss in prospective celebrations of his centenary. Suitable provision made to carry out this admirable purpose would serve as an excellent commemoration of the great pioneer in Catholic social work. Social reform here and elsewhere must begin with the regeneration of the soul, and it is only when the Church, through her ministers, shall have entered into closer relations with the new social activity that we may hope to arouse among the burden bearers of the world respectful recognition of the truth of Christianity.

Best Hundred Catholic Books

The New York Sun, on May 14, published an article from the Rosary Magazine on the "Best Hundred Catholic Books." The article should really be credited to the Liverpool Catholic Times, in which it appeared some months ago. It is from the pen of J. C. McWalter, barrister-at-law of the King's Inn, Dublin, and is but one of a series of letters on the subject which were printed in that representative Catholic weekly. The Sun's publication of the article brought it to the notice of many in this country. We have received letters expressing surprise at the inclusion of some of the authors whose works are recommended to Catholics. Exception may well be taken to such writers as Rabelais and Maeterlinck, or to any of their books. The list, however, was merely tentative, and was printed rather for the purpose of evoking criticism and not as an authoritative expression of the views or preferences of the editor of a Catholic publication.

The difficulty of determining exactly what books are best, whether for the general run of people or for a particular class, is obvious. Some years ago Sir John Lubbock gave to the students of the Workingmen's College of London his list of one hundred books in all literature best worth reading. Yet Gladstone did not hesitate to draw his pen through one-half of Sir John Lubbock's list. When the inquiry is restricted to Catholic books in English new conditions face the compiler. They must not only be written by Catholics; they must also conform to standards of orthodoxy in faith and morality. It should not be surprising, then, that in submitting a list of Catholic books for English readers a greater winnowing process must be resorted to. The Liverpool Catholic Times a few weeks ago gave a hundred authors or works voted by the general reader as deserving a place among the best hundred. The result on the whole would commend itself to many; the differences are such as might have been expected. Present day authors are given a decided preference, and the book which has made the latest impression is frequently given the place which a maturer judgment would have assigned to some other work, whose excellences have been overlooked or have dropped out of mind.

Sixty years ago Cardinal Newman pointed out to the Brothers of the Oratory that the literature of England was overwhelmingly Protestant. It formed a distinct vehicle of the Protestant tradition, and, with its huge and engrossing monopoly of the English mind, brooked no rival. Since Newman wrote a change has taken place; a distinct counter current of Catholic literature is discernible in the still mighty stream of the Protestant literature of England. To Newman himself is due no small portion of the credit for the transformation. He was among the first to leap into the angry flood, "throwing it aside and stemming it" as no other writer of the time could have done. A peep into "The Catholics' Who's Who," in England, in 1911, brings a startling revelation of what Catholics are doing to reach the proud eminence attained by their brethren in other lands.

Were the great Cardinal living to-day he would undoubtedly qualify his statement about the Protestant character of English literature, at least regarding that portion of it which has appeared in recent times.

On the whole the publication of these lists is stimulating. The great number of distinguished converts whose writings have been and are to-day adding lustre to the cause they have espoused will give strength to the appeal which the Church is ever making to the children of unbelief, particularly to those who are now living in darkness through the defection of their forefathers in the Faith. With an authoritative catalogue at hand of the best works written by Catholics, it will be easy for readers to secure all the advantages which reading brings to the mind without the necessity of endangering their faith, imbibing error, or losing that delicacy of conscience which is one of the brightest ornaments of a Christian life.

Bishops, Justices and Marriages

In the great Reformation days the chaplain of a British regiment hardly outranked a non-commissioned officer, and the same seems to have been the case in the navy. Chaplains, therefore, were usually of an inferior class. Sir Francis Drake's opinion of the chaplain who went round the world with him is well known. Titus Oates was a naval chaplain till the not over-nice morals of his shipmates could stand him no longer; and many remember how, in the "Two Admirals," Fenimore Cooper hits the chaplain who, having nothing to do when the drums beat to quarters as breakfast was ending, carried off the round of beef to his cabin. Military chaplains were fewer in number. But, though their quality may not have been quite that of a New England regiment's chaplain in the colonial wars, of whom it is recorded:

"Many Indians he slew,
And some of them he scalped while bullets round him flew,"

there is no reason to suppose them to have been better than their naval brethren.

Nevertheless, one can conceive exceptions to the general rule. No doubt there were clergymen who felt they had to soldiers and sailors a higher mission than that conferred by a government appointment. Holding the Church of England to be the divinely appointed guardian of the souls of those men, they would accept the chaplaincy in spite of its inferior condition, to perform the work of that Church which they imagined gave them mission and jurisdiction, and in their eyes their dignity as its ministers more than compensated them for their low civil status.

That they were in error as to the fact is not to the point, and we shall use them to illustrate a matter of present interest. In many places a minister of the Gospel officiating at a marriage is before the law merely an officer of the civil power, sharing his functions with other officers purely secular. The Protestant Bishop of Montreal, to say nothing of other Protestant authorities in Canada, seems content to accept that status. But the civil power does not make much account of its matrimonial officers, and the rank of those with whom it associates the clergy is decidedly low. In England the District Registrar is the secular officer; in this country it is generally the Justice of the Peace, a magistrate of the lowest order, and the Canadian system is much the same. When, then, we read that Darby and Joan have been married by a Right Reverend Protestant Bishop, assisted by a Very Reverend Dean, a Venerable Archdeacon and two or three Canons, must we not assume that these dignitaries have lowered themselves to the level of a District Registrar or of a Justice of the Peace? Against such an idea they would protest most vigorously, assuring us that in the solemnization of matrimony they view themselves exclusively as ministers of their Church. Unless their function be a purely social one, like the asking a blessing on the wedding breakfast, Canadian clergymen must say that, despite the unwary admission into which their hostility to Catholics led them, marriage is very much of an ecclesiastical business. Like the zealous chaplains of former times, they must accept the civil appointment as a merely external condition to the exercise of their ministry: the ministry itself stands for all the power of the spiritual order over matrimony.

Another Word to the Peace Society

Perhaps the good people whose minds are full of the grander projects of the world's peace, of universal arbitration and of the organization of a tribunal which shall review and settle the conflicting claims of the nations, may not take kindly to the suggestion, but is there not a more attainable object lower down in the horizon of their view that might suitably serve as goal of their earnest striving? The writer's attention chanced to be attracted a day or two since by a graphic sketch of the blight resulting from a recent strike of journeymen tailors in Chicago, sent to the Tribune of that city by a correspondent. The conflict endured from October 29, of last year, to February 8, of the current year. Counting an average day's wage at $2.50, the 30,000 working people affected lost in wages during this period $6,000,000. Curtailed business involved a diminution in profits to the manufacturers, against whom the strike was directed, running up to $5,000,000. There was a loss of $2,000,000 on goods carried over. Trades people usually patronized by the striking tailors were mulcted to the tune of $3,000,000, owing to retrenchments in living expenses made necessary by loss of work. Extraordinary expenditures of one kind and another on the part of strikers and merchants easily reached $1,000,000; and if one finally adds $3,000,000 as the amount paid out by the municipality for extra policing and other details necessary to repress the disorders accompanying the strike, one finds a grand total of $20,000,000, resulting from the folly of those days of economic strife. Surely, it is entirely right to term it a folly, since the only effects encompassed were a number of broken heads and limbs; a certain amount of bad blood between employers and employees, likely, by the way, viciously to affect their mutual relations for months to come; and an amount of trade diverted from the city which may never come back.

The Tribune correspondent says: "If, during the strike, the press had invoked a conciliatory spirit instead of giving publication to the reports of agitators, whose interest it was to prolong the strike, or of those who though well-meaning understood not the situation, this great loss could have been averted."

The Peace Association is a powerful organization, backed by almost unlimited resources. Its members, no doubt, are entirely sincere in their belief their efforts to cool the heated blood of nations by eliminating passion and national prejudices, and ambition and selfishness, and jealousy growing out of industrial competition will have a felicitous outcome. Might it not be well to try their fancied powers on certain warring factions that upset domestic peace, to learn thence the potency of the instruments they are forging in order to root out the rude violence of brutal war?

Newspaper Hoaxes

Sometimes, when not even a leaf is stirring in all the highways and byways of newspaper life, one of the staff will concoct a "story" instinct with novelty and interest, like that of the boy with a telescopic eye, or that famous account, with all details, of the transportation of some baby whales from San Francisco to the Great Salt Lake in Utah with the intention of stocking that tub of brine, and thus developing the domestic whale fisheries. These glowing descriptions of what didn't happen make pleasant, even if not very profitable, reading, and they hurt nobody.

It is not so long ago that the Scientific American, whose reputation as a reliable purveyor of news of a very high order is world-wide, reproduced a photograph which, as we now recall the details, had been sent to it from one of the justly famed potato-growing districts of Colorado. The picture represented a man holding on his shoulder a potato of the "Maggie Murphy" variety, and the accompanying text explained the process by which a potato as large as a fifty-pound sack of flour had been produced on a potato ranch in the northern part of the State. As soon as the hoax was discovered the vulgar trickster was favored with an allocution from the Scientific American which ought to have made an impression on even his pachydermatous sense of propriety.

But some of these newspaper hoaxes are too clearly inspired by a malevolent spirit, suggestive of power and evil purpose, to be passed off lightly as the work of one whose bump of humor is a hollow. When the originator, for example, takes refuge behind a prominent name, a cruel injustice is done, and later representations cannot undo the harm. Thus, while Vice-President Corral was in Spain, he was reported to have uttered sentiments highly offensive to the United States, charging our country with bad faith, double-dealing and trickery towards Mexico in its present domestic troubles. Such remarks from a distinguished public official were in very bad diplomatic form, and in due time were emphatically repudiated by Corral. The cable then fathered them on a certain worthy personage supposed to be in the vice-president's suite, and thus the matter was made, not good, but less bad. There it rested until it was learned from Mexico that the gentleman in question had changed his mind at the last moment and had not accompanied the vice-president, and therefore, for the best of reasons, had not been guilty of diplomatic impropriety in Spain.

Another case in point is the detailed report of an attempt to assassinate President Arosemena of Panama. On the day after reading the "thriller" we learned that there was no foundation to the tale. Then came the announcement, made with a straight face, that the Vatican—in other words, Cardinal Merry del Val—had advised the Portuguese hierarchy to accept the separation of Church and State precisely on the terms offered by Messrs. Braga & Co., who, at latest accounts, were understood to be conducting a vaudeville show nicknamed a "republic," out of contempt for liberty. So momentous was the matter that the Vatican felt called upon to issue an authoritative denial of any such action on the part of the papal Secretary of State.

Falsehood and misstatement hurry forward on Mercury's wings, while truth seems shod with lead, but it will eventually arrive. When assertions highly offensive to the Catholic sense are flashed from Europe to our shores, it is well to bear in mind that the most influential sources of European information are distinctly unfriendly to the Church. There is no occasion for us to lose our peace of mind simply because the human element in the Church sometimes snaps the bit of self-control, or because the human element outside the Church delights in the contemplation of the Church's scars and wounds, and finds comfort in distorting the teaching and discipline of the Church or the actions of her accredited ministers.

“The day after dispatching my letter to you, I heard from my journalistic friend in Lisbon, whom I had requested to give you a clear view of things Portuguese as they are to-day. His answer was that it would be too risky for him to undertake the work, for as his opinion of the present régime could not be favorable, if his identity as the writer of the article were discovered he would be the victim of persecution at the hands of the Braga government. It is not to be forgotten that the Portuguese authorities exercise a scrupulous vigilance over correspondence, and that private letters are not respected. I at once adopted the almost heroic resolution of going to see for myself. I have a number of influential friends there, and I secured letters of introduction to other persons, Republicans and Monarchists, and thus armed I left Madrid on April 26 and traveled by rail to Lisbon. There I spent four days and discussed public affairs with important people of various shades of political belief; and thus I have a pretty fair understanding of what is at the present time done and said and thought in Lisbon. The republic is up in the air; a vigorous kick may bring it tumbling down at any moment.” Thus writes our Spanish correspondent, whose articles on Spanish politics have pleased and enlightened our readers. We bespeak their careful attention to his letters on Portuguese affairs.

“Question—I thought Jesus Christ was the head of the Church? Witness answered that Jesus Christ is the head of all Christian organizations, but that each organization must necessarily have a visible chief on earth.”

This is quoted from the examination of a Professor Jackson in a libel suit brought by a Dr. Workman against the Wesleyan College, Montreal, which had dismissed him for unorthodoxy. Counsel had in view to establish the fact that there is no authoritative exponent of Methodist doctrine, and Professor Jackson was forced to admit that by the “visible chief” of his Church he meant no more than its “chief salaried officer.” He might, however, do worse than to make on his remarkable answer a serious meditation, of which the first point should be: How can Our Lord Jesus Christ, essential Truth, be the head of mutually contradictory sects? The second point: What proportion can there be between Christ, the invisible head, and the visible head, a mere chief salaried officer? The third point: Compare his own answer with its futile explanation, with the Catholic doctrine expressed in terms almost identical; and, fourth point: Which theory is more in conformity with the Gospel, the Catholic, in its fulness, or his own, in its limitations and contradictions? Other devout Protestants ought to join him in this pious exercise, which, with God’s grace, would produce fruit to everlasting life.

LITERATURE

Books of Devotion to Our Lady.

Meditations and Instructions on the Blessed Virgin. For the Use of Clergy and Faithful. By A. VERMEERSCH, S.J. Translated by W. HUMPHREY PAGE, K.S.G. Volume II: Meditations for the Saturdays of the Year and Supplementary Part. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price, $1.35.

Meditations on the Blessed Virgin. From the German of the Rev. FRANCIS GABRINI, S.J. New Edition Carefully Revised by the Right Rev. ALEX. MACDONALD, D.D., Bishop of Victoria. New York: Christian Press Association Publishing Company. Price, $1.00 net.

The English Lourdes. By Father CLEMENT TYCK, C.R.P. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price, 70 cents.

If these books were of use only in the month of May a notice of them now would come rather late. But devotion to the Mother of God is not confined to any one month, even to May, although the latter has been and is particularly associated in popular Catholic regard and in a vein of most felicitously poetic affection with the Queen of Heaven. Moreover, it happens that the two volumes of meditations have not been prepared with special reference to Mary’s month, but have been arranged for Saturdays throughout the year, Saturday being the day dedicated by the Church’s liturgy and popular practise to Mary’s service and devotion.

Unlike many other devotions, the exercise or neglect of which may be viewed with indifference, or, at least, may be met with the explanation that they do not appeal to one’s characteristic temper, needs or circumstances, devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary has been proved by the experience of centuries to be a safeguard of Faith and an imperative Catholic practise. As Father Vermeersch observes in one of his meditations, “Most heretics give up devotion to Mary. Jansenism joins hands with Protestantism in abandoning the Blessed Virgin; and even in the Catholic Church a coolness in devotion to Mary is generally the first sign of religious indifference.” We have here the reason why the Church represents Mary as the slayer of heresies, for heresy enters upon a period of decay ending ultimately in extinction as soon as it is severed from the parent Vine which is Christ. It thrives most destructively as a secret malady in the Church. Its attitude toward the Mother of God forces it into the open and brands it with the danger sign; and from that hour, while it may continue to be a troublesome enemy to the Church and a scandal to many, it ceases to be an insidious snare for the unwary and a menace to orthodoxy. Perhaps the best critical estimate of Modernism in its relation to religious truth could be found by a study of its ideas on devotion to the Blessed Virgin.

Hence, we must acknowledge the force of the observation contained in the preface of the book, which the learned Bishop MacDonald presents to English readers, that there cannot be a superabundance of good books on the Blessed Virgin. Unusually good are the two volumes of meditations which we are called upon to notice here. They are solid intellectually and the note of feeling struck by them is pitched in that key of sincerity and restraint which appeals to Northern fervor. Father Vermeersch, as one might expect, gives prominence to the theological structure of the devotion, without, however, neglecting what St. Ignatius tells us is an essential purpose of all good prayer, namely, the quickening of the will through the medium of reflection. Father Gabrini’s meditations are less formally presented; and, perhaps, better suited to the popular taste. Both books deserve a place in every Catholic library. The translation is in each instance most satisfactory; and we share the hope of the authors that they will reach a wide circulation and promote largely love and devotion to the Blessed Virgin.

"The English Lourdes" is a little book which gives the history of a new shrine dedicated to our Lady in a little English town; it contains additional chapters calculated to increase interest in the shrine and to swell the number of its annual pilgrims. The name of the little town is Spalding, in Lincolnshire, in the centre of a district where the surviving names of ancient churches still testify to strong pre-Reformation devotion to the Mother of God. The present revival is one of many which may soon restore Mary's Dower to her. Among the interesting illustrations is one of a Catholic public procession in Spalding with a "bodyguard of Irish harvestmen,"—which, as a description of the difficult conditions still existing in Spalding, is remarkably graphic.

J. J. D.

Recollections of Abraham Lincoln, 1847-1865. By WARD HILL LAMON. Washington, D. C.: Published by the Editor.

This is a most enjoyable book. No one knew Lincoln better than his law partner and his life-long friend, Mr. Lamon, who writes these "Recollections," and one is tempted to say no one has made us better acquainted with the great man who was in all circumstances of his troubled life so simple, so approachable, so patient and so brave. It is a character sketch rather than a biography, for the chapters are entitled "His Tenderness"; "The Humorous Side of His Character"; "His Love of Song"; "His Love of Children"; and so on.

The story of his Gettysburg speech appears to us as quite new. It was not a success in the opinion of those who listened to it, and least of all in the opinion of the speaker. Edward Everett did not, as is commonly said, effusively congratulate him, and Seward declared himself extremely disappointed. It was only when the public read it that its merit was appreciated, and strange to say the first words of praise came from the English press.

Catholics will be pleased to hear Lincoln's opinion of the Know-Nothing movement, and will be grateful that Mr. Lamon has set it down in the appendix of the book. It is another light on the broadmindedness and discriminating justice which always distinguished Lincoln's life. "I am not a Know-Nothing," he said. "How could I be? How can anyone who abhors the oppression of negroes be in favor of degrading classes of white people. Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation we began by declaring that 'All men are created equal.' We now practically read it, 'All men are created equal except negroes.' When the Know-Nothings get control it will read 'All men are created equal except negroes and foreigners and Catholics.' When it comes to this I should prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretense of loving liberty—where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocrisy."

The Job Secretary. By MRS. WILFRID WARD. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Frank Norbury is writing a novel. His ordinary secretary goes off for a month and a "Job Secretary" takes the usual employee's place. The "Job Secretary" knows neither stenography nor typewriting, but is able to criticize the style of the book which is in process of manufacture. She is a very fascinating personage, and while suggesting corrections adroitly tells him her own story. The novel is thus remade. Meantime, as was to be expected, Frank Norbury, though married, falls in love with her. This matrimonial disloyalty, though it goes only to the length of thought and sentiment, has already had its counterpart in the Secretary's life. She has left her husband in India because of his admiration of a third party. This husband very opportunely arrives in London, reads Norbury's book and he and his wife are reconciled. Perhaps it is by way of apology that Mrs. Ward makes all her characters except the "Job Secretary" up-to-date pagans. The implied purpose of the novel seems to be to warn married women not to suffer in silence the transferences of their husband's affection to anyone else even in the incipient stages, and also to advise men not to expose themselves to danger. For the latter no advice is needed; common sense teaches it; for the former, a too eager adoption of the advice might easily degenerate into insane jealousy.

* * *

Saint Charles Borromeo. A Sketch of the Reforming Cardinal. By LOUISE M. STACPOOLE-KENNY. New York: Benziger Bros.

Milan had been for eighty years without a resident archbishop when Charles Borromeo, then a young man of only twenty-five, was chosen for the metropolitan chair which had been made illustrious by Ambrose and almost two score other canonized saints. When the youthful prelate took upon his shoulders the enormous burden of the archdiocese, it counted two thousand churches, one hundred religious communities of men, seventy of women, and three thousand priests. His great work was to "renew the face of the earth" in the spirit of the reformatory decrees of the Council of Trent, and to it he devoted the twenty-one years of his fruitful pontificate.

The archbishop experienced to the full the practical realization of that Scripture which saith that "the enemies of a man are those of his own household"; for the bitterest and most violent opposition that he met with in rooting out old and long-standing abuses was from priests and religious, unworthy men in whom the spirit of their vocation, if they ever had any, had died out, or had succumbed to the spirit of the world.

As a youth, the future metropolitan had been of correct life and devoted to serious study, a practice of his being to carry about with him a copy of the ethics of the stoic philosopher Epictetus, whose austere moral code made a strong impression on the young noble. But once in sacred orders, Charles found more congenial and more wholesome spiritual food in the writings of those ascetics whose pens had been guided by a reason that Faith had illuminated. His personal holiness, his works of zeal in behalf of his archdiocese and of the whole Church, and the influence of his example upon non-Catholics make a most interesting tale, which is charmingly told by the gifted authoress. God sent him in the hour of the Church's dire need, and he was faithful to his mission. It is a mystery of Providence why he and a few others like him were not sent a century sooner. To this life of a great man, of a great prelate, of a great saint, is very fittingly prefixed a copy of the much talked-of Encyclical of His Holiness, Pope Pius X, on the tercentenary of the canonization of St. Charles Borromeo.

* * *

The Chief Ideas of the Baltimore Catechism. By Rev. JOHN E. MULLETT. New York: Benziger Bros.

For simplicity and clearness combined with correctness in the definitions we can commend this little catechism. It will be almost impossible for any normal child not to grasp the meaning of the short pithy questions and answers.

To most of the present generation of Catholic readers the name of Mrs. M. A. Sadlier is, sad to say, hardly known. To those of an older and more appreciative era it will be a pleasure to learn that in far-off India her work is still doing service for the Faith. A translation she made from the French of Father J. A. Bouloune, of a Life of St. Joseph, has been rendered into Tamil by Joseph Pillai, of Bangalore, and published at Madras. The Catholic Register of that city declares it to be "one of those rare books which have come from the hands of secular authors and which go to meet the long-felt want of a real Catholic literature among the Tamils . . . and free from those flaws that have often brought down upon Tamil Catholics the censure of their Hindu critics that the Christian Tamil is a slipshod one."

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Job Secretary. A Story by Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $1.20.
 Sermons Delivered Before Mixed Congregations, Embracing Apologetics, Catholic Faith and Christian Morals. Intended for Infidels, Protestants and Catholics. Huntington, W. Va.: Rev. W. B. Altmeyer.
 A Complete Catalogue of Catholic Literature. Containing All Catholic Books published in the United States, together with a selection from the catalogues of the Catholic publishers of England and Ireland. Second Edition. Boston: Thomas J. Flynn & Co. Net 25 cents.

EDUCATION

The May Bulletin (1911) of the Catholic Educational Association has been received. The General Announcements regarding the eighth annual meeting of the association to be held in Chicago, June 26-29, as well as the Preliminary Program of the exercises thus far determined upon, show that Father Howard and his aides have the business of the congress well in hand. The local committees, appointed by Most Rev. Archbishop Quigley and made up of representative pastors and educators of Chicago, announce that every facility will be provided for the convenience and comfort of the Catholic educators and of all interested in the cause of Catholic education who will attend the convention. A special effort is being made to have a large delegation of the parish priests of the country present at the sessions of the approaching convention.

* * *

Following his usual custom the efficient Secretary of the association, Father Howard, has incorporated in his present Bulletin an educational paper that will prove of intense interest to all who receive the association's literature. No doubt the perennial question of the real measure of the efficiency of the schools of the country, in applying suitable means to fit the growing generation for future citizenship, will be frequently touched upon in the deliberations of the meeting in Chicago. In "The Educational Fact," an exhaustive study of the problem of morality and religion in school training, written by Rev. T. Brosnahan, S. J., some years ago for the American Catholic Quarterly Review the members of the association will find an excellent guide to all that Catholics affirm concerning the paramount aim of education.

* * *

One phase of the paper will evoke unquestionably eager interest on the part of all in a problem which appears to be looming large on the educational horizon. As Father Brosnahan states, the public schools of the country "at the best are religious only in so far as the mere reading of the Bible is retained in them; and the tendency is to abolish this. . . . The power that sustains morality is gone out of them." When, however, the movement to which our present school system is due was started in 1837, such an outgrowth of popular education was not aimed at by Horace Mann and his colleagues, to whom was delegated the charge of directing it. Mr. Mann, we are told, "had strong convictions on the importance of moral and practical religious instruction and training in the schools," and, "a genius for morality and practical religion in their application to common affairs." No idea seems to have been more abhorrent to the parent of the public school system than the extreme secular theory of education. As Father Brosnahan observes: "That the culmination of his labors should be schools from which religion, the basis of morality, is dislodged, and that the people among whom these schools have prospered should have so widely abandoned religion in practice, must cause his disembodied spirit some twinges of distrust as to the wisdom with which he employed his genius while sojourning in Massachusetts."

* * *

The problem which Mr. Mann tried to solve was this:—to devise a method by which religion should be taught in the schools without violating the majesty of the law forbidding the teaching of any denominational religion in the state schools, a law, by the way, for whose enactment he was largely responsible. How successful he was, the educational fact facing us to-day declares. "Virtually there is a national alliance to cut out of the curricula of our public schools those disciplines and studies that are essential to the formation of citizenship, and the preservation of civilization." And it is this national alliance with which the advocates of the newly awakened purpose to introduce explicit religious training into our schools have to deal. How they shall accomplish their aim, if ever they shall do so, is yet a mystery. Meantime, patiently bearing the burden the determination imposes, Catholics will persevere in the development of a full, rounded out educational system in which the paramount aim of the educator is never forgotten.

The Board of Education of New York appears to have surrendered to the idea that the new City Charter provision, for a small paid board to be in complete control of educational work in the Greater City, is certain to prevail. Commissioner Stern, at a late meeting, reported that in a conference of the By-Laws Committee with the legislative committee considering the charter, while certain minor concessions protecting the rights of teachers had been agreed upon, in the matter of the paid board and the power of initiative as to the course of study and the licensing of teachers the legislative committee refused to budge one inch, flatly, and as Mr. Stern feared, finally.

Dr. Maxwell, City Superintendent, sharply criticized the By-Laws Committee for its failure to make a longer and harder fight for an unpaid school board. "The proposals favored in the new charter," he affirmed, "are in each instance the reverse of what educational experience throughout the United States has demonstrated to be the better way. They are simply a threatened return to primitive conditions of inefficiency in school administration." He added that though the schools at present had their weak points, they were doing sound and honest work, and though their progress toward greater efficiency was necessarily slow, it was unwavering and sure. But he would have no one mistake his opinion that the schools are bound to retrograde under the administration of a paid board having complete jurisdiction in school technique and in executive control.

Rabbi Wise, in a recent address at the Free Synagogue of this city, made bold to warn his hearers, and through them, presumably, the world at large, that "the American school must be kept free from sectarian influence and denominational entanglements." Of course he uses the usual rhetoric,—the one weapon available to meet the contentions of the advocates of certain changes in our school system. No one denies that education is a help in the Americanization of foreigners coming to our shores, but surely it will be no less a help if it be broadened in such a way as to admit what wise men concede to be the paramount interest in education. Will the Rabbi be good enough to explain why we should, in our aim to be unsectarian, descend to sectarianism of the vilest kind and satisfy no one save him who believes in no religious creed whatever?

By a curious coincidence the New York Times, the morning on which the report of the Rabbi's warning that "no name, however high, and no office, however exalted, will shield the men who plan an assault on what ought to be forever one of the inviolable institutions of American life," contained an editorial on "Free" schools. It shows how wide, in truth, is the formative influence of the "institution" the Rabbi uses his rhetoric to defend.

"What portion of the children of the country get what good there is to be got from the public schools?" says the Times. "The Sage Foundation has made a study of this question, the results of which have been presented in considerable detail, covering 386 of the larger cities. The following little table shows how many of every eighteen pupils there are at three successive stages, with the average age:

Grade.	Age.	Number.	Per Cent.
First	6	18	100.0
Fifth	11	10	55.0
Eighth	14	5	27.5
High School ..	18	1	5.5

"This is not an encouraging picture. It shows very serious defects in our system considered as a system of general and free schooling—schooling that only half the children of 11 or over have, and a little more than a fourth of the children of 14, cannot be called 'general.' Still less can it be called so for the class supposed to be benefited by the high schools, of whom less than 6 per cent. remain to graduate. And since the families where children are withdrawn at 11 or 14 continue to pay taxes, indirectly but surely, the schooling can hardly be called 'free.'"

SOCIOLOGY

Once upon a time, many centuries ago, a man of the Matabele while crossing a stream noticed a pebble about the size of a hen's egg. It was very white and translucent, more beautiful than any stone he had ever seen. He took it to the kraal, where the sorcerers pronounced it a most potent fetish. The king put it into his treasury and it was consulted at every public crisis. It was called Umbeyu.

At length white men came to the country. They caught sight of Umbeyu, and assured the reigning king that it was a royal gem, called by their people diamond; that its value was enormous, greater than that of all the country round, with its flocks and herds. This pleased the king greatly. He began to see himself lord of all the Matabele, and confided his ambition to the newcomers. These soon let him know that they had different ideas on the subject. "Yesterday, O King," they said, "that was a worthless pebble: to-day it is beyond all price. This increase is due exclusively to us. It is the fruit of our labor and suffering in coming hither over the great ocean and the broad veldt, of our money, which represents our toil, paid to ships to carry us, and spent on wagons, oxen, food and clothing. What is yours in the diamond is but the value of the labor of picking it up, which we will repay abundantly with this piece of red cloth large enough to make imperial robes for yourself, your queens and all your princes and princesses, provided it be cut economically and the robes be not too ample. Take, then, the cloth and give us the stone, or, if you prefer it, pay us a yearly tribute equal to what its price would produce on the money market." The king replied in his barbarous language: "Res clamat domino. Res crescit domino. Vacam vitulus sequitur. Suum cuique tribatur"; which, being interpreted, means: "what's mine is mine, with the increase, and there's an end on't."

The other day a preacher, preaching to tickle his hearers' ears, said practically: "The Astors got hold of the land round about here when its value was small. They did nothing to improve it, but waited for your coming; and, now you are here, that land's value is reckoned in tens of millions. They put no labor into it, for they are not inclined to labor: you toil week in and week out. You are thrifty: they, spendthrift. Its increased value is the effect of your labor and thrift, and therefore belongs to you, not to them, and must be transferred to you by taxation or some other means." The Astors, could they speak Matabele, would answer in the king's words.

What is sauce for one rich goose is sauce for every gander in the land. It is not the rich families only who have benefited by the growth of real values. Every buyer of land, whether in large or small parcels, under similiar conditions, has reaped the reward; and so the workingman of twenty years ago is comfortably off to-day, and the workingman of to-day may be comfortably off in twenty years, if only he will put the savings of his thrift, too often an oratorical fiction, into unimproved land in the right place. Moreover, if the incoming of the workingman increases land values, his migration lessens and even blots them out. Thus, a few years ago, practically the whole population of Wadsworth, Nevada, moved to the new town of Sparks. What had hitherto been sagebrush acquired, according to the theory, its value by their coming, and what had hitherto been town lots became little better than the desert. If the increment of value in Sparks be the just due of the workingmen going thither, must they not be held responsible for its lapse in Wadsworth? So, too, if by coming to New York they have increased values out by the Harlem River, they must have diminished them in the same ratio at Kisheneff, Odessa and other places they deserted. Should the theory become an established social principle, its application would not be so easy as the taxing of a few rich families out of their possessions. A gigantic world-wide clearing house, most complicated in its operation, would have to be established to adjust the differences of the claimants of increment and the victims of decrement.

Eighty farmers from the South of Holland landed in New York, on May 14, with their families, to settle in Minnesota. They were in charge of the Rev. August van den Heuvel, who has brought over three parties within a little more than two years. They are taking up land with the assistance of the Catholic Organization Society of Minnesota.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The establishment of an International Press Agency by Catholics, with headquarters in Milan, was announced in these columns some weeks ago. The new agency will supply all kinds of news—financial, political, economic, scientific, artistic and literary, and will no doubt recommend itself not only to Catholic newspapers, but to others as well. A similar announcement of the foundation of this general agency appeared in the Catholic Times of Liverpool, May 5, with the following comments by Father Charles Plater, S. J., on the need and timeliness of this valuable adjunct of the Catholic Press:—

"Catholics in many lands are becoming convinced of the power of the press. They have discovered that the establishment of a sound Catholic press is in these days absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Faith. The duty of supporting the Catholic press has been urged upon us all by Popes and bishops and leading laymen: it is being taken up with increasing zeal. Even in this country there has recently been a rapid growth and interest in the matter.

"But we are not yet alive to what is one of the chief factors of the modern press. We do not realize the predominant part played in the modern press by the telegraph agency. We have overlooked the wire. The press is a great marionette worked by wires. Until we can control the wire we cannot control the press.

"A moment's reflection will show us that this is the case. The telegraphic agency feeds the press. Editors depend upon it for news. If the news which it conveys is inaccurate or garbled the non-Catholic newspaper will publish inaccurate or garbled news: the Catholic newspaper will publish no news at all but at most a tardy refutation.

"The telegraph agencies flash to all parts of the world a false or misleading account of a Ferrer case, a Portuguese revolution, a Papal Encyclical. That version holds the field and colors the public mind. Weeks afterwards the true facts of the case leak out and are published in the Catholic press. It is too late. The damage has been done. For the thousand who read the calumny not one will read the refutation.

"Now, the existing press agencies are in the hands of more or less anti-clerical parties. Even when the information which they provide is not absolutely false it is colored and distorted. Read the 'Havas' reports of the discussions in the French Chamber or the 'Stefani' accounts of events in Italy, and the bias will be apparent. Anti-clerical speeches are reported at length, while the convincing refutations offered by Catholic speakers are ignored. The editing of telegraphic despatches has become a fine art. Facts are twisted so as to reflect discredit on the Church.

"Yet as long as there is no independent agency in existence Catholic newspapers have to avail themselves of these tainted sources. True, they endeavor to remove the taint, but it is almost impossible for them to ascertain the true facts through the distorted medium. Yet they pay enormous sums of money annually for the privilege of participating in the muddled stream. The Swiss Catholic press, for instance, pays over forty thousand francs a year to the Sun's Telegraph Agency. The Catholics of Europe pay many thousands of pounds annually to the international agencies, which are the most formidable enemies of the Church. The Catholic press has got the pen. If it is to hold its own it must secure the wire."

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The Mission of Erythrea, in East Africa, which is served by the Franciscan Friars, and which has hitherto been a Prefecture Apostolic, has been raised by the Holy See to the status of a Vicariate Apostolic. The Bishop of the new Vicariate had been the Father Provincial of the Franciscans of the Milanese Province. Two other new Vicariates have also been created, one in the Island of Guam, and the other for the Marian and Caroline Islands, both of which have been entrusted by the Holy See to the Franciscans.

The loss entailed by the fire which broke out at Creighton University, Omaha, on May 8, is estimated at $60,000. The library and the physical and chemical laboratories were saved from the flames, but were considerably damaged by fire and smoke. It was found necessary to suspend classes for the five hundred students of the institution.

The Rev. R. M. Edwards, for the past nine years in charge of Christ Church, Brentwood, and the Church of the Messiah, Central Islip, L. I., was received into the Catholic Church, on May 13, by the Rev. John M. Kieley, Pastor of the Blessed Sacrament Church, Brooklyn.

Mr. Edwards is a native of Maine, and was ordained a minister of the Episcopalian Church by the late Bishop Neeley in 1876. He is an M.A. of Trinity College, Hartford, and was educated for the ministry in the Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Conn. His first work was that of a general missionary in Aroostook County, Me.

PERSONAL

J. C. McWalter, a distinguished lawyer and physician of Dublin, calls the attention of the readers of the Catholic Times of Liverpool to the career of Neils Stensen, a great anatomist and Catholic Bishop of the seventeenth century:

"Physiologists are seldom saints, and prelates are rarely physiologists, yet there is a reference in the current issue of the Medical Press to the great physiologist who was not only a Catholic but a convert, not only a prelate but probably a saint.

"Every time you move your jaw a little moisture oozes into the mouth. How or from where it came there was unknown for many centuries until a clever physiologist discovered the little canal which conveyed it, and which every medical student now knows as 'Stensen's duct.'

"Reviewing a work on anatomy, the Medical Press says: 'The necessarily short accounts of various structures are usually given with clearness; but, as a parting pin-prick from a pleased reviewer, we would ask, why is the name Stenson always now thus misspelled? The cognomen of Neils Stensen was universally rendered in our own student days by its Latin equivalent of Steno—very naturally—as, like all scientists of his day, he wrote in that language. And it may interest the inquiring reader to be reminded that he "took all knowledge for his province," founded the very modern science of geology, and, having become convinced of the vanity of material science, changed his religion and died a Catholic Bishop!'

"Nicolaus Steno—to give him the Latin equivalent—was born in Copenhagen in 1638. In 1657 he discovered the salivary gland and the salivary canal. He was the first to demonstrate that the heart is a muscle. Leaving his native city, he went to Paris to lecture, and afterwards sojourned at Florence, where he joined the Catholic Church. Ten years after he was appointed Vicar Apostolic for Scandinavia, where, Harmsworth's Biographer relates, he led the life of a saintly ascetic."

The Rev. William J. Ennis, S.J., for several years a member of the Jesuit Missionary Band working in the Eastern States, has been appointed Rector of Loyola College, Baltimore, succeeding the Rev. Francis X. Brady, whose death occurred on March 12. Born in New York City, February 14, 1862, Father Ennis, at the age of seventeen, entered the Society of Jesus at the novitiate of West Park, Ulster County, N. Y. For a time he was prefect of studies at Georgetown, and from 1900 to 1904 in charge of Loyola School, New York City. His career as a professor in several colleges was marked with success, and as a missionary it has been equally creditable. No better choice could have been made of a successor to the lamented Father Brady.

The Rev. John H. O'Rourke, S.J., well known in New York and the vicinity as editor of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, has been appointed Rector of Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y. Father John F. X. O'Connor, who hands over the reins of government to his successor, has been assigned to the staff of the Messenger. The new and flourishing college over which Father O'Rourke will preside will doubtless keep up its record of success under the new management.

The will of Amedée C. Fargis, of New York City, leaves $20,000 to the Homes for the Aged of the Little Sisters of the Poor.

SCIENCE

PLATINUM RECORD LEVEL.

Towards the end of last March platinum was quoted higher than it ever was before. The hard metal sold in Maiden lane at $43 and the soft variety at $41 per Troy ounce. The previous high record was in December, 1906, when the corresponding quotations were $40 and $38.

It was thought by many that the Russo-Japanese war and the conditions therefrom resulting in the Urals accounted for the scarcity of this precious metal, but now it has become evident that the increasing demand and the diminishing ore reserves are the true causes of the present high market price.

Colombia, where platinum was first discovered, was for a long time the world's leading producer, but the ores were soon exhausted. In the Russian Urals the placers are getting poorer and poorer whilst the cost of mining is increasing daily. In view of remedying this situation the Russian Government has on foot a plan of federalization of the platinum placer deposits and of supervision of the exports. This will no doubt help, but what we want is new placers. In the United States the production is almost insignificant; the small quantity placed on the market is obtained as a by-product from the refining of gold.

and silver in Oregon and California. There is also a little in the copper mines of the Rambler district, Wyoming. In spite of the most energetic prospecting and the help of the U. S. Geological Survey, only one new find has been made of late in Key West, Nevada. Ledoux & Co. of New York, who assayed the samples, reported between 0.1 and 0.2 Tr. oz. to the ton.

A. W. FORSTALL, S.J.

ARE COMETS OPTICAL PHENOMENA?

In the Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4492, Luigi Armellini fu Giacomo, of Tarcento, in a very short article asks the question whether comets may not possibly be optical phenomena, caused by meteoric matter of lenticular form and refractive power, which when facing the sun in various positions, may so focus its rays as to produce images that imitate all possible shapes of comets. He supports his theory with 15 photographs of artificial comets caused in the way mentioned, and they are all really good imitations. The editor, however, adds in a note that he assumes no responsibility for the views of the author. Astronomers also, we are sure, will be slow to subscribe to them.

Halley's comet is still visible in the Yerkes telescope. On March 19 it was of the 13.5 magnitude. It will soon be too near the sun to be observed. It will be in conjunction in August, but may again be picked up in September or October.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

In a circular, published by the Department of the Interior, on Coal-Dust Explosions, the opinion is expressed that the explosions of coal-dust can be prevented by proper care. The first method for rendering the dust harmless is that of moistening or wetting it, either by hose and nozzle, moistening the air currents, or by water and steam sprays. A second method is that of keeping the dust down by using a deliquescent salt, one which slowly dissolves by absorbing moisture from the air. Calcium chloride is suggested. Tests have shown that these treatments are in some cases expensive, but in the examination of hundreds of mines they have been shown to be infallible.

The purification of water by clay is seriously engaging the attention of engineers. Experiments have shown that for cleansing waste water for pulp mills 1.5% of potter's clay is ample to precipitate all the impurities. These latter are used as fertilizers with appreciable value.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

The Very Reverend Mother Mary Josephine Digby, Superior-General of the Society of the Sacred Heart, passed away at the Mother-House, Ixelles, Brussels, on Sunday Morning, May 21, after an illness of six days; congestion of the brain was the immediate cause of her death. She belonged to an English family of historic note, a branch of which had settled in Ireland. Of this branch she was born April 9, 1835. On her mother's side she counted a Jesuit martyr, Father More, among her ancestors.

Till her seventeenth year, the entire family was Protestant. Then her mother and eldest sister Geraldine obtained the light of faith and were received into the Church by the Bishop of Montpelier, in whose episcopal city the family was wintering. She shared her father's prejudice and indignation, which she showed by refusing absolutely to enter a Catholic church. But a sacred concert, given annually by the Montagnards in the Church of Notre Dame des Tables, and followed by Benediction, was the means God used to draw this soul to Himself. She sat rigidly during the Benediction. When, after the blessing, her sister raised her head, she found her prostrate on the pavement. What had happened? None dared to ask, but on her return home she said to Geraldine, "I never shall and never can say what I felt in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament, but Our Lord cast a glance at me as He did on Peter after his fall and compelled me to throw myself on the ground before Him."

The Bishop of Montpelier, on examining her, found she had a perfect knowledge of the Catholic faith. He baptized her, giving her the name of Mary Josephine, on March 19, 1851, and confirmed her and gave her her first Holy Communion two days later. With conversion came the grace of the call to religious life, and after a retreat made under Father Barrelle, S.J., she presented herself to Blessed Mother Barat. Her health caused her entrance to be retarded until 1857, when, on May 20, she was clothed in the habit of the Society of the Sacred Heart. Soon after her noviceship her eminent gifts were turned to account, first as Mistress-General, then as Superior at Marmoutier. During this period many of the grottoes of St. Martin's followers were discovered through her zealous ingenuity. The convent serving as a hospital during the Franco-Prussian War, her skill in nursing and influencing the wounded soldiers was a marvel to the doctors.

In 1871 she was sent to England as Vicar of the English and Irish houses of the Society. They numbered four on her arrival; they were more than doubled when, in 1894, she was called to Paris to be Assistant-General, on the death of Very Reverend Mother Lehon. She has governed the Society as Mother-General since 1895 with singular wisdom, prudence, strength and sweetness. These admirable gifts showed themselves above all when over 40 convents in France were closed and more than 3,000 nuns left homeless. Not one of them but she placed in safety; nor would she speak of expulsion, but of expansion of the Society; and justly, for it was given her to open almost as many convents as had been closed. She visited all the convents of the Society in the United States, Canada and Mexico during 1898 and 1899, fully appreciating the possibilities of these countries. Her superior mind undertook the revision of the studies throughout the Society. For this her long experience as Educator at Marmoutier in France and at Roehampton in England eminently fitted her. Her views were wide, deep and practical, and all her work bore a certain seal of perfection. "Her daughters shall rise up and call her blessed."

Very Rev. James McGill, C.M., former Provincial of the Eastern province of the Congregation of the Mission, died in Philadelphia on the 18th inst., in his 84th year. A native of County Cavan, Ireland, he began his studies for the priesthood at the Irish College, Paris, in 1847, and was received into the Congregation of the Mission in 1850. The Standard and Times gives the following brief sketch of his Apostolic labors in America:

"In 1851, being in deacon's orders, he volunteered for the American missions, and during the same year he arrived in the field of his future labors. He was assigned to St. Mary's Seminary, Perryville, Mo., as the place most suitable for his preparation for the priesthood, and on September 8, 1853, together with the late Most Rev. Archbishop Ryan, he was ordained in St. Louis by the Most Rev. Peter Richard Kenrick, D.D. After ordination his work was in St. Mary's Seminary, Perryville, during a year or two. Then he was appointed to preside over St. Vincent's College and Seminary, Cape Girardeau, Mo. He discharged the duties of the position for some three years. For a brief period he was assigned to Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y. Early in 1866 he was sent to Los Angeles, Cal., where he established St. Vincent's College and presided over it for eight years. During the vacations he was engaged in mission work in conducting spiritual retreats.

"He was called to Germantown and became director of the missions from October, 1874, until January, 1879. He was then appointed Pastor of St. Vincent's Church, St. Louis, Mo., and remained in that charge until late in 1883. About January, 1884, he was recalled to Germantown and made Assistant Superior of St. Vincent's Seminary. In 1886 he was appointed Vice-Visitor, and in September, 1888, he became Visitor of the Eastern province of the Congregation of the Mission, with headquarters in Germantown. He continued in the office of Visitor until November, 1909, when the infirmities of age caused him to seek relief from his official duties, being succeeded by Very Rev. P. McHale."

James Smith, chairman of the Manufacturing Committee of the Standard Oil Company, at 26 Broadway, died on May 15 at his home in New York after an illness of only a few hours. He was born in Cleveland in 1858 of Irish parents, and received his early education from the Brothers of Mary in the cathedral parochial school of that city. Throughout his long and successful career he was ever a loyal and sturdy Catholic, and valued beyond everything else the religious training of his boyhood.

Mr. Smith rose from the ranks to the highest and most responsible position of active management in the great company which employed him. Among his most notable achievements was the rebuilding in a few months on a larger scale of the Bayonne Refinery, when it was destroyed by fire in 1900. He was the first to handle Texas oil and successfully refine it. His reputation among his business associates was that of a man who was fair and generous, an enthusiastic and helpful friend, and one to whom the welfare of the working man under him was a matter of most kindly concern. He was always a constant and quiet contributor to Catholic charities.

Mr. Smith was buried from the Cathedral of Cleveland after a solemn high Mass celebrated by his brother, the Rev. Joseph F. Smith, pastor of St. Philomena's Church. He was a Knight of Columbus, and a member of the Catholic Club, New York.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

THE SENIOR CATHOLIC ACADEMY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Clorivière," in replying to my communication published in your issue of May 6, treats my article as an assertion rather than a letter of inquiry. Another reading would show that I have quoted from two paragraphs "Visitandines" and "Sisters of Charity" in "A Brief History of the Catholic Church in the United States," which says that Miss Lalor and Mrs. Seton each began an Academy in 1808. My question and conclusion came from the statements in these two paragraphs. Now if "Clorivière" is correct the Church History contains an error. But is "Clorivière" absolutely correct? You see I am still in a receptive mood, inquisitive rather than assertive.

A statement that the Visitation Academy, Georgetown, was founded in 1799, long ago led me to investigate not for the purpose of controversy, but to satisfy myself as to the reason why Archbishop Carroll, Bishops Cheverus, Dubourg, Dubois, Père Babade, Father Hurley and other ecclesiastics so interested in Mother Seton's conversion and vocation to a religious life, did not direct her thoughts to Georgetown instead of Canada, and why Miss Cecilia O'Conway, of Philadelphia, intended crossing the ocean to enter a Spanish Convent until she heard of Mrs. Seton's establishment in Baltimore. Mrs. Seton had no ambition to found a religious community, and Georgetown was not far from Baltimore. To enter a convent there would have been in accordance with her dearest wishes.

"Clorivière" may be in a position to reach the fountain head of information regarding the Visitandines—their Annals,—my sources of information are the Catholic Historical Researches, Shea's "History of the Church," the United States Catholic Miscellany of Charleston, The Jesuit, of Boston, the "Catholic Almanac for the Laity," and the "History of the American Daughters of Charity."

While seeking the information mentioned above, I found that Miss Lalor had come to Philadelphia from Ireland in 1797; that she desired to embrace the religious life, and had promised Bishop Lanigan, of Ossory, to return to Ireland in two years to enter a community of his diocese; that Father Neale, recognizing in her a soul especially gifted by God, hoped to have her found a community in Philadelphia; that she and two other ladies opened an Academy, but her two companions dying of yellow fever, the plan of opening a religious house in Philadelphia was defeated. When Father Neale was appointed President of Georgetown College in 1799, Miss Lalor, with another companion, accompanied him to Georgetown and became teachers in the Academy of the Poor Clares. The Poor Clares discontinued their Academy and returned to Europe in 1805. Bishop Neale secured their property for Miss Lalor and her two companions, a third lady, with a dowry, having come to them from Philadelphia. All three desired the religious life, and Father Neale suggested the Rule of the Visitation Order, a copy of which had been found in the library of the Poor Clares. Miss Lalor and her associates, after reading the Rules and Constitutions, expressed a wish to adopt them. Bishop Neale's efforts to get nuns from Europe to found a house in this country had always failed. The Ladies of the Sacred Heart had been asked, then a community from Dublin. The ecclesiastics of the time were opposed to opening another house, and Bishop Carroll thought Bishop Neale should send Miss Lalor and her companions to the Carmelites at Port Tobacco. A lady of wealth offered to go to Ireland and procure the Ursuline Nuns for a foundation, but the three ladies were firm in their wish to become Visitation Nuns.

In the spring of 1808 Bishop Carroll advised Bishop Neale to have them make a novitiate according to the Visitation Rule, and after its expiration to pronounce simple vows and to add a vow to enter the religious state. Difficulties arose to prevent this, and it was not until 1813 that Bishop Neale permitted them to make simple vows, to be renewed annually. When he succeeded to the See of Baltimore, in 1815, he applied to Rome for permission to make their house a convent of the Visitation Order. This was granted July 24, 1817.

Mrs. Seton, from the time of her conversion in 1805, desired to enter a religious community, and followed certain rules prescribed by her director. She opened a school in New York, and was afterwards invited to Baltimore, where she and other companions, with a religious vocation, conducted an Academy, but the foundation of her community dates only from the time she took religious vows in 1809. The community took possession of its own house July 31, 1809, not 1810. That house is still standing at Emmitsburg. The early Sisters of St. Joseph's knew there was an Academy at Georgetown, conducted by ladies, and that four years after the foundation at Emmitsburg these ladies became Visitation Nuns. Did not those Sisters of Charity consider themselves four years older?

I would not pluck a bay leaf from the brow of the Visitation or any other Academy in the land, but the present generation cannot change the facts of the past. All that can be done is to guard jealously the rich treasures left by saintly ancestors. It is a most pleasing reflection that the communities founded by those two great friends here on earth, St. Francis de Sales and St. Vincent de Paul, grew up side by side in the pioneer days of our republic, and have continued to do a glorious work in the education of the young, and while I admit that Georgetown has had an Academy a longer time than Emmitsburg has had one, I am still unconvinced that Mother Seton's Daughters (Women) within the limits of the Thirteen Original States.

S. M. A.

Cincinnati, May 15.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 8

(Price 10 Cents)

JUNE 3, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 112

CHRONICLE

Reciprocity—The Lorimer Inquiry—Arizona and New Mexico—The Standard Oil Decision—Wisconsin for Woman Suffrage—New Public Library of New York—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Spain—Portugal—France—Germany—Albania—Japan—Austria-Hungary—China169-172

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Portugal's Separation Law—Catholic Colleges and Catholic Writers—Madame Digby—Socialist Sunday Schools—Dr. Albert von Ruville.173-179

CORRESPONDENCE

Industrial Discord in Rome—Students of Theology in Germany—Father Fidelis Stone in Buenos Aires179-181

EDITORIAL

The Judges and the Law—Mexican Catholics Astir—The Phenix—Alsace-Lorraine—The Chamizal Dispute—Notes182-184

LITERATURE

The Fairy Tales of Mr. Kipling—Freddy Carr and His Friends—Freddy Carr's Adventures—The War upon Religion—The Residuary Sect—Education in Sexual Physiology and Hygiene. 185-187

EDUCATION

Italy's New Public School Law—Divisions in Belgium's Parliament over the Educational Question—What Each Public School Pupil Costs New York City—A Boston Martyr to Conscience. 188-189

ECONOMICS

The Economic Conditions That Give Value to Land189

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Canadian Orange Journals and the Church's Marriage Laws189-190

SCIENCE

Contaminated Vegetables—Nickel-Steel in Bridge

Construction—Spherical Mirrors—Protection in X-ray Operations—The Commercial Value of Metal Rhodium—Gasoline Solidified—Flocks of the Brighter Stars190

PERSONAL

Most Rev. E. F. Prendergast, Archbishop of Philadelphia—Maryland's Popular Tribute to Cardinal Gibbons—Sister M. Joseph Abell—Sister M. Antonio190-191

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Growth of Eucharistic Devotion in Germany—Annual Report of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith—Memorial Mass at the Navy Yard—Changes at Brighton Seminary—A Dominican Foundation for Providence.....191

OBITUARY

Richard H. Clarke—Mother Mary Loretto Quinlan191-192

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

The Senior Catholic Academy.....192

CHRONICLE

Reciprocity.—After careful consideration of Mr. Root's amendment to the Bill the President has determined that it is inimical to the measure and he will use every effort to defeat it. The difficulty in doing so is said to be increased by the desire of the "Old Guard" Republicans to prevent Mr. Taft's reelection. The appointment of Secretaries Fisher and Stimson is alleged as increasing the antagonism. A sufficient number of Democrats are also in opposition. On the other hand it is maintained that Mr. Root's purpose was to restore the original terms of the Bill as it came from the President and the Department of State and which were struck out by the House. Nevertheless, the President is convinced that the amendment of the New York Senator will open the door to many other alterations like that of the Senator, and render Reciprocity an impossibility.

The Lorimer Inquiry.—At the close of La Folette's protracted speech Senator Bailey announced that on account of the discovery of new testimony in the case and the resolution adopted by the Illinois Senate, every Democratic Senator now favored a thorough investigation of the charges.

Arizona and New Mexico.—In reply to the petition of Arizona and New Mexico for statehood, the House agreed that before it was granted Arizona should vote again on its provision for the recall of judges, and New Mexico should so frame its constitution as to make it easier of amendment. Congressman Litt'eton's eloquent denunciation of the proposition to permit the recall of judges was the feature of the discussion. It is thought that if Arizona refuses to omit the clause her admission as a State will not be granted.

The Standard Oil Decision.—On May 25, Justice Harlan filed his dissenting opinion. He declares that the finding of the Court, instead of giving quiet and rest to the business of the country, will throw it into confusion by inviting widely extended and harassing litigation. He brands the decision as mischievous. On the other hand, the President calls attention to the fact that any reorganization of the Company will have to be submitted in all its details to the Attorney-General for approval. As every conceivable kind of reorganization which would effect a monopoly has been especially prohibited by a decree of the Circuit Court and affirmed by the Supreme Court, the Administration is convinced that as a monopoly the Standard Oil Company has been destroyed for all time.

Wisconsin for Woman Suffrage.—Both houses of the Wisconsin Legislature have passed a bill granting suffrage to women. The bill carries a provision that it be submitted to the voters of the state for approval and if indorsed by them it will go into effect in 1913.

New Public Library of New York.—The new Public Library of New York was formally opened on May 24 by President Taft. On the stage with him were Governor Dix, Archbishop Farley, Bishop Greer, Mayor Gaynor, John Bigelow, Andrew Carnegie and others. The new building unites the Astor, Lenox and Tilden collections.

Its reference and reading room afford facilities to 1,700 people at a time, and through sixty branch libraries it circulates 8,000,000 books a year, and it receives 7,000 current periodicals. The Tilden gift leaves it a foundation of $2,000,000.

Mexico.—The platform of the National Catholic party, launched in the capital on May 11, consists of the following eight planks: "(1) The National Catholic party keeping within the bounds of the prevailing civil institutions, will exercise the right of exacting the reform of the law by means of law, on the constitutional basis of religious liberty. (2) It will defend, even at the cost of the goods and lives of its members, the independence and integrity of the national territory. (3) It will labor to make freedom of teaching effective, instead of a criminal mockery. (4) It will insist resolutely on making democratic and republican institutions, especially the freedom of the ballot, a reality in the whole country. To this end it accepts to its fullest extent the principle of no reelection as applied to Federal and State executives. (5) It will do all in its power to establish the irremovability of the judiciary, as the best guarantee of their independence, and as the most efficacious means of establishing a permanent peace in the republic. (6) For the good of the workingman and of all agricultural and industrial laborers, it will strive to apply to modern social problems the solutions which Christianity affords, as the only ones which, by reconciling the rights of capital and labor, can better the condition of the laboring classes without breach of the peace or the impairment of the rights of capitalists and employers. (7) It will devote special care to the founding, the spread, and the development of loan associations for the benefit of the small landholder and the manufacturer on a small scale, thus saving them from the loan sharks and encouraging the development of notable sources of public wealth. (8) Established upon the foregoing principles which democracy, patriotism, and religion unite in approving, the National Catholic party adopts as the expression of its lofty aspirations the watchword, 'God, Country, and Liberty.'"

The platform, which is contained in a manifesto addressed to the Mexican nation, is signed by the temporary officers of the organization, the chairman being Gabriel Fernández Somellera.—On May 25, thirty-four years and six months after his triumphal entry into the city of Mexico, General Diaz resigned the presidency. Before dawn on the following day he slunk away, under an armed guard, towards Veracruz on his way to Spain. His term would have expired on November 30, 1916. Secretary of State Francisco L. de la Barra made the usual affirmation as Provisional President. Vice-President Corral also resigned, and Madero renounced the title of Provisional President.

Canada.—The supporters of the Government will hold a series of meetings both in the East and the West to defend the Reciprocity Agreement. It seems certain that the dissolution of parliament is not far off; the only question is whether the Agreement will be passed before it or not.—There was a slight falling off in trade during April, the first in two years. The Government attributes it to the late opening of navigation; the Opposition, to the Reciprocity question.—To prepare it for the coming of the Duke of Connaught, $50,000 is to be spent on Rideau Hall. The chapel is to be pulled down and a garage built in its place.—British Columbia looks forward to freedom from all provincial taxation. Already mining and timber royalties exceed the yearly expenditure.—The entrance into the Canadian Atlantic trade of the Cunard and White Star companies is causing some anxiety to the shipping conferences. They hold it to be a virtual breach of agreement, and there is some talk of a rate war.

Great Britain.—Many Unionist peers are opposed to Lord Lansdowne's scheme for reforming the House of Lords. Nevertheless, the Government allowed it to pass its second reading without a formal vote, preferring, as a matter of parliamentary tactics, to leave it in some confusion. The Government Bill has been introduced into that House, Lord Morley informing the peers that no amendments will be accepted.—In his Budget, Mr. Lloyd George provides a salary of £400 a year for members. He told the House that he hoped to carry out the National Insurance plan without increasing taxation, but warned members that they must not attempt to diminish its charges or increase its grants in order to gain favor with their constituents. The leader of the Labor Party replied that the pockets of the classes into which the Government has dipped more than once are fuller than ever, and invited him to do so again.—The German Emperor visited England with the Empress for the unveiling of the Queen Victoria Memorial. Whatever may be the feeling of London regarding Germany, it seems clear that the Emperor personally is very popular there.—The first military airship has been completed. It is 502 feet long, and the gas-bag is 48 feet in diameter. The Government has named it very modestly, the Mayfly, with an eye, perhaps, to the chance that it mayn't.—The Imperial Conference met towards the end of May. Sir Joseph Ward, of New Zealand, the sole Imperialist, proposed an Imperial Council of State and a closer union of the Empire. It seems too late in the day for such an idea. All the other premiers opposed it, preferring Sir Wilfrid Laurier's intelligible, if apparently contradictory formula, Imperial unity founded on individual independence. The Home Government also found it unacceptable. A proposal has been made to change the name of the Conference, from "Imperial" to "United Nations."—Lord Haldane's territorial army seems to be on the verge of collapse. It never reached its full numbers; the period of those who enlisted in the first enthusiasm is expiring, and recruits are coming in very slowly. It is suggested to encourage volunteers by exempting them and their employers from contributing to the National Insurance fund. —Chile has contracted for two Dreadnoughts; Japan for one out of four authorized; the other three are to be built in Japan.

Ireland.—While approving the principle of the Government Insurance Bill—that employer, employee and State should combine to provide against the sickness or unemployment of the worker—Mr. Redmond was doubtful about its suitability to Irish conditions and commended its careful consideration to Irish public bodies. Great reform measures, as well as budgets, that were framed with a view to the needs of the English industrial centres did not necessarily suit Ireland, whose national resources and social circumstances radically differ. The details of the Bill are receiving close scrutiny in the press and the County Councils, and the general verdict seems to be that it cannot be accepted in its present form. The provisions for medical aid in sickness and maternity cases are generally approved, though many doctors protest that it discriminates against medical men who rely on private practice only. The main objections are that the Bill imposes a new burden of $15,000,000 annually on Ireland, altogether out of proportion to its ratable capacity; that it is unfair to small employers and the agricultural population, who are put on the same footing in regard to payments as those who pay or receive large wages; that Irish monies should be paid to a central office in Ireland, which could devise and administer a less expensive and more profitable system; that in compelling comparatively heavy payments from all laborers in Ireland the Government is only shifting the burden now borne by the community on to the shoulders of those whom the Bill is intended to help. The Galway County Council resolved unanimously that it is inadvisable to apply the National Insurance Bill to Ireland in its entirety, and that the Irish Party should consider how far the burden it imposes would affect the solvency of Irish finance under national self-government.—The census returns show a decrease of 70,000 in the last decade. In 1901 the population was 4,458,778, which showed a falling off of 250,000 from the census of 1891. The decrease is chiefly in Connaught, as Ulster and Munster are stationary and Leinster has a slight increase.—There were over 600 competitors at the Feis Coil or Irish Music Week in Dublin this year, and the quality of the performances, vocal and instrumental, was pronounced exceptionally high. Some of the prizes provided for free courses in music on the Continent.

Spain.—The official text of the proposed Associations Law, as read in the Cortes on May 8, is less radical than might have been expected. It is concerned with associations whose "exclusive aim is not gain or profit." Certain innocent-looking provisions which, nevertheless, place great power in the hands of some individuals (such provisions as are called "jokers" in American legislative sleight-of-hand performances) are the most objectionable feature after the cool ignoring of the Pope and his diplomatic representative in the whole matter. Each association and each succursal or dependent branch must have not fewer than twelve members. Every association shall have and exhibit on demand to the executive authorities a register of the name, age, nationality, occupation, and domicile of each associate, and an account-book in which shall appear the whole income and whence it came, and the whole outlay and for what it was spent. Every three years the association must present to the provincial authorities an inventory of their property, real and personal, and of their annual income. If they engage in any industry, they shall pay such taxes as other Spaniards pay when engaged in it, and they shall be subject to the general laws concerning hygiene, teaching, and regulation of the hours of labor, and to State inspection regarding the same. If an association not devoted to beneficence or education shall be juridically declared illegal, its property shall be considered in the same condition as that of one who dies without heirs (that is, it belongs to the State). Six months after the adoption of this proposed law, any association that shall not have complied with its provisions is to be "suspended" by the executive authorities, while the judiciary shall begin forthwith the necessary steps for declaring it illegal and "dissolving" it.

Portugal.—Complaints are rife over the arbitrary ways employed by the Braga inspectors to "purge" the electoral lists. In some cases more than half the names on the list were struck off. The despatch of troops to the interior to check an invasion is simply a ruse to have soldiers at hand to secure a "majority" for the dictator. Reliable news of the election can be expected only by mail.

France.—On May 28, the official bulletin announced that Premier Monis was on the way to recovery, but was for a moment prostrated when the announcement was made of M. Berteaux's death.—Another detachment of troops under General Moinier succeeded in entering Fez. They met with little opposition on the route, as the tribesmen were quarreling among themselves. Difficult as it has been to occupy the city, it will be still more difficult to leave it, and the consequences of not doing so will be to imperil the peace of Europe.

Germany.—Contrary to expectation the Reichstag passed, without delay, and by a vote of 220-100, the draft of the new constitution for Alsace-Lorraine, favorably reported to it by the special committee that has been considering that measure since Christmas. The conservative press is bitter in its attack upon the Chancellor in consequence. The claim is made that he failed actively to forward the wishes of that party in the consideration of the bill.—It is officially announced that England's young Prince of Wales will be present at the fall maneuvers as the guest of Emperor William.—In Cologne the new Hohenzollern bridge was opened and the magnificent memorial to Emperor Frederic III was unveiled. The Emperor and the Empress, accompanied by their daughter, Princess Victoria Louise, were present, and the occasion was made a notable one in the ancient city.—Before he left Potsdam, where he is pastor of the Friedens Kirche, which the Emperor attends, Rev. Friedrich Siegmund-Schultz, delegate to the Peace Conference at Lake Mohonk, had a special interview with Emperor William. His Majesty affirmed his belief in the movement, and would like to see it spread all over the world, but he wants to be sure that it is properly organized, and that a definite and feasible campaign is planned.

Albania.—The Turkish troops have not been victorious against the rebels. The fight near Kastrati lasted several days; and according to the Wicner Allgemeine Zeitung the dead numbered 1,500 and the wounded 600, which is probably an exaggeration. Tuzi is said to be surrounded and communications with Scutari cut off. In Montenegro it is supposed the insurrection cannot be suppressed until the Turks have concentrated 15,000 men in the deserted district. On April 25, after a fight of ten hours, the Turks were beaten back to Shiptchanik with heavy loss. Catholics, especially priests and monks, are being treated with great cruelty by the young Turks, and churches are being destroyed.

Japan.—A new commercial treaty was signed with Great Britain on April 5. Japan reduces the specified rate on twelve of the principal British exports, especially cotton, woolen and iron goods. The most favored nation tariff will be extended to all imports of both countries.—A great fire broke out at Tokio on April 9. The conflagration covered three square miles. Twenty-four streets were reduced to ashes and 6,000 houses were destroyed. Provisions have been distributed free to over 20,000 distressed people. The loss sustained by the insurance companies is about one million yen. The fire is the biggest that took place in Tokio since that of 1891.

Austria-Hungary.—The press of the dual kingdom is practically united in its expression of regret that parliament came to the untimely end announced in the Chronicle a month ago. Pending the elections, set for the end of June, all necessary official business must be transacted in an extra-constitutional way, by direct mandate, that is, of the Emperor. Meantime measures now recognized to be imperative must await the reassembling of parliament. Some of these are: the proposed reform of the finances, the insurance of the aged and dependents, land reform, prohibition of night work for women and children laboring in the mines, reform in the taxation of buildings, the new imperial military law in which is included the important question of the two years' service act. The unsettled condition in which these and other proposed legislative measures affecting social life and industrial life have been left cannot be but harmful to the country's interests.—Professor Neusser, the specialist, whose arrival at the royal chateau at Gödöllő, where Emperor Francis Joseph is sojourning, caused some alarm, is so satisfied with his royal patient's condition that he left early for Vienna. Notwithstanding the reassuring official reports concerning his Majesty's health, however, there is a widespread feeling that his condition is less satisfactory than has been represented.—At Budapest, May 23, the International Committee of the Olympic games conferred an Olympic medal on the Emperor-King, and decided to hold another conference in Stockholm in 1912.

China.—When the assassin of the Canton Tatar General was examined, he declared he was a member of a revolutionary society, and shot the General to avenge the wrongs which the Manchus had done to the 400,000,000 of China's people. Since the tragedy in the South, the Government and officials in Peking are terribly scared. When the Ministers of State and other high officials go out they are protected by strong guards, and patrols have been reinforced to keep watch around their palaces day and night.—Fresh rumors of the partition of the country by the great Powers are anew circulated. Only Shensi, Honan and part of Chihli are to be left to China. The Foreign Ministers have denied that any such scheme was ever agreed to.—The agreement for the loan of $50,000,000 (gold) from the "Four Nation Syndicate" was signed in Peking on April 15. It bears interest at 5 per cent., and the issue price is 95. It will be employed principally to carry out the currency reform and for industrial purposes in Manchuria.—The Grand Council proposes to reinstate Dr. Wu-Ting-Fang in government service in order to cultivate and promote friendly feelings between China and America.—In Peking, Prince King wants to exclude all Chinese from being Ministers of State. This will but embitter the racial struggle between Manchus and Chinese.

To remedy the drawbacks to educational progress in the Chinese Empire the Ministry of Education intends to raise the salary of teachers in order to get better men. It also finds that the standards for grades of students in colleges and industrial schools have been fixed too high, hence teachers and pupils have not reached satisfactory results. Such admissions disclose a situation which, despite great expense and praiseworthy efforts, is still far from being perfect. What is really wanted is to lay a solid foundation in the elementary schools and pay more attention to inculcating general and useful knowledge. Were this principle enforced in all schools throughout the Empire, the raw, blank mind of China's youth would find itself stocked with valuable and up-to-date information, and be thus enabled to undertake higher studies at home or abroad, and reap therefrom a fruitful harvest.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Portugal's Separation Law

"The Provisional Government of the Portuguese Republic makes known that, in the name of the Republic, there has been decreed with the force of law the following:" Then comes a formidable document, consisting of one hundred and ninety-six articles. It is dated April 20, 1911, and is signed by Joaquim Theofilo Braga and his squad of political apaches. No attempt has thus far been made to organize the legislative branch of the mushroom republic; hence, no "laws" can be considered, passed, and promulgated. But the non-existence of a law-making power is nothing when it is viewed by the friends of Theofilo as they meet "in the palace of the Republic" and wish to do something. Aren't they able to issue decrees? Of course, and they have issued a swarm of them. What is easier, then, than to decree that some particularly offensive and drastic decree shall have the force of law? Proposed; adopted without a dissenting voice; they decree the decree.

The decree "with the force of law," of this quality we are repeatedly reminded in the course of it, is divided into seven chapters, of which the first is entitled "On Freedom of Conscience and Worship," an engaging term, which seems to be borne out by "Art. I. The Republic recognizes and guarantees full freedom of conscience to all Portuguese citizens, and also to foreigners who dwell in Portuguese territory." Article 7 goes a step further, and decrees that "private or family observance of any kind of religion is absolutely free and independent of legal restrictions." Here the administration clears its throat, so to speak, and proceeds to lay down in Article 8 that public worship according to any religion is also free in houses set aside for it; but, in the interests of public order, liberty, and the security of the citizens, it must conform to the provisions of the law, and especially to the provisions of the present decree "with the force of law." Article 9 defines "public worship" not only as that which is held in places regularly or temporarily set aside for it, if they be such that the public may have access to them, but also as religious exercises held in any place with the attendance of more than twenty persons.

But we have been diverting ourselves with the parings; the solid, meaty part of the decree begins with: "Art. 10. For the effects of the present decree, religious instruction, wherever it be given, is also considered public worship, and educational establishments and institutions of charity and beneficence are always considered as places to which the public have access."

Bearing this definition in mind, we shall be able to comprehend only in a vague and hazy manner, strive as we may, the blessings that Braga bestows; for he tells us in Article 48 what may befall an ecclesiastic who should be so rash as to question the wisdom, the glory or the power of the Republic as set forth in any of its acts. The chapter contains fifteen articles.

Chapter II treats of the corporations or boards upon whom is to devolve the care of the temporalities connected with "public worship." These must be Portuguese corporations exclusively, and they are not to take upon themselves the character or form of a religious order, congregation or house, nor be related or co-ordinated with, or subordinate to, such institution existing elsewhere. Ministers of any religion are ineligible to membership on these boards, nor may they have any vote on them or share in any way in managing or directing them. These two may pass as samples of the twenty-seven articles of Chapter II.

Chapter III tells us in twenty articles what the benevolent Lisbon cabinet purposes in the way of "Inspection of Public Worship," that is, the share that the police are to have, not in taking part in it, but in watching it. Article 48 is a brilliant fanfare in honor of freedom. Listen: "The minister of any religion who, in the exercise of his ministry, or on the occasion of any act of worship, in sermons or in any public oral discourse, or in a published writing, shall insult the public authority, or assail any of its acts, or the form of government or the laws of the Republic, or deny or call into question the rights of the State embodied in this decree or in other legislation relative to Churches, or incite to any crime, shall be subjected to the penalties of Article 137 of the criminal code, and to the loss of the material benefits [pension] of the State."

After forbidding for the future the placing of any religious sign or emblem on any house or public monument, or in any public place, except on houses set aside permanently for religious worship and on monuments in graveyards, the cabinet blithely introduces us into Chapter IV, which devotes twenty-seven articles to the question of the ownership and administration of church buildings and property. The advance is made with quick and steady tread. Churches, chapels, lands, and chattels, which have been applied to the public worship of the Catholic religion, and to the maintenance of its ministers and other functionaries, employees and officials, are declared property of the State, unless bona fide ownership on the part of some private individual or some corporation be duly proven. Commissioners are to be sent out to make lists and inventories, returnable (very appropriately) to the Minister of Justice in Braga's cabinet.

Chapter V tells us in twenty-four articles what is to be done with church buildings and property. The cathedrals, churches, and chapels which have served for the public exercise of the Catholic religion, and with them the strictly necessary furnishings and fixtures, will be granted, without charge for use, to the board of laymen, formed or to be formed, for taking charge of the temporalities needed for Catholic worship. This grant, however, will be revocable at the pleasure of the grantor. Buildings not needed, including buildings in course of construction, buildings completed but not yet dedicated to religious exercises, and buildings that for a year, at least, have not been used for religious exercises, as well as such as by December 31, 1912, shall not have boards of laymen for their care and administration, shall be taken by the State for some social purpose, preferably educational or eleemosynary. Article 92 singles out the Jesuits for special mention: "Buildings that were set apart for Catholic worship by the Jesuits shall no longer serve that purpose, and shall be devoted by the State to any object of social concern."

Permission to officiate is reserved to Portuguese citizens who have made their theological studies in Portugal; if a substitute is needed, he must fulfil that condition and be licensed by the Minister of Justice.

Chapter VI decrees the "Pensions for the Ministers of the Catholic Religion." It also permits them to marry. The marriage of the ministers of the Established Church of England was authorized, we understand, not by a decree of an upstart cabinet, but by an act of parliament, which legislates on religion as it does on the hop industry. The pensions are so hedged in and walled about that we do not see how any Catholic priest could in conscience qualify for them.

Chapter VII is devoted to general regulations governing the great subject of separation of Church and State. This separation flourishes in all its tropical luxuriance in Article 184: "The dispositions of the law now in force regarding the intervention of the State in the conducting of seminaries, in the nomination and approbation of their professors and employees, and in the approbation of the text-books to be used in their lecture halls, continue in force." It is the "separation" that exists between a band of highwaymen and a solitary, unarmed wayfarer.

We really must find room for one more quotation from this modern Portuguese Magna Charta of human liberty: "Art. 175. Ministers of religion enjoy no privileges, and are authorized to correspond officially by mail with the public authorities only, and not with one another."

Many absurdities, many enormities, have been put forward heretofore in the sacred name of liberty. If the Portuguese nation is ready to accept the decree of April 20, 1911, sent forth by a handful of unauthorized and irresponsible adventurers, with no mandate from the people, may the Portuguese nation enjoy much peace and comfort from the strict application of each absurdity or enormity that it contains. Thus might one be tempted to speak, were it not true that in the present, as in all similar cases, the blameless and the helpless suffer, while the rogues rejoice and thrive.

After studying with no little interest this very recent production of enlightened modern Portuguese republicanism, it is with a sigh of relief and of heartfelt thankfulness that we turn to the first article in the appendix to the Constitution of the United States; for the first ten amendments are more properly an appendix declaratory of the Constitution than any change of principle or sentiment contained in it: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." How would that clause strike Braga?

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

Catholic Colleges and Catholic Writers

A private correspondent asked us lately why Catholic colleges have not produced a greater number and a better grade of Catholic writers. The question involved an unfavorable criticism of these colleges, so far, at least, as their methods of literary training is concerned. Our correspondent's line of reasoning is every easy to follow. We judge systems and processes by results; since the results of literary training in Catholic colleges are comparatively meagre, it seems only natural to conclude that the colleges are either careless or mistaken or incapable in their method of cultivating literary art among their students.

We have two faults to find in this argument. The first is, it supposes that non-Catholic colleges are so successful in this field of academic interest that Catholic colleges by their uniform failure in it constitute a distinct contrast. This supposition we are not inclined to grant. Even a cursory reader of contemporary prints must have observed from time to time a prevailing dissatisfaction with the results achieved in the English courses of the non-religious colleges, academies and high-schools in this country. One professor in a great university, we remember, felt obliged to suspend his lectures and to put his class through an elementary drill in spelling before venturing to lead their bewildered and reluctant feet through the primrose paths of poetry. We have not garnered and indexed a mass of authorities and statistics on the subject, but enough has come to us through various channels and at various times to coalesce into a very strong impression that the average graduate of a non-Catholic school is not a whit better equipped or more inclined than the average Catholic graduate to pour out his artistic soul in essays, history, novels or sweet lyrics.

The second flaw we discover in the argument of our correspondent is another false supposition; and this second false supposition is intertwined with the first. It is, that literary art is altogether or mainly a resultant of training. This is not true. If it were, great writers could be produced with almost mathematical precision, like great engineers, great chemists, great physicists, or great physicians. Industry, intelligence and opportunity are the only postulates required for predicting with certainty a brilliant career for almost any lad in the class of science. But he would be a rash prophet who would stake his obolus on a similar forecast in the case of any young gentleman at all in the class of English literature.

While multitudes of intelligent youths were pursuing literary studies with praiseworthy industry, amid the golden opportunities afforded by Eton and Winchester, Oxford and Cambridge, to be supplemented afterwards by the opportunities derived from an indulgent family and an assured income, Charles Dickens was pasting labels with his grubby little fist on boxes of boot-black and racking his boyish brain over the purchasing capacity of the few shillings representing his weekly salary. Opportunity is not everything in a literary career. Neither is industry; at least, in those early stages passed at college. The idlest dreamer of the lot, the despair of his professor, an uneasy symptom which the college is ready to eject from its system on the first likely occasion, may be the one who, of all its generations of students, will reflect the highest lustre on the college by the magnitude of his literary renown. Many a worthless student, alas, finds a consoling precedent for his lazy humors in the school-day experiences of great writers.

We have not the faintest desire to emulate Stevenson and to indite an apology for idlers; nor do we wish to belittle the advantages accruing to a literary man from the intellectual discipline of a good college. Stevenson, the apologist of idleness, was himself the most industrious of boys and of men; and the same thing can be said of every successful author, even if his youthful industry was not of the particular kind which merits the official approval of collegiate faculties. Furthermore, we are convinced that no great author would have lost in brilliancy and power for having forced himself sternly into the disciplinary grooves of the schools in which his early years were spent. There is an ancient and popular tradition to the contrary; but too many of our most distinguished literary geniuses bear testimony to the solidifying and enriching effects of systematic training to allow us to speak of it slightly.

Severe intellectual training is the best equipment of a literary man; it saves him from emotional excesses, weak exaggerations and wild eccentricities of judgment. It is a healthy condition of literary activity. But it does not partake of the nature of a cause of such activity in nearly the same measure as it operates as a cause in scientific pursuits. Some kind of systematic preliminaries in a school are ordinarily necessary before a man can be a physician or a lawyer. But novelists and poets are not obliged by the laws of the State or the prejudices of the people to prepare for, or to take, scholastic degrees. In general, a first-class college will send first-class men through the professional schools into professional life. But it is quite possible that the best college in the land may not send out a first-class literary man once in a score of years. The limitations of a college are quite defined. Its mill cannot turn all the grist that comes to it into flour. It can work upon temperament and character, but it cannot supply them; and in literature, valuable as a good academic training is, temperament and character count for more.

It is a mistake, therefore, to take it for granted that Catholic colleges and schools have everything to do with the making of Catholic writers of literature. They are neither more or less helpless in the matter than all other educational institutions. Francis Thompson, Lafcadio Hearn, Conan Doyle, Alfred Austin and Maurice Maeterlinck—a curious collection, surely, of offshoots from Catholic schools—never in all likelihood suffered any evil effects in a literary sense from their Catholic training. There are nearly a dozen popular novelists, poets and essayists among the women writing for the public at present whose triumphant careers were not cut off at the start by the Spartan discipline and religious training of the Catholic convents in which their girlhood was passed.

We do not, we insist, take the position that the college and school have absolutely nothing to do with the literary development of its students. It can do a great deal toward cultivating the receptive power, called good taste, in literature. It can teach precision and propriety, and the other elementary adjuncts of style of which an educated man is expected to be in command, and it can form the mind to habits of clear thinking—no mean acquisition for the budding author. It cannot supply wings, if the youth's Pegasus lacks them altogether. As to developing wings, when they exist in a rudimentary form, the college has certain functions; but we doubt whether these functions are exercised with facility and success in non-Catholic more than in Catholic colleges. This question may be treated in a succeeding paper.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Madame Digby

Madame Digby, fifth Superior-General of the Society of the Sacred Heart, died at Ixelles, near Brussels, on the twenty-first day of May. During sixteen trying years she had wisely governed more than six thousand religious in convents scattered over the whole world, her burden made more heavy by her own delicate health and the infirmities that accompany old age.

Sixteen eventful years they were. She had the consolation of seeing the saintly Mother Barat raised to the altars of the Church, and that ardent missionary, Mother Duchesne, declared Venerable; but these joys came after her heart had been bruised and crushed, and all but broken, by the French Government's ruthless confiscation of forty-nine of her convents, many of them especially dear to her, and to her daughters, because they were closely associated with the memory of their foundress and with the early traditions of the Society. But with rare foresight, and as the result of excellent management, Madame Digby was prepared to open wide the door of another house as each of the old loved ones was closed behind her reluctant feet. The convent at Ixelles, chosen to be the new mother-house, quickly became, in customs and in spirit, an exact reproduction of its predecessor in Paris. Then, her life-work accomplished, she lingered not, but hastened home to heaven.

Marie Josephine Mabel Digby was born at Osbertown, County Kildare, Ireland, in April, 1835, and was therefore past seventy-six years of age at the time of her death. As a child she had an intense dislike for everything Catholic, to the sorrow of her mother and elder sister, who were fervent converts. Her conversion, when she was eighteen years old, was most wonderful; and she loved to attribute it, and the grace of her vocation, to the intercession of a great uncle, a Jesuit, who was martyred for the Faith in England in the sixteenth century. Hearing one day that some celebrated soloists were to sing at Benediction, she accompanied her mother and sister for the sake of the music. She sat throughout the first part of the service, showing no reverence, much less devotion; but when the Blessed Sacrament was raised high over the heads of the kneeling congregation, she prostrated herself and remained on her knees long after everyone else had left the church. Her mother and sister were dumbfounded. As soon as they reached home she exclaimed, "After what has happened, I am going to be a Catholic!" At once she arranged to receive the necessary instruction, and not long after was baptized.

Soon Our Lord demanded a sacrifice in return for His signal grace. He asked her to leave home and friends, and to take up her Cross and follow Him. And so, in 1857, she entered the novitiate of the Sacred Heart. The greater part of her religious life was spent at Roehampton as mistress of novices, superior, and finally as vicar. In August, 1894, she was made assistant-general of the Society, and a year later was chosen to fill the first place, left vacant by the death of Madame de Sartorius.

It was not without good reason that she was given one after another of its most responsible positions. Herself of a generosity of soul that hesitated at no sacrifice for God, she inspired those under her guidance with something of her own ardor. Despite the delicate health that crucified her during many years, her energy was phenomenal—a quiet energy that "worked tranquilly." There was in her no trace of that "littleness that bustles and cries out and makes a great noise." Disquietude was alien to her. Peace was the keynote of her soul, a peace won at the point of the sword, for as Francis Thompson quaintly says, "It is the crudest of fallacies to suppose that saints are fashioned customarily from tea and carpet slippers." It was because she lived her real life far above the thousand petty annoyances that beset her, above the flagrant injustice that persecuted her, that she was always serene. Such things were not allowed to intrude on her close union with God in the depths of her soul.

Madame Digby was the first Superior-General of the Society of the Sacred Heart to visit America. She landed in New York in the summer of 1898, and returned to France in May of the following year, after having visited all the houses of the institute in the United States, Canada and Mexico. She was greatly pleased to find the traditions of the Society so faithfully carried out by her "independent Americans," whom she admired for their straightforwardness and their loyalty to those in authority. But she could not have realized what happiness and strength she brought to the religious and pupils in her American convents. Everyone loved her. She had indeed "a face like a benediction." She was all sweetness and simplicity and kindness. To the pupils at "Maryville" she gave two mottoes printed in gold letters on small cards. They were the keynote of her own life. "Take always the straight line, cost what it may—come what will," and "Ne pensez pas qu'en dirait le monde, mais qu'en dirait Dieu." (Do not think of what the world would say of it, but of what God would say).

It was her simplicity and her humility that most impressed all who came in contact with her during her American trip. The general of a great institute, the fêted guest of hundreds who loved her as a mother and revered her as a saint, she spoke and acted with the simple directness of a child, though with a wisdom that was the admiration of all who were in a position to see its workings. Truly, as Earnest Hello has it, "Humility stands amid the perils of dreadful heights, pride is too feeble."

And now her long journey toward Eternity is ended, and at last she "lies within the light of God," where "the weary are at rest."

FLORENCE GILMORE.

Socialist Sunday Schools

There are at present in the United States three types of rationalist Sunday schools, "established and supported by radical organizations, where the knowledge that will make the world free is taught, and where the cornerstone of the structure of the future is being laid." They are represented by the Ferrer type, under the direction of the Francisco Ferrer Association; by the Workmen's Circle schools, conducted partly by Socialists and partly by Anarchists, Single Taxers and similar members of the "Arbeiter Ring"; and, finally, by the purely Socialist institutions. In the main, however, the movement is avowedly Socialistic, and it will suffice to consider it from this one point of view and to limit ourselves to developments within the State of New York alone, where active forces are ceaselessly at work crystallizing into definite organizations all the various elements of radicalism within our land.

It is only a very few years ago that the Socialist school movement began, when some women of New York City, deeming the educational system of the common schools inadequate for the proper development of the children of workingmen, met together to discuss ways and means for supplying the deficiency. They believed, we are told,

"that in a progressive state of society morals must be those of free men and women, whose standards could not be those of a slave class, devised by slaves, called by them 'morals,' and elevated to the position of a religion because such a code best suited their slave condition." So the Socialist schools were founded, and, since the labor days of the week allowed no leisure for teaching, the classes were conducted on Sundays—hence the name of "Socialist Sunday Schools" given to these institutions.

The first object of Socialism is, of course, to wedge itself into our Public School System. For this purpose it is even now writing the text-books it would introduce and is fighting a life and death struggle to obtain control of educational boards. Socialistic principles, as has been recently shown, are already a dominant factor in public education and Catholics are taxed for their practical support; but until Socialism pure and simple can be taught in the government schools private establishments are deemed a necessity. As a consequence, hundreds of children, to speak of Greater New York alone, are in attendance at the Socialist Sunday Schools, an active educational corps has been organized and a special training class for teachers, at the Rand School, is making still ampler and more thorough provisions for the future.

The interests of all these institutions within the State are confided to a Central State Committee on Socialist Schools, whose duty it is to supervise and recommend the lessons taught in the various locals and to see to the proper grading of instructors according to the ages of the pupils. The subject matter for the younger children may consist in stories based upon nature or the industrial activities of men; for the older pupils it is founded upon science, history and economics, while evolutionary materialism gives tone and color to the work in all the grades. A sketch of the lessons approved by the educational board has in the past been periodically published for the teachers in their daily press, but an eclectic series of graded lessons is announced to appear in print for the coming year.

To furnish an object lesson of the attitude assumed by these schools towards Christianity we shall select what cannot fail to be most typical of their spirit and method, the instruction assigned as a preparation for that day of days in the children's calendar, the Christmas festival. "The Feast of the Sun" is chosen as the most appropriate subject of study for this season. "It is inconceivable," the learned board carefully cautions its teachers, "that we should retain any of the religious features of this time. Nevertheless we should substitute something having content that we wish to take its place." A lesson on Light is therefore selected as perfectly answering the purpose. We know what countless myths of oriental, classical and Indian mythology are said to be accounted for by the symbolism of light, and why—such is the implied suggestion—should not the same explanation satisfy as well for the great central myth of Christianity? Great insistence is therefore given to the recommendation that the lesson preparatory for the Christmas celebration "in all classes be devoted to the subject of 'Light,' in the interpretation of the feast of the winter solstice, or the universal reason for the celebration of Christmas" (The Call, Nov. 27, 1910).

So, with one stroke of the pen, Christianity is cancelled from the mind of the child, and the sweetest joy of all the year is plucked remorselessly from out its heart. By a single flourish, without recourse to history or argument, the festival of Christmas has been metamorphosed into the feast of the winter solstice. The story runneth thus: The people in the olden days saw the sun receding from them, and feared it would never return again. The land would remain barren, the waters would freeze to their depths and all life would perish from the face of the earth. But lo! suddenly the sun retraced its path, light and warmth came back and the trees burst anew into bud and blossom. In joy at their delivery these wise cave men instituted a festival just at the time which now we know as the Christmas holidays. Here, therefore, we are at last presented with the scientific fact which has been poetically expanded into the myth of a God of Light born upon a winter's night. Such is the Christmas lesson instilled into the simple, trusting heart of childhood on Christmas day in a Christian country.

Should the teacher, however, be somewhat shocked, or, what is far more likely, should she not fully understand what is contained in the outline given into her hand or what is implied therein, the board is ready with a motive and an explanation: "We should ever bear in mind that we must do a certain amount of destructive work preparatory to the building for new ethical and industrial teaching." Properly to indoctrinate the teacher, The Call, the oracle and militant champion of these Sunday Schools, suggests four books for special study and meditation. It will suffice here to make reference to two of these volumes.

The first is Kautsky's "Ethics and the Materialistic Conception of History." The author is one of the foremost authorities among the Socialists of our day, the greatest living spokesman of German Social Democracy and a fit instructor for the future teacher in the new morality of rationalism. Ethical principles are always greatly insisted upon by Socialists, but especially so in their Sunday Schools. It is upon its morals that Socialism prides itself. Here, then, are the essentials of that code which is to replace the tablets of the law, once given upon Sinài, but now made obsolete in a more enlightened age.

Kautsky, in the volume recommended, tells us that "neither as a thinking nor a moral being is man essentially different from animals" (page 119). He is, however, by nature a social animal, and it is this distinctive feature which constitutes the reason for his progress under the laws of evolution. Because of this it became possible that the discoveries made by some primitive Marx or Kant or Aristotle, inhabiting the trees of a primeval forest, could be transmitted to "his herd" and so come down to us perfected and refined through all the cycle of the ages. Our morals, as we would therefore expect, depend entirely upon our social and economic conditions and "the moral codes are simply conventional fashions" (p. 192). Since all morality is relative, "that which is called immorality is simply a deviating kind of morality" (p. 192). So, to give an example, "the same phenomenon, say of free sexual intercourse or of indifference to property, can in one case be the product of moral depravity, in a society where a strict monogamy and the sanctity of property are recognized as necessary; in another case it can be the highly moral product of a healthy social organism which requires for its social needs neither property in a particular woman, nor that particular means of consumption and production" (p. 193).

What, then, in the present economic condition of society, is the moral law which we are to observe? It is something entirely negative and far more easily remembered and put in practice than the decalogue. "The moral ideal is revealed in its purely negative character as an opposition to existing moral order, and its importance is recognized as the motor power of the class struggle, as a means to collect and inspire the forces of the revolutionary classes" (p. 200). In brief, "the moral ideal is nothing else than the complex of wishes and endeavors which are called forth by the opposition to the existing state of affairs" (p. 199). Destruction, arson, violence, murder, when practiced in opposition to the existing moral order and the existing state of affairs, are therefore exalted into the galaxy of virtues, and the wretch taken red-handed in his criminal act is changed into a moral hero, a superman, one whose memory, like that of the Spanish degenerates and Haymarket rioters, is to be embalmed and perpetuated for all future generations. What sweet anticipations may we not entertain for the coming years, when lessons which lead to such conclusions are openly taught to-day in American schools to American children.

The second volume, to which we need only refer, is Engel's "Socialism, Utopian and Scientific." This author, the co-laborer and literary executor of Marx, with whom he stands upon the same bad eminence, thus summarily dismisses all question of religion with a single statement: "Nowadays, in our evolutionary conception of the Universe, there is absolutely no room for either a Creator or a Ruler" (Intro., page iv). For the new teacher of the Sunday School class his authority is supreme and his statement is likely to be taken as final and decisive in spite of her own better knowledge. And yet we find that appeal to Deity is not utterly unknown in at least one Socialist school. We shall quote in conclusion an invocation printed by the Socialist Sunday School of Rochester, N. Y., and entitled "A Socialist Prayer." Adapted indifferently to Christian, Jew, Mohammedan or Buddhist, it at least contains an acknowledgment of a Sovereign Providence:

"O God of Life and Light," begins the supplication, "we yearn to be nobler, kinder, more genuine, more complete. We are hungry; fill us with knowledge and wisdom. We are thirsty; give us to drink deep draughts from the wells of justice. We are weak; make us strong to help in the sacred war of manhood and civilization against tyranny, inhumanity, exploitation and greed." The need of repentance, of humiliation for personal sin, of hope in an hereafter are carefully ignored. As the prayer continues we find only an universal discontent, and in place of a love and yearning for the Kingdom of God and His glory there is only an angry cry for the speedy coming of the day of the Great Revolution: "Permeate our souls with divine, discordant and righteous rebellion," the little hearts are taught to pray. "Strengthen within us the spirit of revolt, and may we continue to favor that which is fair and rise in anger against the wrong, until the Great Revolution shall come to free men and women from their fetters and enable them to be good and kind and noble and human!"

A revolution, not merely of the existing government and the existing social order, but of Christian morality as well, is the lesson to be taught in the Socialist Sunday Schools, according to the desire of their most ardent champions and supporters. What such an education is at last to yield to our country, when the harvest must be reaped which here is being sown, it needs no prophet to foretell. As Catholics, we realize in our turn the sublime mission entrusted to us of furthering by every means in our power that religious education which is to be the salvation of our land and for which we are requested this month by the Holy Father to offer up our prayers and good works. JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Dr. Albert von Ruville

I.

The story of a soul passing through liberalism and indifferentism to orthodox Protestantism, and, finally, to the full light of the Catholic Faith is a subject of interest to those in possession of that faith and often a guide and help to those without the fold. When he who has passed through such an experience is a profound scholar, who has only sought admission into the Church after long and serious study and deliberation, we may be sure that there can be no question of self-illusion or of a passing whim. His conversion, therefore, merits more than a passing notice. This has been the case with Dr. Albert von Ruville, Professor of History at Halle, one of the most Protestant of the German universities, whose entrance into the Church two years ago created no little surprise in Germany, particularly in academic circles, and whose account of his conversion and of his subsequent impressions of Catholic truth and practice has been widely read and criticized, not only in Germany, but also beyond the boundaries of the Fatherland.

Dr. von Ruville, who was born in 1855, belongs to an old French family, which emigrated to Prussia during the French Revolution. Following in the footsteps of his father, he entered at first upon a military career, but after serving some thirteen years as an officer in the Germany army he resigned and devoted himself to the study of history at the University of Berlin. In 1896 he became lecturer at Halle, and later, professor. He is the author of several works that have gained him the reputation of an accurate and fair-minded historian, one of the most notable being his life of William Pitt. Since becoming a Catholic he has published two books, which are valuable contributions to our apologetical literature. While giving an account of his own conversion, they also contain an extended discussion of the respective positions of Catholic and orthodox Protestant Christianity, and his reason for recognizing in the former the one true Church of Christ. His argument should make it of special value to those confronted with similar difficulties.

The first of these books, entitled "Back to Holy Church," (1) has already passed through many editions and has been translated into several modern languages.

He tells us that he was brought up a strict Protestant. In the course of time he came more or less under the influence of the materialistic and pantheistic errors of the day, and as a natural consequence his belief in the fundamental truths of Christianity became considerably weakened, though never wholly extinct. In 1901, however, there came a profound change in his religious life, and, curiously enough, it was a study of Harnack that proved to be the first step in his journey towards the Truth. It was the latter's work on the "Essence of Christianity," and particularly the transcendent personality he was constrained to assign to its founder, which revealed to Dr. von Ruville in some measure the character of Our Lord. The well-known leader of the liberal Protestant school, it is true, regarded Christ as a mere man, but he claimed to be nothing if not scientific, and so his delineation could not be charged with exaggeration. This being granted, the appearance of so transcendent a being in the world was something miraculous, and implied a divine mission. The gospel, then, of this divine Legate could not be built on falsehood. Such was Dr. von Ruville's conclusion. The doctrines of Harnack became for him quite untenable, and from a state of restless questioning he was brought back again to a firm belief in orthodox Protestantism.

Appreciating the treasure he had found, he sought for a closer union with God, but he soon felt that there was something lacking in the Protestant service. The multiplicity of sects and their attitude in the face of rationalism and infidelity were disquieting. The conviction, too, was forced upon him that the faith he had regained was, after all, only the fruit of serious study; but, he asked, what about the masses of the people, to whom this way was necessarily closed and who, nevertheless, had the same needs, the same claim to salvation? Whence were they to receive their faith?

A second decisive step then was inevitable, viz.: the necessity of a teaching authority whose divine commission placed it above and outside of State control and popular opinion. An historian, to be sure, could not be unaware of the claims of the Catholic Church, and particularly of the Papacy, but it must be remembered that Dr. von Ruville was still an orthodox Protestant, and, naturally, accepted the Protestant tradition regarding the Catholic Church, though, it should be noted, he had no sympathy with popular abuse of Catholic doctrine and practice. Great, then, was his surprise when, in 1908, he read "The Old and the New Faith" of Prof. Reinhold, the first Catholic theological work that had come into his hands. Here he learned for the first time how reasonable is the faith which Catholics really profess. His difficulties gradually vanished, and in March, 1909, he sought admission into the true fold, and so found peace and happiness.

HENRY M. BROCK, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

Industrial Discord in Rome

ROME, May 7, 1911.

This week the Osservatore Romano chides its Catholic contemporaries for speaking too enthusiastically of the Exposition. This cannot mean us; for to the best of our knowledge and belief, and with due apologies to the Philosopher of Archey Road, it has not had a decent word out of our head since the show began. Last week the King of Sweden came and went; this week we have been deprived of the King of Denmark. Some time back we reported his approach with the Queen and their three children; but now the sad news comes that he is confined to his room in a hotel at Nice with a severe attack of rheumatism. The plight of the reception committee recalls an old school rhyme, "Word was brought to the Danish king,—Hurry!" On the occasion of the King of Sweden's visit the Sovereign Grand Master of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Masonry in Italy, the Commendatore Saverio Fera wired the King, as Head of the Swedish Rite, an enthusiastic welcome to Italy: the King replied in kind through his Minister. Those gifted with second sight may divine things out of this: your correspondent is no seer. The out-setting of the royal commission from Holland to convey the Queen's congratulations to Italy is announced for the 20th of the month. Mexico has already commissioned its ambassador to the Quirinal, Don Gonzalez Esteva, to communicate its felicitations.

The week began with an expected strike that did not come off and an unexpected one which did. The government traction employees had threatened to strike for the First of May. The Government met the situation by declaring a general holiday, and so not a tram or bus or carozza moved a wheel in Rome all day. However, it was a clear day and the walking was fine. But the next day the street scavengers, two thousand strong, struck for higher pay and a firmer tenure of job. The official to whom they presented their demands promised on his word of honor, and swore on the heads of his five children that he would secure from the Municipal Council all they desired; but they would not trust him till the Chamber of Labor, an organization corresponding to the American Federation of Labor, assured them that if the promises were not duly and promptly redeemed a new strike would be ordered at once. In the intervening days the streets of the city, ordinarily as clean as Commissioner Edwards keeps the streets of New York, were a sight to make angels weep, as well as physicians with a prescience of cholera.

(1) "Zurück zur heiligen Kirche." (Berlin, 1910.) English Translation by G. Schortensack, with Preface by Rev. R. H. Benson. (London, 1910.)

The series of International Congresses, organized for the year, opened this week with the Congress of the Press. The speakers contended chiefly for the right of professional confidence and press immunity from giving testimony in court on matters of publication. It is noteworthy that the Polish Press Union answered the invitation to attend by declaring that, while the blood of Poland shed in the cause of liberty and independence gave them sympathy with every national effort for autonomy, the age-long bonds of faith that bound them to the Holy See forbade them to put themselves in a false position at a Congress called under circumstances where an affront was possible to the Vatican. The Tuberculosis Congress is set for the week beginning September 24th, and among those down to read a paper I notice the name of Dr. Flick, of Philadelphia. At this time also the Catholic Young Men's Union of Rome is in session, discussing and passing resolutions on the moral and intellectual preparation of young men for the duties of civic life. Likewise at Turin the Catholic Federation of University students is holding a Congress, resolving how the influence of organized university students may be brought to correct the tendencies of recent currents of thought and to the improvement of morality at large.

The May Day gatherings of workmen separated according to differences of principles. The radical contingent met in a tavern, and raised such a disturbance that the police were summoned. They whipped the few policemen who appeared, and then under the persuasion of one of their leaders and the district captain of police they returned quietly into the tavern, where shortly they proceeded to wreck the whole establishment. They succeeded; their resolutions are not in evidence. The Socialists met in large numbers in the open piazza dell' Esedra, where their orators held forth against the standing army as maintained in the interests of the tradespeople against the rights of the proletariat, and wound up with strident cries against the priests. The Catholic employees of the tramway system met in great numbers also for a rally and a banquet. The Bishop of Nepi and Suri, Mgr. Doebbing, said grace, and among other incidents at the festivities was a call for cheers for Pius X, enthusiastically given, and a eulogy of the parish priest as an angel of comfort to the poor of the Trastevere district.

The speakers pleaded for universal suffrage, a united stand for their patrimony of sound religious and moral principles, and pledged a peaceful and successful solution of their labor difficulties as the result of a united stand upon the basis of these principles. There is rarely a meeting of any sort, and at this time their name is legion, without the passing of resolutions. One is forced to the conclusion that if resolutions made or marred a State, Italy would be made and unmade several times over within a month. For my single self I would be satisfied to have my dearest enemy resolve against me to the day of doom.

There is no desire of a Catholic party here. For one thing the whole people is nationally and nominally Catholic, and why have a Catholic party of a Catholic whole? For another quite a number of Catholic Romans are not Roman Catholics, and while flocking to a Catholic party and taking office therefrom, they would not represent Catholic principles. Hence the Catholic movement is for sound principles of civic government, and the support of any or all candidates who will stand for such principles and will labor to give them effect, the Catholics here, as the world over, believing that in the triumph of right principles of public conduct they have nothing to fear for the growth and security of their faith. The anti-clerical movement here, as elsewhere, is only incidentally anti-Catholic: essentially it stands against all religion and every sign of it, and proposes to possess God's earth without recognizing the dominion of its Lord and Master. With such, right principles have little hope.

On Wednesday the Holy Father was sufficiently recovered from his indisposition to resume his public audiences daily. However, as some sign of recognition that the present moment is in potency explosive, the Cardinal Vicar has ordered that all Rogation processions shall be confined within the respective church edifices.

Cardinal Rampolla has appointed Mgr. Carinci rector of Capranica College. Cardinal Arcverde, of Rio Janeiro, is expected here shortly for the consecration of his new co-adjutor, Mgr. Sebastiano Leme, a young, learned, energetic and pious prelate.

The Congregation of Rites announces the introduction of the cause of the Venerable Servant of God, John Robert De Lamennais, a brother of the famous De Lammenais, whose fame was marred by disloyalty to his Church.

Prince Alessandro Massimo, the founder of the Jesuit Instituto Massimo in Rome, himself a Jesuit, was buried this morning amidst universal mourning. Coincidentally the Roman Association of Teaching has just held a public conference where strong arguments were made for the defence of private schools, such as the Instituto, and for the freedom of teachings.

A despatch from Brussels announces the passing by the Chamber of Deputies of a treaty of arbitration with Italy, whereby all questions, not touching the independence, vital interests or honor of the contracting parties or the interests of any third power, shall hereafter be submitted to a court of arbitration. C. M.

Students of Theology in Germany

The Allgemeine Rundschau (Munich, May 6) presents an interesting comparison based on official returns of the number of students attending theological courses in Catholic and in Evangelical schools.

"According to figures given in the recently published 'Statistical Year-book' for 1910, there were registered in the various Prussian universities during the winter semestre of 1909-1910, 1,183 theologians accredited to the Evangelical Church, and 893 who are Catholic. Besides these latter, 657 Catholic theologians were reported from the ecclesiastical seminaries of Fulda, Paderborn, Pöplin, Posen and Trier. The statistics of the Year-book, it is well to note, are not complete; no mention is made of the Bishops' seminaries of Limburg, Osnabrück, Hildesheim and Cologne, in which, according to latest reports at hand, there were 113 students preparing for the priesthood. In Prussia, therefore, we find a grand total of 1,663 Catholic theological students as opposed to the 1,183 registered as representing the Evangelical Church. Certainly a noteworthy excess in favor of the Catholics. If to this total one adds the number of Catholic students of theology officially reported from the advanced schools of Bavaria, Württemberg, Alsace-Lorraine and Baden, we have in round numbers 3,350 recorded in the entire empire as preparing for the Catholic priesthood. The latest available report of the total registration of theological students at the evangelical schools throughout the empire (winter semestre 1908-1909) gives their number as 2,115.

"Our readers may be interested in a further possible analysis of the figures entering into these totals. In 1910, 2,455 Catholics completed the course in the secondary schools in Prussia. Of these Abiturienten, as the Germans call them, 2,128 finished in the Gymnasien, of whom 549 matriculated for theology in some advanced school; 215 finished in the Realgymnasien, of whom three later began the study of theology; and 112 finished in the Oberrealschulen, of whom one entered a theological school. The total registering for theology, 533, represents practically 22½ per cent. of the Abiturienten. In the same year only 5½ per cent. of the Protestant students who finished their course in the secondary schools went on for theology.

"Bavaria publishes no official statistics regarding the religious affiliations of the Abiturienten. Still, an examination of the records of the individual schools of secondary training enables one to put the number of those finishing their course in that kingdom at 1,523, of whom 993 were Catholics; 301 of these latter, or 30.3 per cent., took up the study of theology. Of the 461 Protestants, only 47, or about 10 per cent., followed their example. Similarly in Württemberg there were 191 Catholics among those completing the Gymnasien courses, 29 per cent. of whom, or 64, elected to follow the theological course, while 52 evangelicals of the 444 graduating, or 11.7 per cent., did the same. In Baden, 350 Catholics, as opposed to 339 evangelicals, received the certificate given to those who succeed in passing the final tests in secondary schools, 83 of the former and 20 of the latter turned their thoughts to theology, that is, 23.7 and 6 per cent., respectively. Among the 112 Catholic Abiturienten of Hesse 16, or 14.3 per cent., as compared with the 26 of the 331 evangelicals, or 7.8 per cent., took up theology.

"Lack of data in other German states forbids us to complete the comparison; failing official statistics of any kind we can merely guess at the relative proportion of Catholics and Evangelical Protestants who choose theology as their life profession from the number of theologians registering as natives of these lands. The comparison, as far it goes, is remarkable for the large percentage of Catholic students who enter for the ministry. In every case its excess over that of the students of the Evangelical Church is notable; strange to say the lowest percentage on the Catholic side is larger than the highest reached by the Evangelicals. No wonder that the last report (winter semestre 1908-1909) shows a total of Catholic students of theology more than one and one-half times as great as that of the Evangelicals, 3,350, as compared with 2,115.

"One other interesting detail may be noted: 992 of the native born students registered in the Prussian universities in 1908-1909 were children of Evangelical ministers, the total number of native born Evangelical students in that year being 14,055. Taking this fact as a basis it is easy to conclude that from 1,700-1,800 students at the different universities of the entire empire hail from similar homes. The Evangelical Rectory is, therefore, no inconsiderable source of supply of students entering the advanced schools in Germany. To be sure no such source exists where Catholics are concerned, and students of statistics ought to be mindful of this, when, as not rarely happens, they draw proof of Catholic inferiority in an educational way from the study of the registration of the various universities of the empire."

Father Fidelis Stone in Buenos Aires

BUENOS AIRES, April 15, 1911.

The arrival here of the Very Rev. Father Fidelis, C.P. (James Kent Stone) almost coincided with St. Patrick's Day, and his coming was most opportune. After the usual service, he appeared in the pulpit and delivered an impressive address to a record congregation. Father Fidelis was practically the pioneer of the Passionists in Argentina. Thirty years after his first visit, he returned to take charge of Holy Cross. The beautiful church and monastery stand on the site where a makeshift chapel was placed by Father Fidelis in the olden time. But the importance of his address was in the statement that Holy Cross was now "an autonomous Passionist Province, and it would remain the Irish church of Buenos Aires as long as there was an Irishman or a man of Irish descent in the country." In view of certain rumors to the effect that the English speaking priests were to be withdrawn or replaced by Italians, this solemn declaration was most welcome.

We have just had a heavy rain storm, which has done immense good, as up to last week it was not possible for the farmers to plough, so hard was the ground after a long drought. Things were beginning to assume a very depressing aspect, but the rain has revived hopes for the next harvest. Though rather late in some cases, the farmers may now start the work of the agricultural year, which it is to be hoped will result in bumper crops. Failing such crops this year the country will stand face to face with a crisis of uncommon severity.

The American papers have bristled lately with glowing descriptions of Buenos Aires, Argentina, and the glories and prospects of these geographical entities. The articles, well written, are not, perhaps, intended to deceive, but they do deceive. The writers may not mean anything but good. As a rule, they do nothing but harm, and they never know the extent of the mischief resulting from their stories. Anyone who has an idea of setting out for this El Dorado should not do so without proper preparation, and "proper preparation" means a good command of Spanish, a good deal of ready money, and an immense amount of training or special knowledge of something available in the labor market. All knowledge is subordinate to a knowledge of the language. Adults rarely or never acquire a thorough knowledge of Spanish, because the idioma nacional is not easy of acquirement. E. FINN.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; SECRETARY, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

NOTICE

The editorial rooms and the publication office of AMERICA have been removed from 32 Washington Square West, to Nos. 59 and 61 East Eighty-third Street, to which address all communications must hereafter be sent.

The Judges and the Law

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, ordering the dissolution of the richest and most powerful capitalistic corporation in the world, and the interpretation of the Sherman Law, on which it was based, upholds the reputation of the judicial branch of our government for wisdom and integrity. On the one hand the resources of the organization under trial were practically illimitable; on the other, radicals were clamoring loudly for literal interpretation of the law, which would make it bear on the just and unjust alike. The judges so interpreted the Sherman Act that it discriminates only against such combinations as endanger legitimate competition, and thus vindicated justice and common sense. It is fortunate for the stability of our institutions that we have a court of last resort whose adjudication is above suspicion, and is final.

There is another aspect to the Standard Oil case which is less satisfactory. Attorney-General Moody announced the prosecution in January, 1906, and in November of the same year dissolution proceedings were instituted at St. Louis. First testimony was taken at New York, September, 1907, and final testimony in Chicago, January, 1909. The Government filed its brief in March, arguments opened in April, and the Standard Oil combination was declared illegal and ordered to be dissolved November, 1909. The defendants appealed a month later to the Supreme Court, which heard the appeal in March, 1910, and ordered the case reargued.

The rearguing of the suit opened the following January, and the final decision was rendered May 15, 1911.

More than five years intervened between the institution of the proceedings and the judgment, thus reminding one somewhat of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce. The law's delay in this case of criminal prosecution is as notable as it is lamentable, but this was essentially a civil suit. It is not very encouraging that the adjudication of a case on which a thousand interests were depending should be so protracted. Legislators who are wasting much time and energy on the subject of the Recall of judges had better devote their powers to devising a system by which legal procedure can be expedited. It is not the judges with whom the people are becoming exasperated; it is the hampering legal technicalities that protect the criminals and tie the hands of justice. And ultimately these are made, not by the judges, but by the legislators.

Mexican Catholics Astir

It is now well-nigh half a century since Catholics as such made any showing in Mexican politics. For thirty-five years, after the acknowledgment by Spain of Mexican independence, they took their turn, more or less irregularly and spasmodically, it is true, in managing the great affairs of state; and bishops and priests were not wanting who showed a fair measure of political ability whenever they had a chance to display their powers as members of some of the innumerable juntas and other governing bodies which have so often soared skyward and exploded in a shower of sparks, followed by darkness, during Mexico's troubled history. That ecclesiastics should take so active a part in secular affairs did not then seem incongruous to the Mexicans, for in the days of Spanish domination some of the most illustrious viceroys, and others that were not, had been churchmen.

When the Constitution of 1857 was adopted (just as Constitutions are wont to be "adopted" by so many of our Latin-American friends), the power of the clergy in public affairs suffered an eclipse, and the Catholic laity, who were accustomed to the leadership of the better educated and more public-spirited ecclesiastics, were bewildered and lost in the mist. Then came a brief era of phosphorescent brightness in the time of the so-called second empire, that of Maximilian of Austria, who offended the "advanced" elements of the country by his religious stand, and scandalized the devout by his latitudinarianism, the while Juarez was flitting hither and thither through the mountains and plains, and preparing to shoot the unfortunate Austrian on the hill of the bells at Queretaro. As the Catholics had stood with Maximilian, although they had begun to edge away before the final blow from Juarez, they fared ill when the Zapotec Indian found himself the undoubted master of groaning and bleeding Mexico.

Since the triumph of Juarez in 1867, Catholics have counted for nothing in political campaigns and at the polls. If any have crept into important offices, it has been in spite of their being Catholics, rather than because of their religion. We are not speaking of those Catholics who go to church to be baptized, and go a second time to be married, and visit it a third time for a short pause on the way to the cemetery; for, as far as promoting Catholic morality is concerned, it makes little difference whether such Catholics as these are in politics or in the bridewell.

All sorts of petty vexations are to-day on the Mexican statute books against Catholics, and especially ecclesiastics. An American priest, for example, who chanced to visit the City of Mexico was admonished by his alarmed Mexican friends that to display openly on the public street that offensively religious emblem commonly known as a Roman collar and stock exposed him to arrest, for it was "unlawful." However, he took the risk, having first made a short memorandum of his last wishes. His positively harmless (not to say foreign) appearance must have stood him in good stead, for after a swift promenade through the busiest part of the city, he returned in safety to receive the hearty congratulations of his delightfully disappointed friends.

It is against such and weightier grievances that some earnest Catholics in Mexico have decided to raise their heads after skulking so long in silent obscurity. Now that all things on the wrong side of the Rio Grande are at sixes and sevens, may not the clearing away of rubbish include the removal of some of the hateful provisions against Catholics? Will the Catholics of Mexico hear the appeal and work together for an amelioration of certain conditions? The practical Catholics have so generally held aloof from practical politics for nearly half a century that the task will be stupendous, yet it can be done. The bitter religious feelings of a former generation ought not to prevail when the watchwords are reform and liberty.

The Phenix

When the French Government added to its other crimes the seizure of all the ecclesiastical seminaries, a wail went up from the disconsolate remnants of the faithful: Where are we going to get priests to administer the sacraments? Is religion to die forever in France? They forgot that they were Catholics and Frenchmen. Indeed, if there is anything a Frenchman wants it is an opportunity to do something original, bold and brilliant. In the foreign missions where they have had a free hand their achievements have been almost romantic in their character, scope and success. A similar opportunity has now come to them in their native land. They are no longer to be functionaries paid to sit in their sacristies and do nothing, but splendid priests fighting a paganism in their own country as bad as, and in some respects worse than, that of the brown men and the yellow men and the black men at the ends of the earth. Nor will they lack warriors for the fray. The ranks will be full and the soldiers better equipped than those whose places they take. Eager applicants who rejoice that they are to have something to suffer in their priestly careers, are now knocking at the doors of the seminaries, which, in spite of gloomy forebodings to the contrary, have been organized and, though poor, are all the better and more efficient for that reason. Not only are the young and generous Catholic youth of the nation hurrying thither, but at their side are mature men who in the recent troubles have been devoting themselves to social and charitable work, and who are now seeking something nobler and higher and more apostolic as an outlet for their energies. The scions of nobility as well as the sons of the bourgeois are seated side by side on the benches, and colleges whose students hitherto never dreamed of the seminary as a field for their ambition are sending aspirants thither for the great and holy and patriotic work of the redemption of their country.

Catholic France, which did so much for the Church in the past, needed only the touch of trial to bring out its most glorious characteristics. It will rise again from its ashes, more resplendent with victory than ever before.

Alsace-Lorraine

Despatches received late in May announced that a new shift of sentiment on the part of the members of the special committee of the Reichstag considering the bill granting autonomy to Alsace-Lorraine had brought about its acceptance. Thus approved it had still to be referred back to the full house for the final action of that body. This favorable outcome following a discussion of the proposed measure that has continued since the Christmas holidays seems finally to make it certain that the combined provinces are to be released from the somewhat autocratic régime under which they have been held since France ceded them to the new German Empire upon the cessation of hostilities in 1871.

The bill providing for home rule for Alsace-Lorraine was originally a Government measure, and its proposed enactments failed from the start to satisfy any section of the Reichstag. Conservative members found it too liberal, and liberal members thought it too conservative. The perplexing language question entered into its consideration; there was a contention regarding the franchise, regarding the manner of selecting the administrative head of the new state and his tenure of office; the relative place it was to hold in the Senate of States composing the Empire was a stumbling block. Consequently, hardly a substantial feature of the draft of the bill laid before the special committee in the beginning has escaped sharp criticism, or has been accepted without amendment. Time and time again the report has been sent out that no agreement could be reached, and that the bill would eventually be rejected by the committee. Indeed, only a few days before the receipt of the despatches mentioned above, a statement was published that this had been done, and that the draft embodying a constitution for the combined provinces would be reported unfavorably to the Reichstag.

Following ordinary procedure the favorable vote of the committee ended the matter, and late in the evening of May 23 the Reichstag adopted its report on the new constitution. In this instance the notable diversity of views among the parties concerning the measure of autonomy which ought fairly to be conceded to Alsace-Lorraine, after the forty years of probation through which those provinces have passed, rendered judgment on the final action of parliament extremely difficult. Unquestionably much depended on the attitude to be taken by the representatives of Prussia in the final discussion of the measure. As a part of the new German Empire, though nominally an imperial province held in common by all the German States, Alsace-Lorraine has been practically ruled by Prussia, and in the autonomy question the influence of Prussia has worked against the full emancipation of the provinces. The reason is obvious. As an autonomous state Alsace-Lorraine will be entitled to representation in the Bundesrath, the Senate of States forming the Empire. In that body her delegates will probably side with the south German states, headed by Bavaria. The religion and character of the people lead one to affirm this. And Prussia recognizes that such a contingency spells stronger opposition to Prussian domination in the affairs of the Empire.

The Chamizal Dispute

While old General Juan Navarro was awaiting court martial for the surrender of Ciudad Juarez and Francisco I. Madero was about to go to the capital as advisor to Provisional President de la Barra, and General Figueroa was massing troops to attack that same capital, commissioners from the United States and Mexico met in El Paso, Texas, to settle in a friendly way a dispute which has been bandied about by both countries for upwards of fifteen years, although the origin of it goes back to the days of the Spanish domination.

The Chamizal tract on the bank of the Rio Grande was purchased from the Spanish government in 1818 by a certain Ricardo Bruselas, who so disposed of his property that by 1873 it was owned by Pedro Ignacio Garcia. In that year a violent freshet in the Rio Grande changed the river so that about five acres of the Chamizal were on the east bank, while a few miles further down about an equal part of Texas was on the Mexican side of the stream. At the time of the flood in the river, Garcia made no representations or remonstrances, fearing, as he said, that the Americans who seized the land might do him grievous injury. It is worthy of remark, however, that El Paso, Texas, as far as the little village at the ford of the Rio Grande could be called even a village, held out no promise of developing within fifteen years into a very important place, with brilliant prospects for the future. When, therefore, Garcia had gained sufficient courage to go to law, twenty-one years had passed and El Paso's importance as a commercial center was recognized.

The question was taken up diplomatically, and like most such, has outlived nearly everybody closely connected with it at the outset; but now, the final termination of the end looms up vaguely on the distant horizon. The treaties of 1848 and 1853, and the conventions of 1884, 1895, 1900, 1905 and June 24, 1910, with a supplementary article of December 5 of the same year, bear upon the Chamizal. The United States commissioners admitted away back in 1895 that when the boundary was traced in 1855 the Chamizal was on the Mexican side of the river. The Mexican civil engineer, Emiliano Corrella, insists that since the Rio Grande left its bed in 1852 it has advanced some 2,500 feet towards the west, and, what is of far greater importance, this progress has not been the slow and gradual process of erosion, but a sudden and violent change of course. To this the United States commissioners reply that the "violence" of the change of course consisted in breaking down, dissolving and carrying to the American side great blocks of sandy soil which, after being deposited, dried out and became available for habitations; but on no occasion did the river leave its bed and mark out a new and permanent channel as the result of a freshet. They add, further, that from 1852 to 1894 Mexico tacitly admitted that the tract in dispute was United States territory, for no protest was entered against the jurisdiction exercised over it by the United States authorities.

What will be the result of the decision? First, it will put an end to the controversy, for it is to be accepted by both parties as final. If Mexico wins, it will come into the possession of what is practically a part of a United States city whose value is put at a million and a half dollars. How are those people to accustom themselves to Mexican rulers, laws and customs? If Mexico loses, they are to be blamed who, while the damage was doing, remained dumb when a timely protest might have saved their Chamizal. Should the decision be unfavorable to the United States, the one thing, the only thing, to do is to reproduce the Gadsden plan in miniature and buy off the successful competitor.

—••—

There is a paper in New York known as Moving Picture News, which is published by the Cinematograph Publishing Company. In its issue of May 6, 1911, we find a notice of a film which was released on May 13. It is called "The Nun," and in the short description of what it connotes we find that it is a vile, indecent, immoral and sacrilegious representation of a story which we would not dare to even hint at to our readers. We merely call the attention of parents to the kind of entertainment their children are exposed to at these picture shows; we call the attention of Catholic societies to it also, and ask them to utter not only an angry but an effective condemnation of such villainous things, to which we feel like calling the attention of the police. At least in one part of the country the authorities are doing something. In Harrisburg, Pa., in virtue of the McNichol Act, Chief of Police Ziel appeared the other day at two local picture theatres and directed the suppression of the films entitled "The Nun" and "The Conflict." But why are not the exhibitors themselves suppressed? Why are these violations of public decency made possible? Why should there not be McNichol Acts everywhere, only more drastic than the present one seems to be?

On the 30th of April the Jesuits of Brussels celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of their great College of St. Michel. It is a splendid establishment, situated on the Boulevard Militaire. Architecturally, the edifice is an ornament to the city. From the day when the college began in its humble way, seventy-five years ago, to labor for the intellectual and moral well-being of the people, it has assuredly achieved some measure of success; but the Gazette of Charleroi does not think so. "We hope to see the day come again," it says, "such as the world knew between 1773 and 1831, when the present owners of these fine buildings will be ousted, and their property devoted to some work of public and social utility." Evidently there are some Portuguese in Belgium.

A few months ago the fabulously valuable British crown jewels were removed from the Tower of London to some unknown place, where they were guarded until their usual place could be more carefully protected against violence or cunning. The new cases in which they are to be exposed to view are most elaborately devised to prevent any mischance. At the suggestion of danger, the guard on duty has but to press a button and a steel shutter covers every show-case. If any undue pressure is exerted on the metallic points of the cases, ear-splitting gongs begin a dreadful din in all the apartments of the exhibit. On hearing this noisy notification, the guard pulls a lever and an iron door slips into position and blocks every doorway opening into the treasure chambers, thus trapping whoever was desperate enough or careless enough to get too close to Britain's jewels.

The present Constitution of Greece is being revised, and in it is a provision prohibiting the translation of the Scriptures into any dialect without the sanction of the Patriarch. The British Bible Society has protested, pointing out that Greece is the only country in the world where a version of the Bible in the popular language is forbidden.

LITERATURE

The Fairy Tales of Mr. Kipling

What seems to us to be a shrewd and clever generalization concerning a wide variety of stories is Mr. Brian Hooker's article, "The Later Work of Mr. Kipling," in the North American Review for May. Few authors have dealt with as many different and strongly contrasted characters, situations and sides of life in such a various manner and so voluminously as the wonderful writer who may still be said to be in his prime after a quarter of a century's enjoyment of international popularity. If Mr. Kipling's voice be merely that of sounding brass and destined to early neglect in the searching estimate of posterity, his name will live at least as that of one who boldly challenged his age and marched amid the acclamations of nations into the first place among its literary prophets. It is a picturesque episode in literary records. Many of us may be tiring over his performance; but we still revert with wonder to the young man who came out of India in the early nineties and conquered obscurity at the first cast. It is no slight achievement, even for older and better trained men; and, if the youth's dazzling weapons should reduce themselves in time to a simple sling and stone, they will not perhaps for that reason be the less remarkable.

Mr. Hooker, in the article referred to by us, admits that the popularity of "Life's Handicap" and "Plain Tales" has not been duplicated by that of "Actions and Reactions," or that of "The Jungle Book" by his Puck stories. But he denies that the diminishing favor of the public is a sign of waning art in the novelist; it is rather, he holds, a sign of a changing and growing art, with fewer surface attractions than the earlier manner, but richer and deeper; yet organically identical with it by reason of his unswerving belief in the need of law, order and discipline in the conduct of individual and national life. Mr. Kipling is not hampered by poverty of art which repeats itself to the degree of tastelessness. He plays the same theme with a master's variations; only the public does not always recognize the theme in the new variation, and the temporary puzzlement occasions lack of interest for a time.

Such is the general sense of Mr. Hooker's admirable paper. Mr. Kipling has worshipped the Empire, "because it means to him law and order upon earth and men laboring honorably in their degree; he cannot conceive the man who rather than be second in Rome would be first in a little Iberian village, except with pity or contempt. Discipline is to him the one fulcrum strong enough, and labor the one lever long enough to move the world; and the one place where a man may stand is that man's appointed station in the strategy of things." This is a virile message, we confess, and one which the world, with its weak babble about individualism, needs badly. While we give credit to Mr. Kipling for his consistent and entrancing presentment of it, we have always deplored his reticence concerning the ultimate basis of all law, order and discipline in the spiritual recognition of the Divine source and sanction of this trinity of forces holding the world together. For a Japanese pagan, self-discipline and self-immolation, for that impersonal thing called the State, may be heroism; he is a child of undeveloped intelligence in whose imagination the State looms as a god in a manner analogous to the way in which a master, though ignorant and dissipated, stands as a god in the eyes of his faithful and self-sacrificing dog. But for a Christian, a similar degree of heroism, with no stronger motive behind it than an expressly exclusive attachment to the State or the service, savors of fanaticism or levity, simply because, in the larger outlook of Christian civilization, it lacks intelligence; and, though beautiful in the abstract, is shockingly out of the proportion which reason demands between cause and effect.

However, it is not our main intention to discuss the philosophy of Mr. Kipling's message. His reticence may only be the boy's crude shame of introducing his religious experiences into conversation of even the most intimate kind. A public teacher should be above such a weakness, or else forego the office of artist, whose mission is a poor thing indeed if it is not spiritual. Still we owe a great deal to the writer who, in the words of Mr. Hooker, "has nothing but scorn for the skulker, the egoist who whines at the rules instead of playing the game, and the reformer who sees in anarchy a short cut to the millennium"; who "with all his breadth of sympathy is never by any chance on the side of the outlaw."

The particular feature of Mr. Hooker's article, which interests us, is its endeavor to correlate Mr. Kipling's latest books, "Puck of Pook's Hill" and "Rewards and Fairies," with the rest of his work. At first glance, they seem to be complete departures from the author's previous train of underlying thought. No one would be likely, on superficial grounds, to connect these bright admixtures of fairy fancies and facts of history and archeology with "The Day's Work" or "Captains Courageous." The ordinary reader would be in danger of finding them defiant of all classification with the other volumes on the Kipling shelf. Yet Mr. Hooker makes the effort to trace their cousinship with all that has gone before; and, we think, not without success.

He points out that the striking difference is one of treatment, purely modal, a triumph of artistic versatility, rather than the tearing away from an old idea and the breaking of new ground. Mr. Kipling still clings to the message which he has already delivered in so many divers tones. Law, order, discipline—these are still the words he flings out in the market-place. "Puck of Pook's Hill" and "Rewards and Fairies," says Mr. Hooker, "go back into the making of England in the same way that 'Stalky & Co.' goes back into the boyhood of the Englishman." There is something attractive in this view and, to the mind that worries after keys and universal formulas, this ingenious solvent of the reviewer will very likely be welcome and useful. It is not impossible that the later Mr. Kipling may have consciously kept himself in strict alignment with the earlier and more popular. We are willing to look on it as a probable contingency. But even then the genesis of this new handling of an old message clamors for further explanation. On this we venture to make a surmise which, if it should be abroad from the truth, may not be wholly devoid of interest.

Lionel Johnson is the last man anyone would associate in thought with Mr. Kipling. The one is academic, sensitive, retiring and spiritual; the other, materialistic, precocious, froward and not over-reverent towards literary traditions. It is hard to see how they could tolerate each other. Nevertheless we suspect that Johnson admired the genius of Mr. Kipling and that the latter took the young poet seriously enough to follow his advice in the important matter of giving a new direction to his pen.

In "The Art of Thomas Hardy" Johnson has occasion, in one of the chapters of that brilliant masterpiece of criticism, to enumerate the many suggestive names of places in Dorset; after which occurs this striking passage: "It would take years to discover how much history is hidden away in these names: what memories of old houses, what stories of Catholic devotion, what records of Norman pride, what monuments of Saxon labor; and, earlier than all, what dim traces of Celtic worship, civility, and war. Antiquaries give their lives to the discovery of these things: archeological bodies discuss them. . . . But there is no life in the results of these researches; none, in the collections of museums: and the writers of imagination, who might devote themselves to the animation of this buried past, so rich, so romantic, so real, are busy with Morbihan or Dinapur."

If this paragraph never came into the notice of Mr. Kipling we submit it as an instance of rare and very remarkable coincidence. Here we have Lionel Johnson referring explicitly, as far back as 1894, to Mr. Kipling, and finding fault with him for not using his literary powers in the very fashion in which they have been exercised in recent years in "Puck of Pook's Hill" and "Rewards and Fairies." These two collections of stories are best described in Johnson's words: they are the animation of a buried past, the imaginative infusion of life into dry antiquarian lore, the springing forth into flesh and blood and motion of the skeleton relics of dusty museums.

We do not care to attach too much significance to Johnson's words, or to see an inevitable connection between his complaint and Mr. Kipling's more recent experiments in fiction: but, as a hint or cue, the quoted passage has had its wisdom justified by the event, whether or not Mr. Kipling ever heard it or listened to it. There is no doubt that, together with the illuminative criticism of Mr. Hooker, Lionel Johnson's words supply adequate data for an intelligent reading of Mr. Kipling's latest work.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Freddy Carr and His Friends. By Rev. R. P. GARROLD, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Price, 85 cents.

Freddy Carr's Adventures. By Rev. R. P. GARROLD, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Price, 85 cents.

That little masterpiece of character delineation, "Freddy Carr and His Friends," has been before the public for several months, and has received the welcome and appreciation which it merits in the largest possible measure. It is not necessary, therefore, to give it an extended notice now.

The sequel brings the story to a satisfactory ending, and the two volumes together form a fine study of boy character; so fine that I am at a loss to name any book about boys which is quite as good. The sense of justice, so strong in youngsters, is brought out in every chapter, and the boy's standard of measurements and values, so different from that of the grown-ups, is ever in evidence.

Chapter VII, "A Prelude in C Minor," is one of the most remarkable chapters in boy character study I have ever read. There are genius and inspiration in every page of it. Freddy's interview with the Rector, ending in the severe trouncing inflicted upon that unhappy youth, is a passage which for truth and insight stands in a class apart in literature having to do with child life. When Freddy sets down his feelings while receiving the memorable "licking" from the Rector, the truth of it all takes away one's breath. Here is the remarkable passage:

"Now that licking gave me new ideas on a lot of subjects. In the first place, it was quite a revelation as to what a licking could be, and with all due respect to Father Lonely, he was a baby beside the Rector. And in the second place, it was the first time in my life that I'd absolutely made up my mind to do a thing and then found that I couldn't. I went in grinding my teeth together, and absolutely determined not to make the smallest sign to let him see that I cared, and yet before it was half over I was not only crying, but actually howling for mercy. In the third place it made the whole business of fooling Mr. Pinner look quite different, and I saw that I'd been going on with what I thought was wrong all the time partly from being afraid to say so and partly from wanting to please Jimmy. It did me a lot of good, but it certainly was a most terrific leathering. Unfortunately I lost count of the number of whacks after a bit, but I should think it was a record, or pretty nearly."

However, when everything is said that can be said of the character-drawing, the wit and humor, the dramatic situations to be found in "Freddy Carr's Adventures"—and in this respect it would be difficult to overpraise Father Garrold's work—attention should be called to the startling fact—startling in view of the get-up of the book—that Freddy Carr is a book about boys, but hardly for boys. It is to the grown-up man and woman that these stories will appeal, and so appeal that once they start reading they will not willingly lay these volumes down. To the average youth, they will possess only a mild interest. Boys like their heroes to be heroes all the way through, and their villains to be villains all the way through. In Freddy Carr truth to life stands in the way of idealism; and all boys are born idealists. Boys do not at all like to have their heroes laughed at. Freddy Carr is holding himself up to ridicule for page after page. It is only when, with advancing years, we have been disillusionized that we can appreciate a character like Dewsberry and like Freddy Carr himself. Boys will be satisfied with neither; and if they read the book at all, will, quite as likely as not, most admire Bryant, who is certainly, however clever, the arch-villain of the story. Bryant, as I see him, is a young Bohemian, a creature of impulse. He is as fine a character study as Steerforth in "David Copperfield"—and as dangerous.

The author should change the juvenile title, and the publisher the juvenile cover of these books, and send them forth for what they are: splendid and profound studies of boy life.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

The War Upon Religion. By Rev. F. A. CUNNINGHAM. Boston: Pilot Publishing Co.

It was recently asserted at a public gathering that American Catholics have not yet produced a strong and original book. A goodly list could be produced in refutation, but, were there no other, the book before us would suffice. It is a thoughtful, comprehensive and finely coordinated account of "the struggle of the Church against the spirit of Anti-Christ incarnate in all the movements of error from the sixteenth century until our own times." Protestantism is shown to be at once the heir of the earlier heresies and of Caesarian absolutism, and the progenitor of modern rationalism, scepticism, revolt against religious authority, and of that system of government centralization which usurps the functions of the Church, absorbs the individual and strives to hold in its grasp the reins of all human activities. Through all these operations, be they by word or work, in literature or legislation, there is evident unity of purpose:

"In following up the various assaults made by the Gates of Hell upon the Church established by Christ, one is struck by the absolute method and order they betray. There is a mind behind them all, and that mind has been working vigorously for nineteen centuries. Arianism, Manicheism, the Paganism of the sixteenth century, Protestantism, were all conceived along religious lines. With the French Revolution, born of Deism in England and Rationalism in Germany, there came into view the spirit of Paganism, which has set itself against Christianity for over a hundred years. Arianism, Protestantism, Paganism failing, the new religion of degeneration takes on a darker, a more repellent aspect. It no longer hides behind religious phrases, but comes out into the open, and those who can read its character have called it Satanism."

Protestantism, in rejecting the only power that held the sanction of Divine authority for the Bible and Christian tradition, opened the floodgates of revolt against all that was sacred in morals and religion. The same logic that prompted Luther to deny the authority of Christ's Church enabled Socinius and Voltaire to deny the Divinity of Christ Himself, and the Hegelian philosophic brood to deny the Personality of God and deity humanity. Meanwhile the State, eagerly reaching out to grasp what ecclesiastical authority had lost, established Gallicanism in France, Josephism in Austria, and a similar dominance over the Church, her ministers and ministries wherever it could compass it, be the ruler a Bourbon, a Tudor, a Hapsburg or a Hohenzollern. The result was the Voltairianism, speculative and practical, that inspired the French revolutionists and their offspring, and still inspires the forces which in schools, universities and legislatures, by press and platform and multiplex literary propaganda, are working for the overthrow of Christianity not only in France, Italy and the Spanish peninsula, but throughout the Christian world.

The Catholic reaction was met by the expulsion of religious orders, the fettering of hierarchy and clergy, and the secularization of schools and religious institutions. This process in Germany was called the Kulturkampf. The exposition of this elaborate attempt to establish State Absolutism on the ruins of religious liberty forms a most instructive chapter, illustrating not only the motives and methods of anti-Christian warfare, but how they can be successfully combated by intelligent organization and manful resistance. The latest social and political developments of "the war upon religion" are treated with clearness of vision as to facts and purposes, and the whole book, of which we have given the merest outline, has a breadth and depth of view and a directness of application to present needs that will demand further consideration.

It is regrettable that the printer and proof-reader have done their work indifferently. This matter will, no doubt, be remedied in the second edition, and we would suggest that Belgium and other fields of anti-religious warfare be added to its scope. It is a work which we heartily commend to our readers and trust will be disseminated widely.

M. K.

The Residuary Sect. By BIRD S. COLER. Brooklyn, N. Y.: The Eastern Press, 445 55th street.

"The Residuary Sect" is Mr. Coler's second pamphlet on the School Question. It shows in a very forcible manner the impossibility of an agreement about the quantity and quality of the religious teaching that might be admitted in the public schools. Protestants will not agree with each other, Catholics will not agree with Protestants, the Jews will not agree with either, and the Socialist will throw out all religious instruction.

This second contribution to the discussion is in the form of an answer to a letter which had been evoked by the initial pamphlet on "Socialism in the Schools." The objections are fairly and squarely and satisfactorily met; and the conclusion is unavoidable, viz.: that there is no other way out of this controversy than that of separate schools.

* * *

Education in Sexual Physiology and Hygiene. By PHILIP ZENNER. Cincinnati: The Robert Clarke Company. Net $1.00.

We have but one fault to find with this unpretending, yet valuable little book. Dr. Zenner agrees with a large number of prudent educators when he emphasizes the need to-day of an explanation of the problems he discusses couched in terms which are adapted to the age of children to be instructed. But a Catholic teacher will consider his booklet defective because it dwells almost entirely on the physiological side of the matter. His experience will have assured him that instruction on the delicate points touched upon by Dr. Zenner will be generally fruitless unless the entire education is based upon and permeated by religious principles and motives. In no other detail of a child's training is the ethical and supernatural so invaluable an aid as precisely in the warnings to be impressed upon the child mind in the matter handled here. Perhaps Dr. Zenner will answer that his book is intended to be a message from a physician to his people, and that he had no mind to do more than suggest some "modes of instruction that tend to make a pure mind and the imparting of knowledge that helps to safeguard the individual." This would mean, no doubt, that his little manual is to serve rather as a guide to teachers, who are to use its aid in their own way in communicating the instruction that ought to be given. Understanding this to be the mind of the eminent Cincinnati physician, one may cheerfully welcome his book as a great help to parents and teachers. He handles an extremely delicate subject in an eminently modest way, and he presents a fine example of how to deal with the physiology of the question without doing harm.

* * *

EDUCATION

Immediately following the reopening of Parliament in Italy there will come up for consideration a bill already favorably spoken of in the Chamber of Deputies and, with certain slight changes, equally well thought of by the Senate. We refer to the new Public School Law which, according to the friends of the Government, embodies the "most serious effort made in Italy since 1860 to develop general school facilities for the people. The purpose of the bill is, as the preamble accompanying it affirms, to provide new schools, to put existing schools into better condition to do the work required of them, to increase the number of schools for adult illiterates, to introduce compulsory schools for soldiers, and to furnish money for the building of school edifices in towns and villages. As we know, the percentage of illiterates in Italy to-day is 40, although compulsory education has been in force since 1877. This condition of affairs is due to the fact that popular education has been subject to the control of the communal authorities, and these have not had sufficient funds at their disposal to attend to its development properly. Therefore the State proposes to take up the work and not merely provide ways and means, but to make effective the compulsory feature of the educational laws as well.

* * *

In the new legislation the Government proposes to create in each province an independent school board, which shall have complete charge of all public schools in the smaller towns and in the villages of the province. These boards, though local in character, will be in direct touch with the Government, and in each instance will be organized under the presidency of the Rector of the university of the province. The larger cities will administer their school affairs as they do at present, the contemplated legislation not affecting them. However, cities having a population under 10,000 will be allowed to give up the privilege of such administration and to hand their schools over to the provincial board should they wish to do so. The various municipal communities will continue to pay the school tax thus far assessed against them, the further funds required by the new law being provided by the State.

* * *

It has not been easy for the Catholics of Italy to determine the attitude to be adopted in regard to the proposed legislation in school affairs. They, of course, are heartily in accord with the proposal in as far as the widening of opportunity for popular education is concerned, and thus far they are ready to further the policy outlined by the State. The administration sections of the new bill, however, are not satisfactory to Catholics in general. A goodly number are of opinion that State control of the elementary schools will mean a de-Christianizing policy in the schools, an evil easily enough avoided under the system of communal control hitherto in vogue. Time alone will tell whether this judgment is well founded, though experience in other lands makes for its truth.

* * *

At present the various communal districts of Italy expend 140 million liras on popular education, and the State adds to this sum 21 million. When the proposed legislation will have become effective the State will add to its appropriation 16 million liras yearly until its gross appropriation will have reached the annual sum of 80 million liras. Thus, in a few years the combined resources of the school fund for public schools will amount to 220 million liras. In addition to this, to make possible the erection of new schools and put those in existence into proper condition for up-to-date school work, the State proposes to grant to the communal districts a loan of 240 million liras in sums of 20 million every year for twelve years. This loan will be non-interest bearing, but the districts sharing in it will be bound to pay back the amount received by them within fifty years. The State, too, undertakes to arrange for an advance in the salary rate of teachers. In military camps and on ships of the navy schools will be opened for soldiers and sailors, and the southern districts of the peninsula, where the need is greatest, will have schools for adults. To provide fittingly for the extraordinary demands for teachers the new law will create, steps are to be taken at once to equip seminaries of training, and it is hoped that the prospect of better salaries and improved conditions will attract many young people to the teaching profession.

The threats contained in the speeches of the two opposition leaders, Vandervelde of the Socialist party, and Hymans of the Liberals, made immediately upon the re-assembling of the Belgian Parliament, indicate a set purpose in both these parties to prevent the passage of the new school law in that land during the present session of the legislative body. It will be recalled by the readers of AMERICA that a compromise agreement entered into by the two sections into which the Catholic majority had been divided on the educational question permitted the framing of a bill satisfactory to both. The proposed measure concedes the compulsory feature in school legislation and provides, too, for State support of religious schools. Hitherto the denominational clause had not been found in provisions made for the public schools of the country. The introduction of such a clause into the new bill aroused passionate protest on the part of the opposition. In the speeches referred to Vandervelde and Hymans bluntly affirmed it to be the intention of the Socialists and Liberals to use every possible weapon of obstruction to prevent the consideration and passing of the proposed new school law. The defenders of the bill were equally frank in their announcement that they would meet the obstructive tactics and kill them and pass their law. A parliamentary critic, referring to the situation, declares the open challenge of the opposition to have been ill-advised, since it enables the majority to align their forces with full knowledge of the methods the enemy mean to use. Meantime Prime Minister Schollaert, after a lengthy interview with the King, during which unquestionably the proposed school law was fully discussed, made known to the majority his fixed determination to push the bill to a final vote during the present session.

From a report presented two weeks ago to a select committee of the Board of Estimate of New York, appointed to investigate the affairs of the Board of Education in this city, an item of interest to taxpayers may be quoted. According to information gathered by the committee, the annual per capita cost of educating school pupils in the city of New York is as follows:

High School	$85.07
Training School	90.39
Elementary schools	32.80

The average cost of education is set down as $45.06. The report explains that these figures include the cost of teaching and supplies, but do not include interest on a permanent investment of $100,000,000 in school buildings and property. The sum of $32.80 set down as the per capita cost of educating a child in the elementary schools of the metropolis is suggestive, when one remembers that similar work is done in the parochial schools; and done quite as well in every way if results count for anything, at an average cost of little more than $11.

The death of Thomas J. Whall, at Reading, Mass., on May 14, leads the Pilot of Boston to recall a most important chapter in the history of the parochial schools of that city. It was due, says the Pilot, to an incident in the life of Whall, when a schoolboy at the North End, that the parochial school system of the Archdiocese really had its beginning. Monday morning, March 14, 1859, Whall, who was then not quite ten years of age, was flogged on the bare hands with a long rattan cane for thirty-five minutes in the Eliot Grammar School on North Bennet street, by the sub-master, McLaurin F. Cook, because, being a Catholic, he refused to read a selection from the Protestant version of the Bible. The clergy and the laity of St. Mary's parish, in which young Whall resided, took prompt action and within a few days after the flogging the first distinctively parochial school for boys in New England was opened in temporary quarters. It remained in these for two years, until a school was erected and equipped on Endicott street, beside St. Mary's Church.

ECONOMICS

We quoted last week under "Sociology" the assertion that the increase in value of suburban New York lands is due to the labor and thrift of the working classes who have gone thither to dwell. This is a most mischievous untruth, designed to give these classes the idea that they are being robbed to enrich the landowners.

The mere coming of people cannot of itself give value to land. Had a million or so of working people come into those districts thirty years ago, they would have starved. Nor would work have helped them. They might have given themselves to work of the hardest kind, and have enriched neither themselves nor the proprietors. Profitable work is what people need in order to live and accumulate. The city offering such work will draw them; and the increased value of the land on which they must live is but an accidental consequence of the increased opportunity of work. Whatever extrinsic causality there may be of that increased value in New York suburban property must be ascribed to the opening of fields of profitable labor which drew hither the working population.

What are the newcomers doing? They are working in railway yards and in rapid transit companies, in water, and gas, and electric power works. They are in factories and offices and shops downtown, on the river and the docks. They are in the retail trade that has grown up in the new districts, and a hundred other occupations. They live by the city's extraordinary commercial growth of the past two or three decades; and this which gives them their livelihood gives the increase of value to the land. New York is under no particular obligations to them; but they are under very particular obligations to New York.

How is this sudden expansion of trade, so profitable to us all, to be explained? The volume of trade depends on four conditions, viz.: The capacity of the earth to furnish its material; the capacity of the race to work in that material, either by manufacturing it or transporting it, or delivering it to the consumer; the capacity of the race to consume; and the presence of a suitable and sufficient medium of exchange. The first condition has existed as it is to-day for ages. The second and the third, more remotely, perhaps, for a longer time than we are prepared to reckon. The fourth is what has developed so remarkably of late years.

The medium of exchange, or capital, is gold, which must be in proportion to the trade. The business done on a $10 capital is insignificant compared to that done on one of $1,000; and the same is true of capitals of 10 million and 1,000 million dollars. As we showed about a year ago, the vast development of the world's trade, of means of transport by sea and land, of huge industrial undertakings, of immense and costly buildings, is to be attributed to the sudden increase of the world's working capital which began with the gold discoveries in Australia and California, and was swollen to its present condition by the tremendous contributions of South Africa. The huge ships lying at our docks, the miles of railway trains hurrying forward and backward over our continent, the actualizing of the earth's producing power, and of the working and the consuming capacity of the race in the four quarters of the globe, have more to do with the value of lands in New York than any accession of laborers from abroad, who, but for those things, would not be here; and if any workers have a right to take toll of our prosperity, it would be the gold miners thousands of miles away, and they should then take it, not from landowners only, but from all who profit by their toil, down to even the humblest worker.

As for the part the people's thrift plays in enriching the landowner, we shall have something to say next week from a sociological point of view.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

"An English Wife" writes from Brandon, to a recent issue of the Winnipeg Free Press, in regard to the controversy agitating some Canadians concerning the marriage laws of the Church:

"With regard to the marriage laws affecting Catholics may I point out that those laws deal only with the children of the Church. They have nothing to do with non-Catholics of any race or creed. If our lawful authorities cannot guide us in these, and other momentous questions, then indeed we shall be as sheep without a shepherd.

"The question of the marriages of a nation is a most vital matter, and from its very nature it is one involving great intricacy at times, which the ordinary person is quite unable to solve or smooth out, though only too ready to criticise and condemn those who study and legislate for that object.

"The Catholic Church does not make these restrictions from any arbitrary assumption. She has the power, and uses it to safeguard her flock, as is her right; but there are some who regard her action as savoring of hardness and despotism, whereas it is entirely for the welfare, happiness and safety of her sons and daughters. Good Catholics and good Protestants have nothing to fear in the matter; bad Catholics, balked of their victims, or delayed in getting them, are the ones to hate and dread the marriage laws.

"Our rulers and legislators in the Hierarchy are not slipshod amateurs or fumbling quacks; they are qualified scholars, skilled students in the science of theology, experts, specialists, using their abilities and learning in a conscientious way. Those outside the Church, who have neither lot nor parcel with her, have surely no right to object to the rules she makes for her own—rules which she openly publishes. Rather ought they to be glad that it is made more difficult for heedless or imprudent people to become the victims of ignorance or wickedness.

"There are now pouring into this country thousands of men, some of whom will pose as free to marry when they know very well they are not; surely it is better and easier to restrict the tying of the nuptial knot than afterwards to try to undo or cut it.

"In the big cities more especially, one sees instances of marriages which ought never to have taken place—marriages which were not solemnized, but perpetrated. Isolated, crude, incomplete accounts of matrimonial tangles, filtering through from Ulster yellow journalism to Winnipeg via Toronto, are like facts boiled down to a spoonful of soupy misrepresentation.

"It appeals to one's sense of humor that the action of Rome in making marriage laws for her children is 'un-British.' Those dreadful contracts made of yore at Gretna Green, and the Fleet marriages were quite British, presumably. A sham minister in England, who, only some two years ago, 'celebrated' weddings which were afterwards found to be totally wanting in legality, was perhaps not un-British. At any rate, if those couples had been Catholics they could not have been so cruelly imposed upon.

"In the fountain head of all British citizenship, the dear old Motherland, many legal lights and also luminaries of the State Church wrangle and contradict as to which half of a married couple is free, and which is not; divorce is increasing; decrees have been rescinded, and bitter opposition was evoked when the State overruled the State church in saying a person could marry a deceased partner's near relative. It would be like a comic opera if it were not so pathetic.

"There is only one religion that dares in every country, regardless of smiles or frowns, to fight strenuously for the continuity of the valid marriage tie. To sling missiles at her for so doing is rather throwing stones from one's own little greenhouse."

SCIENCE

France recently enacted a law making it a penal offence to raise edible vegetables on sewage disposal lands, because of the supposed danger of poisonous germs being carried and introduced into the human system. Bacteriologists, having made a careful examination of the matter, declare the needlessness of this alarm. They have demonstrated that microbes do not enter the body of the vegetables under any circumstances, though it is possible for them to be entrained along the stem and leaves, but these locations do not favor their existence. Evidences of typhoid and cholera were negative, although a special search was made for such indications. The hardest germs only, such as tetanus, were found, and these are harmless when taken into the system through the stomach.

* * *

Nickel-steel has recently found its place in bridge construction. This product was first used in America in 1903. Germany introduced it in 1905. A bridge has been constructed at Oberhausen with a span of 104 feet between supports. The alloy contains from 2 to 2.5% of nickel with a tensile strength of from 123.2 to 143 pounds per square 0.00155 inch.

* * *

In spite of every precaution, spherical mirrors, formed by revolving pools of mercury, have hitherto proved unsatisfactory, owing to the unsteadiness of the apparatus used and the consequent rippling of the liquid's surface. The Philippine Bureau of Science now claims to have perfected a device by which this defect is overcome. A triple vessel is employed instead of a single one, and heavy paraffine oil is substituted for mercury. The vessels, of graduated diameters, are telescoped within each other and are separated at the bottom central points by conical pivots of steel. The driving mechanism is a small electric motor. With the oil poured in each vessel to about one-quarter of its depth, the innermost of the three is driven by what is in effect a double liquid friction drive, the unsteadiness of the system being absorbed by the fluid in the outer vessels. The curvature and consequently the focal length of the mirror is altered by the speed of rotation.

* * *

An electric manufacturing house of Germany announces a novel application of aluminium. Electro-magnets are wound with bare aluminium wire, which, in contact with humid air, becomes coated with a whitish film of oxide and subsequently thoroughly insulated. It is claimed that a short circuit is impossible within the coils.

* * *

Dr. Paul Aubourg, of Paris, has designed garments for physicians operating the X-rays which will ensure protection from all harmful effects. The outfit consists of a rubber mask with spectacles of a lead glaze, a long blouse made of lead, rubber and bismuth, and thick gauntlets of the same materials.

* * *

An output of 1,824 short tons of tungsten, valued at $832,992, makes that of 1910 the largest on record. Boulder County, Colorado, is the largest producer in the United States, with Atolia, California, a close second. The ore mined in Boulder County is ferberite (iron tungstate). Atolia tungsten is scheelite. The yield for a proportionate area in Atolia was greater than in Boulder County.

* * *

The possibility of blistering perfect sterling silver by overheating it during annealing in an oxidizing atmosphere is now fully established. As this blistering cannot be effected with a reducing flame, a new theory has been advanced, that the silver absorbs oxygen energetically with an approach of the temperature to the melting point. The older theory maintained that the blisters were faults of the metal itself, caused by the careless and imperfect melting.

* * *

A bulletin just published by the United States Geological survey fixes the commercial value of the metal rhodium at $155 an ounce. This rare metal is used principally in making high temperature determinations. The bulletin also states that the use of platinum in this country almost doubled during the past year. As the domestic yield has fallen off, the greater part of the metal was imported. The average price paid for platinum was $29.50 an ounce.

* * *

The English consul reports that a chemist of Birmingham has succeeded in solidifying gasoline. The converted mass has the appearance of a whitish jelly. The conversion is effected by adding 1.75 per cent. of soapstone and alcohol. The solid mass vaporizes slowly under the action of heat, and an economy of 30 per cent. in use is claimed over gasoline in the liquid condition.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

Upon analyzing and comparing the positions in space and the velocities and directions of motion of some of the brighter stars, several so-called flocks have been discovered, the components of which are so very far apart in the sky that community of motion is anything but obvious. Thus Sirius has been shown to belong to a group of five stars in Ursa Major. Another flock is made up of Alpha Cassiopeiae, Alpha and Beta Persei, Alpha Scorpii, Gamma Cygni and Alpha and Epsilon Pegasi.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

PERSONAL

The appointment of the Right Reverend Edmund F. Prendergast, Titular Bishop of Scillio, and Auxiliary Bishop of Philadelphia, is announced as successor to the Most Reverend Patrick J. Ryan in the Archiepiscopal See. Archbishop Prendergast was born in Clonmel, County Tipperary, Ireland, on May 3, 1843. He came to the United States in 1859, made his theological studies at 'St. Charles' Seminary, Overbrook, and was ordained priest in 1865. He was then appointed assistant at St. Paul's, Philadelphia, and at Susquehanna Depot. Afterwards he became rector of St. Mark's, Bristol, Pa., and served in the same capacity at Allentown, Pa., until 1874, and from there went to St. Malachi's, Philadelphia. From 1895 to 1897 he was vicar general of the archdiocese, and on February 24, 1897, was consecrated bishop. Since the Archbishop's death he has been acting as administrator. When the news of his elevation to the archiepiscopal dignity arrived he was at the altar ordaining twenty-two candidates to the priesthood.

The new Archbishop is very much beloved in the diocese with which he has so long been identified.

In commemoration of his golden jubilee as a priest, and the silver jubilee of his creation as a member of the Sacred College, a magnificent popular tribute has been arranged for his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, by the committees appointed by the Governor of Maryland and the Mayor of Baltimore. All his fellow citizens, without distinction of creed or class, have united in furthering the complete success of the extraordinary demonstration of the respect in which the venerable Archbishop of Baltimore is held. The exercises will take place in the Fifth Regiment Armory, from 4 to 6 o'clock in the afternoon of June 6. Among those expected to deliver addresses are President Taft, former President Roosevelt, Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court, Speaker of the House Champ Clark, former Speaker Cannon, Senators Rayner and Smith of Maryland, Governor Crothers and Mayor Preston. Bishop Murray of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Maryland and churchmen of other creeds are among the members of the Committee on Arrangements.

Sister Mary Joseph Abell and Sister Alexandrine de Butler have gone from the Visitation Convent, at Wilmington, Del., to found a new convent at Ottawa, the first in Canada, where, as at Wilmington, the primitive rule will be observed. They will return to Wilmington in September. Sister M. Joseph is the daughter of the late A. S. Abell, founder of the Baltimore Sun, and in 1889 entered the Visitation Community at Georgetown, D. C., where she had been educated.

* * *

At the commencement at St. Joseph's College, Emmitsburg, Md., on June 16, the faculty will confer the degree of doctor of literature on Sister Mary Antonio, a Sister of Mercy of St. Xavier's Academy, Beatty, Pa. Sister Antonio, in the world, was a Miss Gallagher, daughter of Anthony J. Gallagher, of Philadelphia, Pa., and was educated at St. Joseph's, Emmitsburg. Over the pen-name of "Mercedes," she has been a constant contributor to Catholic literature, and this work is now to be recognized by her alma mater.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The most consoling evidence of vitality in the Catholic Church of our day is the splendid growth of the devotion to the Holy Eucharist manifested during the past few years. One has but to recall the enthusiasm which marked the Eucharistic Congresses at Metz, London, Cologne and Montreal to realize the confidence with which it is affirmed that public profession of faith in the true and real presence of the Son of God in the Blessed Sacrament has rarely been so strikingly declared as in our own day. And these expressions were no mere passing tributes, easily explained by the external festivities which occasioned them. They were, rather, manifestations of a deep-seated faith in the Eucharistic mystery which has come to be the special mark of Catholic life in these times, and which is shown still more convincingly in the surprising spread among the faithful of the practice of frequent and even of daily Communion. What many held to be an impossible suggestion on the appearance of the Holy Father's decree of December 16, 1905, has come to be part of the religious life of Catholic people in gratifyingly numerous instances; weekly and daily communicants no longer are looked upon as rare exceptions, and the practice they follow is accepted as an ordinary expression of devout Catholic living.

Two years ago, during the Eucharistic Congress at Cologne, the Bishops of Belgium were able to report that in their dioceses the number of Communions distributed had been doubled since the decree was published. Recent announcements tell the same story of the dioceses in Germany, from some districts of which, in fact, comes the pleasing assurance that the number of Communions is five-fold what it used to be. In the little review, Eucharistia, published in Germany, there appears just lately a striking example of what is being done to promote the good work. In Ober Silesia four zealous pastors, administering parishes small in the number of souls they comprised, banded together to help each other to further the practice recommended by the Holy Father. A series of triduum in the four parishes gave most comforting results. During the last nine months in one parish of 1,000 souls, 64,000 Holy Communions were distributed; in the second, of 700 souls, there were 30,000 Communions; in the third, of 1,000 souls, more than 40,000 Communions were received; and in a fourth, numbering 1,100 souls, 45,000 was the number of Communions reported.

Similar excellent results are affirmed to be shown from the energetic efforts put forth in the larger cities of the German Empire to carry out the wish of the Holy Father. In Trier, to quote but one example, where the Catholic population in 1910 was 40,000, the number of Communions distributed in the churches of the city is reported to have run over 600,000.

According to the annual report of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the receipts during 1910 were $1,397,335, an increase of $55,043 over the preceding year. In this country New York leads with the largest amount contributed, $100,737. France gave $608,256.

The United States holds the second rank with $268,314.08, an increase of $47,676.30 over the receipts of 1909.

The other countries that contributed the largest amounts are: Germany, $151,043.32; Belgium, $68,583.70; Italy, $53,981.55; Argentine Republic, $45,554.25; Spain, $35,772.25; Mexico, $34,292.86; Ireland, $18,618.44; Switzerland, $18,078.20.

The Society gave to twenty-one needy dioceses in the United States and its colonies a regular allocation from the funds in 1910.

and nearly a third of the $268,000 collected in this country will be again allotted this year to the United States and its colonies.

The annual memorial military Mass, on the parade ground of the Navy Yard in this city, was celebrated on Sunday, May 28, and attracted an immense congregation, which included delegations from the local military organizations and thousands of civilians. The celebrant was the Rev. M. Gleason, U. S. N., Chaplain of the Receiving Ship Hancock, and the preacher the Rev. John Belford, rector of the Church of the Nativity, Brooklyn.

The cable announces that the Pope has dispensed the Catholics of the British Empire from the precept of abstinence on Friday, June 23, the day of the coronation of King George V.

Archbishop O'Connell of Boston announces that at the close of the current school year the direction of the Brighton Seminary will be assumed by the diocesan clergy. The Rector appointed is the Rev. Dr. John B. Patterson.

Bishop Harkins has introduced the Dominican Order into the Diocese of Providence, R. I., and laid the corner-stone of the first church, St. Raymond's, to be served by them, on Sunday, May 21, in his cathedral city.

OBITUARY

Richard H. Clarke, Georgetown's oldest graduate and also one of the oldest members of the New York bar, and in active practice up to the time of his death, died at his residence, 340 West 71st Street, this city, on May 24. Mr. Clarke, who was born in Washington, D. C., July 3, 1827, was graduated from Georgetown University in 1846, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He subsequently received an M.A., and the degree of Doctor of Laws from his Alma Mater, and that of Doctor of Laws from Fordham University. Robert Clarke, a member of the Privy Council and Surveyor-General of Maryland under Leonard Calvert, was his ancestor; his grandfather was an officer under General Washington in the War of Independence, and his father fought in the War of 1812.

Dr. Clarke was admitted to the bar in Washington in 1848, and tried many important cases there, one of which established the validity at common law of building associations, and another that a municipal government issuing bonds or certificates of indebtedness out of a particular fund was liable generally for the debt in case such fund was not provided by the municipality.

Coming to New York in 1865, he was associated with Charles O'Connor in the Forest divorce case, the Jumel will case and the case of the United States against Jefferson Davis for treason. He was employed to investigate and report on the alleged claims of the heirs of Anneke Jans, which related to large sections of Trinity Church property, the investigation having been made through the Corporation Counsel's office under a resolution of the Board of Aldermen.

In New York, as in Washington, Dr. Clarke took an active part in the work of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the Young Catholic Friends' Society, and the Catholic Union. He was elected president for several terms of the New York Catholic Protector, and was one of the founders of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York.

Dr. Clarke was the editor of "The History of the Bench and Bar of New York"; the author of "Lives of the Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States," "The Illustrated History of the Catholic Church in the United States," "Life of Pope Leo XIII," "Old and New Lights on Columbus," and "France's Aid to America in the War of Independence," and was a frequent contributor to Catholic periodicals. He was one of the organizers of the first Catholic Congress, held on November 11-12, 1889, at Baltimore, and read a paper there on "What Catholics Have Done in the Last Hundred Years." For his literary labors on behalf of the Church he was awarded the Lætare Medal by the University of Notre Dame. Dr. Clarke was a widower, his wife, Ada Semmes, a cousin of Admiral Semmes of the Confederate States Navy, having pre-deceased him some years. He is survived by two sons and four daughters.

Mother Mary Loretto Quinlan, Superior of the Sisters of Mercy in South Carolina, died in Charleston, May 22, in the forty-seventh year of her religious life. Entering, at seventeen, the Charleston Convent of Our Lady of Mercy while the cannons were still playing on Fort Sumter, she labored in the various schools, orphanages and hospitals of which the Sisters of Mercy have charge in the diocese of Charleston, as subject and superior. Elected Mother Superior of all the institutions of the Sisters of Mercy in South Carolina in 1900, she opened St. Angela's Academy in Aiken, and in Charleston established a school for colored children, a training school for nurses at St. Mary's Infirmary, and several new foundations.

A model religious and able executive, she did much to preserve and promote the remarkable respect shown to the Catholic sisterhoods in a State where Catholics are, numerically, an insignificant minority.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

THE SENIOR CATHOLIC ACADEMY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Since S. M. A. is still in so receptive and inquisitive a mood in regard to the identity of the first Catholic Academy for girls conducted by "religious teachers (women) within the limits of the Thirteen Original States," it is a pleasure to cite, in this connection, some of the "facts of the past," which she truly observes "the present generation cannot change." Of course, as she now admits that the first academy was the Visitation, at Georgetown, and not St. Joseph's, at Emmitsburg, her rating of its teachers depends on her interpretation of the term "religious teachers (women)." If she means to confine it to the strictly canonical explanation of women under vows in a religious community that had received formal ecclesiastical approval, there can be no doubt that the Emmitsburg community antedates that of Georgetown in the time of its recognition. But if she will give it a broader meaning, and the one generally accepted at the period in question, let her read the following and draw her own conclusions:

After the suppression of the Society of Jesus, the Rev. N. Paccanari, in August, 1797, founded in Rome the "Society of the Faith of Jesus," and hoping to extend its work to the missions in America, asked Bishop Carroll for information about the position and wants of the Church here. In answer to this Bishop Carroll, on October 27, 1800, writing from Georgetown, said:

"As to the female religious community, there are three women here at Georgetown, where the College is, all ready and filled with great desire of embracing the rule of the Society of the Faith of Jesus; one of these is a virgin, the two others widows of middle age. They have long lived a community life, after the pattern of regular observance, earnestly desiring, as far as the condition of their sex allows, to conform to the rule of St. Ignatius. They conduct a school for girls, which they direct with remarkable commendation and piety."

This would seem to be a fairly direct answer, by the highest local ecclesiastical authority, to both the naïve "questions" of S. M. A. and an exposition of the commonly accepted character of the "Pious Ladies." If she desires some more of the same tenor and import she can find it in another letter Bishop Carroll wrote, on July 14, 1805, to his old friend and former fellow Jesuit, the Rev. Dr. Betagh, of Dublin:

"My coadjutor, the Right Rev. Dr. Neale," he says in this letter, "has formed, under the conduct of four or five very pious ladies, a female academy at Georgetown, and has acquired for them a handsome property of lots and houses. These ladies, long trained to all the exercises of an interior and religious life, are exceedingly anxious to bind themselves more closely to God by entering into an approved religious order, whose institute embraces the education of young persons of their own sex, poor and rich."

At this time Mrs. Seton was still in New York, dreaming of "the little cells at Montreal" (July 4, 1807), and inviting her old friend Julia Scott to call on her in "Stuyvesant's Lane, Bowery, near St. Mark's Church, two white houses joined, left hand; children the sign of the dwelling, no number" (November 29, 1807).

In regard to the rest of S. M. A.'s doubts, apparently she has been giving us page 415 of Dr. Shea's "Life and Times of Archbishop Carroll," as the results of her investigations. There, after describing the yellow fever scourge in Philadelphia in 1798, he pathetically relates how "Miss Lalor beheld her two companions sink as victims to its violence." Forgetting this, on pages 502 and 503, he resurrects them in Georgetown, in 1800, and, following her historical mentor, S. M. A. seems to accomplish this miracle also in her letter.

The records of the community show that it was a young American postulant (another witness to the seniority of Miss Lalor's community) that died in Philadelphia of yellow fever, not either one of Miss Lalor's original companions. If S. M. A. will continue her investigations a little further and read "A Story of Courage," a volume prepared by the late George Parsons Lathrop and his wife (the present Mother M. Alphonsa, who is doing such heroic work in this city for the unfortunate cancer victims,) from the archives and records of the Georgetown Visitation Convent, and published in 1894, by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, she will find that good Dr. Shea not only nods but actually snores in his relation of the history of Mother Lalor and her institute. She will also see why Bishop Neale, their spiritual director, and not the "Pious Ladies" themselves, was so firm in his determination that they should become a community of Visitation nuns, and not of any other religious congregation. Answers, too, will be found for her other questions which space forbids dealing with here.

CLORIVIÈRE.

Brooklyn, May 30th.

[With this communication we must close the discussion.—Ed. AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 9

(Price 10 Cents)

JUNE 10, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 113

CHRONICLE

United States Senate—Steel Inquiry Begins—American Tobacco Company Dissolved—Oklahoma—The Philippines—Kansas Natural Gas—Wireless Telegraph Company—U. S. Post Office —Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—
France—Belgium—Spain—Germany—Austria—
Hungary—Rome193-196

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Spanish Catholics and Politics—The Recall—John Bright—Dr. Albert von Ruville—The Machine197-203

CORRESPONDENCE

Strikes in Rome and Their Causes—Spanish Parliament Hears Associations Law.....203-205

EDITORIAL

Catholic Spain—The Last Look—Criminal Statistics and Irreligious Schooling—Socialistic Freedom—The French Academy and Its Critics
—Decent Propriety206-208

THE LAST PRIZE OF THE BUCCANEERS.

209-210

LITERATURE

Father Damien—The Second Spring—The Heart of the Gospel; Traits of the Sacred Heart—
Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones Ordinarias
Variis in Linguis—Club Notes—Books Received.
210-212

EDUCATION

Some Serious Defects in the Present System of Public School Training—How the Catholic
Free Schools in England are Conducted....212

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Encyclical Letter of the Pope on the Anti-Religious Attitude of the Portuguese Government—"Ne Temere" Madness of Protestantism.
213

SOCIOLOGY

How Thriftlessness of the Wage Earners Enriches the Capitalist.....213-214

PERSONAL

Lord Alfred Douglas—Dr. Francis X. Lender.
214

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Mgr. Mooney Honored—Archbishop Bruchési
Sails for Madrid—President Taft at Mass—
State Convention of the German-American Union of New York—Cardinal Gruscha's Pastoral to Workingmen—National Conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society of Germany—
Failure of "Old Catholic" Teaching at Bern
University214-215

SCIENCE

Weather Proverbs—The Weight of a Gold
Carat215

OBITUARY

Brother Ulric Paquin, S.J.—Rev. Martial I.
Boarman, S.J.215-216

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Montreal Catholic Sailors' Club.....216

CHRONICLE

United States Senate.—The Senate, by a practically unanimous vote, ordered the reopening of the investigation of the election of Senator Lorimer. After a prolonged discussion of the method of selecting the committee to make the inquiry, the Martin resolution placing the matter in the hands of the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections was adopted.—Some interesting light as to the source of the opposition to reciprocity was brought out by Senator Stone, of Missouri, who, in examining two witnesses before the Senate Finance Committee, drew from them the admission that, while ostensibly carrying on a campaign for the benefit of the farmers in opposition to the agreement, their expenses were guaranteed by representatives of large corporations operating in other interests.

Steel Inquiry Begins.—Mr. John W. Gates, of the Republic Iron and Steel Company, was the first witness summoned by the Stanley committee of the House in its investigation of the United States Steel Corporation. He stated that the corporation had its inception in the fear on the part of J. P. Morgan and others that Andrew Carnegie would attempt to break into the railroad business in the United States and to undertake the extension of his steel manufacturing interests along new lines. Mr. Gates further declared that Mr. Carnegie had something to sell, and as a result he sold it for $320,000,000, about $160,000,000 in excess of what he offered to take a year previously. Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation, surprised the committee by saying that he believed the only remedy for the impositions of immense aggregations of capital was government control, adding that the corporation had nothing to conceal, that it would cheerfully submit full information as to its operations, and that there was no truth whatever in the report that it contemplated a world-wide combination to control steel prices.

American Tobacco Company Dissolved.—On May 29, the Supreme Court, by a unanimous decision, pronounced the above named Company and all the elements composing it, both corporate and individual, to be a combination in restraint of trade, within the prohibition of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. The Company, which had stock amounting to $380,000,000, and had issued bonds to the extent of nearly $148,000,000, was ordered to be dissolved within a period of six months, with a possible extension of sixty days. The Supreme Court reverses the Circuit Court to the extent of including within its mandate the United Cigar Stores Company and the British-American Tobacco Company. In giving this opinion, Chief Justice White reaffirms the "rule of reason" applied to the Standard Oil, and refers to the literal interpretation as "the letter which killeth." He declares the Company guilty of wrongful purpose and illegal combination, because the first combination was impelled by a fierce and abnormal trade war, because acts were committed with the clear intent to establish a monopoly, entry of others into the tobacco trade was blocked, and millions of dollars were expended to purchase plants, not to operate, but to close them. The decision affects sixty-five American corporations, two English companies and twenty-nine individual defendants. As in the Standard Oil case, Judge Harlan objects to the court's interpretation of the statute according to "the rule of reason."

Oklahoma.—The Supreme Court has decided that the people of Oklahoma were within their rights in transferring their capital from Guthrie to Oklahoma City, in spite of the provision in the act of admission, that the seat of government should remain at Guthrie until 1913. It is conceded that the Government of the State could annul this clause at its own convenience. This decision will not affect the "grandfather" suffrage qualification, because the Constitution of the United States forbids discriminating against anyone on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude, but it may raise doubts about the promise given by Utah to stamp out plural marriages.

The Philippines.—Another decision with regard to the importation of Philippine tobacco virtually establishes the position of the colonial possessions with regard to the United States. They are not to be considered as a foreign country. The court has declared against the claim of Cuban importers to send cigars to the United States at a rate of twenty per cent. less than their competitors in the Philippines.

Kansas Natural Gas.—The importance of the ruling in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases may have the effect of obscuring another decision of great political, as well as industrial importance: the decision, namely, in favor of the United States against the Kansas Natural Gas Company. The Court declares that a State cannot impose any prohibitive restriction on the exportation of its own products. Such restriction is judged to be a violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution. This judicial utterance goes far to upset the old Democratic doctrine of State Rights, and to establish the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the products of a State as soon as they are designed to enter interstate commerce.

Wireless Telegraph Company.—The defendants were found guilty of misuse of the mails to defraud investors, and prison sentences were imposed on five of the defendants, with the additional penalty of paying the costs of the trial, which will amount to more than $50,000. Bail was also refused. When the trial was over the United States Attorney, Mr. Henry A. Wise, made the startling declaration that during the proceedings an attempt was made to bribe him and one of the jurors.

U. S. Post Office.—From 1882 there was an unbroken record of deficits in the receipts of this Department, and in 1908-'09 the adverse balance was $17,441,719. In the following year the deficit was cut to $6,100,000. At the present writing this has not only been wiped out, but the Postmaster-General announces that by June 30 he will have a surplus of $1,000,000. This wonderful improvement has been done without crippling the service. On the contrary, within the last two years, 3,089 new post offices have been established, 2,124 new rural routes have been created, 8,724 more men have been employed and salaries increased $11,708,071.

Mexico.—"The President of the Republic is dead; long live General Diaz!" Thus Deputy Aspé, in the Mexican Congress, concluded his speech when the resignation of Diaz was presented. The choice of presidential electors will take place on November 5, 1911, and these will select the President on November 19, 1911.—Former Secretary of the Treasury J. I. Limantour and other trusted friends of General Diaz have left Mexico for the United States.—Madero has signified his willingness to become President, but he has also said that, in such an event, he would undertake to suppress gambling and bull-fighting.—That the peon class may share in the benefits of the revolution, it has been publicly urged that the State issue bonds or certificates of indebtedness in a sum sufficient to cover the fictitious indebtedness of the peons to their employers and thus ransom them from serfdom.—General Reyes reached Veracruz and spoke of peace and the Presidency.—The revolutionary troops south of the capital show little inclination to accept the peace arranged by Madero. Their attitude threatens to develop into renewed hostilities.

Canada.—At a political meeting, Mr. Sidney Fisher, a member of the Cabinet, announced that if the Opposition persisted in obstructing the Reciprocity agreement there would be a dissolution. This, therefore, seems certain.—Mr. Fielding has gone to London. It is said that he will replace Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who will return immediately to take charge of the electoral campaign in Quebec, where Mr. Bourassa is likely to prove a formidable opponent.—Two million immigrants came into the country during the past decade. Of them 750,000 were British and 700,000 American. The provisional reports of the census indicate a population of eight million.—There is some talk among Liberals of introducing the clôture into parliament. They pretend that, if the elections go in their favor, this may be taken as a mandate for the change. Conservatives deny this, holding that in so grave a matter the minority has always a right to force an appeal to the people.—The Protestant agitation over the Ne Temere decree continues unabated, and the Protestants are showing their hand at last. Archdeacon Fortin, an Episcopalian minister of Winnipeg, asserted in a sermon that Canada is a Protestant country and will accept no dictation from the Bishop of Rome. The Quebec position is the fact. Canada is a country partly Catholic and partly Protestant, in which Catholic rights are secured by treaty.

Great Britain.—Winston Churchill, the Home Secretary, attacked the judges in the House of Commons lately. He admitted that in criminal and ordinary civil suits they are above reproach, but said that in matters involving Trades Unions and in election petitions they were influenced by their politics. The motive of the attack was drawn from the decisions in the election petitions, all of which were in favor of the Unionists. A few days later the Hull petition was decided in favor of the Liberals and the Unionist member unseated. This produced counter-clamors of intimidation, and a Unionist mob hooted the judges, as a Liberal mob had done at Exeter, hitting one with a piece of coal.—The Imperial Conference has been rich in words of loyalty and devotion to the Empire, but as far as can be learned its acts tend more and more to that absolute independence of action which must result eventually in the Empire's disruption. The Colonies maintain absolute control over the navies they are building; the Pacific, it is reported, is to be left to them, the King's ships being withdrawn, except from the China station, and the bond between them and the mother country does not amount even to an offensive and defensive alliance.—Opposition to Lloyd George's National Insurance scheme is growing amongst the working classes, who object to being compelled to contribute to the fund. The friendly societies and the doctors are also against it; the former because it interferes with their organized work, the latter because it destroys their practice and obliges them to perform onerous duties for a very insufficient stipend.—Greater London's population has increased from 6,581,402, in 1901, to 7,252,963. The growth is only in the outer circle. Not only does the City proper show its usual decrease, but the adjacent boroughs have also diminished, the total loss being over 13,000. England and Wales have increased by over $3\frac{1}{2}$ million to 36,075,269. Wales, however, shows a decrease.

Ireland.—In a debate on the Irish Education Vote the Irish Unionists combined with the Nationalists in protesting against the unfair discrimination by which Irish education had been penalized. Mr. Dillon, the chief speaker, showed that the income of the Irish Board of Education was, proportionately, but one-half that of England and Scotland, and that while the British annual grants were increased, Ireland's were decreased. He demanded financial equality and a revolution in the system by which the Board, at present nominated and irresponsible, would be made elective, and thereby be in touch with the educational ideals of the nation. Mr. Birrell agreed to increase somewhat the grants for primary school buildings and for Intermediate Scholarships, and promised a number of small concessions for next year.—There is a growing dissatisfaction with the Government Insurance Bill in regard to its application to Ireland. It seems, from a supplementary statement of Lloyd George, that he took no account of the social and economic conditions of Ireland in his actuarial calculations. Mr. Clancy, M. P., speaking on the Second Reading, said the Irish Party would not reach a final decision until the Irish Councils and rating authorities had fully examined and reported on the scheme. However, it was evident there was less sickness and money in Irish rural districts, where the majority lived, than in English industrial hives. Hence, if the scheme is applied the Irish payments should be smaller. The Irish medical service for the poor was good, and no legislation could be allowed to prejudice it. Dr. Esmonde said the measure would be useful to the Irish members when it reached Committee, as it would show the absurdity of trying to legislate for England and Ireland at the same time.—Capt. Donelan has been unseated by petition for East Cork, on account of election illegalities, though his majority was overwhelming. William O'Brien was the defeated candidate, and the Messrs. Healy conducted the case. Mr. Frewen has agreed to resign Northeast Cork in favor of Mr. T. M. Healy.—Mr. Redmond has written to the Dublin Independent replying to criticisms on the Party regarding the lack of due Irish representation on the financial relations committee. He says the Party is not responsible for the personnel of that body; that they rely on the report of the Childers' Commission, and are free to condemn or approve the findings of the actuarial committee according to its worth. Meanwhile, he invites advice and suggestions on the crucial question of Ireland's financial status under Home Rule.

France.—Mulai Hafid, the Sultan of Morocco, has informed General Moinier that he wants a garrison of 5,000 troops for Fez, and another of 5,000 for Mequinez, a city thirty-four miles from Fez. The request will have to be granted, for it is certain that a withdrawal of the French from the capital would be the signal for an outbreak against the Sultan.—The public are discussing the likelihood of the fall of the Monis Cabinet, as the injured Premier is still confined to his bed and the affairs of the country cannot be managed in his absence. Clemenceau is mentioned as a possible successor.—The Cabinet met on May 24 and proposed to proceed in a most vigorous fashion against Catholics in the matter of Education. The precise character which the new persecution is to assume has not yet been made public, but the Lanterne, one of the most hostile French papers, is of the opinion that "the measures to be taken will be efficacious."—The depths to which the corruptors of morality descend at the present day finds its latest expression in d'Annunzio's play of "St. Sebastian," which is being acted in Paris. St. Sebastian is the Christian martyr who was stripped almost naked and shot to death with arrows. He is represented in the play by a Russian Jewess, who, according to the press, "possesses the physique of a young man rather than of a young woman." The first act, we are told, "begins in the court of the Annunciation lilies." Another act "reveals a young woman wasted with fever who discloses on her person the figure of Christ, and unfolds her shroud bearing the blood stains of the Sacred Body." Again, one of the arrows discharged at Sebastian pierces the heart of God, whereupon "Sebastian's soul rises to Paradise." Such are a few of the blasphemous indecencies of this gross assault upon the most sacred mysteries of Christianity.

Belgium.—A new school law has been presented to Parliament, as supplementary to the Schollaert Bill. Its purpose is to meet some of the objections that have been made since the latter has been before the people.—Two earthquakes have recently startled the quiet people of Belgium. Fortunately, no great disaster resulted.

Spain.—The entire episcopate, headed by the primate, Cardinal Aguirre y García, Archbishop of Toledo, have sent a protest to the President of the lower House of the Cortes against the Associations Law, now in the hands of a committee of the House. The bishops, "using the right of petition and believing that they are performing a patriotic duty," remind the House that on a former occasion they characterized a similar project as "unnecessary, improper, and unjust." They now add, that "if the secular power is to consider itself at full liberty to legislate in matters which are a part of the Concordat with the Holy See, and to ignore the provisions of the Concordat, the secular power should begin by renouncing the privileges in matters religious, which it enjoys in virtue of the Concordat, and as long as the Concordat is respected and observed." This seems to point to the nomination of bishops and other church dignitaries, which privilege the Concordat accords to the Spanish government. The most significant utterance in the protest is the warning of the bishops that "to proceed independently of the Holy See in matters intimately connected with the Church is not to make ready for the separation of Church and State, but it is worse, in a certain way, than separation itself; for the State would thereby separate itself from the Church where the State should see hope of profit, and remain united with the Church, in like manner, where the State should see hope of profit, making no account in either case of the State's solemnly contracted obligations to the Church and the Church's rights in the premises. To proceed in this way is to give to the citizens the pernicious example of not keeping one's promise in the most sacred contracts."

Germany.—On May 29 Germany expressed her willingness to enter into negotiations with the United States for a general arbitration treaty along the lines laid down by Secretary of State Knox in the tentative draft of the proposal made by the United States and now in the hands of Great Britain and France. To Count von Bernstorff, Ambassador in Washington, there were sent directions to convey this information to the authorities in Washington, and to ask for a copy of the basic proposition prepared by Secretary Knox.—The semi-official opinion is expressed in the German papers that Germany, like Great Britain and France, is most sympathetic towards President Taft's arbitration proposal. Leading organs like the Frankfort Zeitung welcome the news of the suggested treaty, though they find that the project is open to improvement on some important points.—The nomination of Prof. Edward Charles Pickering, Director of the Harvard Observatory, to be Knight of the Prussian Order of Merit, was gazetted May 31. Only two Americans have previously received a similar honor. They were Newcomb and Agassiz. Since the death of the latter there has been no American member of the Science Department of the Order, and the only American in the Fine Arts' Department is Sargent, the painter.—Cloudbursts, accompanied by heavy hail, caused great damage in South Germany. On the last day of May eight inches of rain fell at various places in the south, destroying the fruit trees and crops, and killing birds by the wholesale. It is reported that twenty-five persons perished in the floods which followed these cloudbursts.—The Reichstag, on May 31, adjourned to October 10, after having by a decisive majority approved of the insurance bill, which had been presented by the Government. The only opposition to the measure came from the Socialists.

Austria-Hungary.—Count Aehrenthal, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the dual monarchy, has taken up once more the duties of his office. On May 30 he held a long conference with King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, who was passing through Vienna. The present condition of affairs in the Balkan provinces was the chief point discussed in the conference, with especial reference to the attitude which the Russian Government appears to have taken towards Turkey.—Despatches from Vienna on June 1 give the semi-official statement that continued improvement is noted in the condition of Emperor Francis Joseph. To spare the aged monarch's strength announcement is made that he will give no audiences and attend to no details of public business for two or three weeks to come. Archduke Francis Ferdinand will, as he has been doing, look after the necessary business of administrative work, and will represent the Emperor in functions announced for Vienna and Budapest.

Rome.—Verdesi, who accused Father Bricarelli, S.J., of violating the secret of the confessional, was sued by the latter for libel, and on June 5, was found guilty and sentenced to ten months in jail, besides paying all the costs of the trial.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Spanish Catholics and Politics

Not the least grave of the many important problems which now engage the attention of the Father of Christendom is that of the divisions which exist among Spanish Catholics. It is not hidden from him that untold evils have befallen religion, and have afflicted the country on account of earnest but ill-advised wishes to identify the cause of the Church with that of some fixed political program; and it has been one of his most cherished projects to promote peace and restore harmony among Spanish Catholics.

The elections last March for the choice of provincial councils gave the Carlists and the Integrists an occasion to set up a "Catholic Anti-Liberal Coalition," for the purpose of working at the polls against, not only Radicals and Socialists of various stripes, but also against Conservatives, and even Catholic Constitutionalists, or Alfonsists. The Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá declined to approve the coalition, for it was plainly directed against Catholics, and therefore it fell to pieces. But the promoters of the fusion were far from being reconciled to the bishop's action, and from the safe retreat of their official organs they indulged in veiled attacks on him, and in hardly respectful censures of his conduct. Not satisfied with this, they appealed to Rome, with the intention of forcing the bishop, through Vatican influence, to recede from his position and come out clearly and plainly in favor of the fusion. About the same time, as has been asserted in public and not denied, certain personages high in the councils of the Conservative party, the chief among them being Señor Maura himself, appealed in their turn to Rome for an explicit declaration whether one could belong to the Conservative party and, at the same time be, and be called, a true Catholic. This is the one knotty point, as we have pointed out on a former occasion, in the whole Spanish politico-religious question.

The answer of the Holy See to this vexed question, which has so long been a bone of contention in Spain, was not hard to foresee. The aloofness and the extremism of the Carlists and Integrists could not be approved; to deny the name of "Catholic" to men in the Conservative party who, in public, as well as in private, have shown themselves truly religious and devoted children of the Church, would have been an injustice and a manifest error. On the other hand, the thought of condemning those Spanish political parties, which have sealed, even with their blood, their loyalty to the Faith, could not be entertained, for the Church sees in them, especially in the Carlists, her great reserve force, most faithful and most devoted, on which she must rely should a tremendous social and religious revolution threaten to engulf the country.

Such being the case, the Holy See has spoken. Its words, inspired by lofty wisdom, foresight, and prudence, leave no room for doubt or misgiving of any kind. On April 20 of the present year, there was issued at Rome a practical guide for Spanish Catholics, which the nuncio in Madrid sent to all the members of the hierarchy. In that guide will be found the solution of those practical difficulties which are bound to arise where religion and politics are as closely connected as they are in Spain. The first point made is, that it is the duty of all Catholics to combat the errors condemned by the Holy See, especially in the Syllabus. Thus the Carlists and the Integrists are comforted and encouraged. But, the guide adds next: "This spiritual reconquest of Spain must be effected within the limits of what is lawful, and by using all the arms that the law permits." Thus, it does not countenance the Carlist threat of recourse to civil war, nor does it favor the Carlist practice of abstaining from all political activity or share in it.

Secondly, the guide recognizes as proper the existence of different political parties, but does not wish to see the Church identified with any one of them to the exclusion of others. It will be remembered that the Carlists are prone to identify politics and religion.

In the third place, the guide lays down: "It is not allowable to accuse or attack as not true Catholics, or not good Catholics, people who, without ever giving up the defence of Catholic principles, wish, for proper motives and for a right end, to belong, or actually do belong, to political parties existing at the present time in Spain." Without mentioning them by name, it is plain that the guide here has in view the Alfonsists and the Conservatives, whom the Carlists nickname "halfbreeds," and accuse daily of being either false Catholics or bad Catholics.

The guide then speaks of the impropriety, rashness, and injustice of stigmatizing as heretics those who call themselves "Liberals" and profess a political liberalism quite different from the Liberalism which has been condemned by the Church; and it goes on to reprove the action of those Catholics who let politics severely alone and condemn Catholics in public life, as if politics and love for religion and country were things irreconcilable. Indeed, it says in express terms that there may be put on nobody's conscience the obligation to belong to one determinate political party, to the exclusion of all others; and it says that it is necessary at times for Catholics to form fusions or combinations when the interests of religion and patriotism demand united action. Further, they may even organize parties independent and distinct from the existing political parties, provided their organizations do not aim at overthrowing the existing political order, and they do not reproach as non-Catholics those of their brethren in religion who may not see fit to unite with them.

"Rome has spoken," we may now say, but we hesitate to add, "and the case is ended." For the time being, the Carlists and the Integrists will observe a studied silence, as they have done before on similar occasions; but ere long they will both set themselves to work to twist and distort the Holy Father's words by subtle and sophistical interpretations into having no application to them and their political dreams. Such is the violence of political feeling that the partisans of Don Jaime will stand anything rather than combine even locally and for the occasion with the Alfonsists and the Conservatives.

It is a great pity that such is the case, for if the Carlists and the Integrists were to prefer in practice religious interests to political interests, if all Catholics would, at least on occasions, rally around Señor Maura, it would be an easy matter to give battle to the revolutionary elements and overthrow them, as well as to nip in the bud any effort of sectarian politics. In a single word, what the Vatican asks, what the Vatican longs for, in these trying moments for Spain, is the formation of one, and only one, great Catholic party, made up of all the elements of the Right, whatever be their source, origin, or purely political program, for the purpose of opposing an effective "block" to the subversive political schemes of the radicals and revolutionists and their party-colored allies arrayed on the Left.

NORBERTO TORCAL,

Editor of El Noticiero, Saragossa, Spain.

The Recall

Elect your rulers, but retain the right to discharge them, is the latest device for civil reform. The fear of dismissal makes private servants behave, why should it not do the same for public servants? The question supposes "public" and "private" to be the only differentiating note between a governor and a footman.

"Servant" has more meanings than one. The Pope calls himself in a breath, "bishop," and "servant of the servants of God." One of lofty station may style himself my "obedient servant." The Collector of the Port and the officer on the pier are both servants, and so are the Prime Minister of England and his page in buttons. The person of high estate subscribes himself my "obedient servant" if he wants to keep me at a distance. Otherwise it would be, "Yours truly," a subscription implying that the former is a mere euphemism, such as Job's wife used in recommending her husband to bless God and die. The Collector and his officer differ only in the degree of service, its nature being the same. The Prime Minister and the page differ as regards both the nature of their service and the dignity of the person served. The former is supposed to serve the country: the latter serves really the minister's wife. The precise difference between the former's public service and the latter's private, none can teach us better than the Pope.

He calls himself in one breath, "bishop," and "servant of the servants of God." He has supreme authority over these; but in exercising it he is their servant.

Authority is the essential social bond, uniting individuals and directing them to the common good. Because it is essential, it is for society's welfare, not for its possessor's private benefit. He must spend himself for those over whom he is placed, and therefore he is both ruler and servant. He serves in ruling: he has the right to be obeyed.

Such is the condition of every possessor of public authority. In a republic the people designate him; but once he has taken office they are obliged to submit to his constitutional rule. If he violates the constitution, this provides a remedy. The object of the Recall, therefore, is to ensure an upright administration, rather than a constitutional one. Is it a legitimate means? In other words, may it not become an instrument of greater evils than those it is designed against?

This seems to us a real danger. Many remember how, in the last century's eighties, the Irish party stopped all business in the British parliament. Obstruction is not necessarily unlawful. It has always been considered a weapon a minority may use legitimately to secure for their grievances an attention they cannot gain by speech or vote. Even if unlawful, it can be overcome with patience; for violence cannot last in a free assembly. But these considerations were ignored by the parliament of the day. It lost its temper, and, to chastise the Irish party, introduced the clôture, by which a strong minister can cut debate short as he thinks good. Within the past few weeks two parliaments have shown how evil was that reform. A vigorous application of clôture rushed the Parliament Bill through the British House; while in the Canadian House, where there is no clôture, the minority has been able to delay action on the Reciprocity Agreement, and will probably obtain its reference to the people. We express no opinion on the measures in question, nor upon the propriety of obstruction in the case of either. We only point out how an unwise reform has made the English Parliament little better than an instrument to register the cabinet's decrees, while the Canadian, free from that reform, retains full power over the legislation proposed to it.

Much in the same way the Recall seems to vitiate authority. In his election a ruler may receive, it is true, a mandate, that is, he may be chosen on his undertaking to perform some specific act, or to follow some general policy. But this does not deprive him of the freedom of his office, as regards the carrying out in detail of his pledges, as well as all other things. At the next election he must give an account of his administration to the electors; but in the meantime they are subject to him, not he to them. The Recall, therefore, goes much further than the mandate. Its tendency is to transfer initiative from a lawful responsible superior to self-appointed irresponsible inspectors, and to make him depend, not so much on matured public opinion, which he should always respect, as on a momentary popular sentiment. When it succeeds in expelling corrupt official the Recall may seem satisfactory; but there is danger of its getting into the hands of those who will use it against officials unwilling to accept dictation. Both English parties welcomed the clôture when it was applied to Irish members only. To-day these join with the Liberals in voting it; and the cry of "Gag," once familiar in their mouths, comes now from the Unionists, who have discovered how greatly their predecessors erred in helping Gladstone to curtail the liberty of Parliament.

The Recall has, as yet, been applied in but a few cases, and those against whom it was directed were, to a certain extent, taken by surprise. A political party needs time to adjust itself to a new condition, but the resourcefulness of its leaders is always equal to the task. The defeat of the Recall of a corrupt administration would do far more to encourage it to graver misdeeds than any victory in a regular election. In the former case individuals are on trial for specific crimes; in the latter, it is rather the party that wins, the candidates veiling whatever evil designs they may have under fair promises.

The prudent course, therefore, seems to be to abstain from measures confusing fundamental social relations. If it be necessary, for the moment, to choose between enduring a bad official legitimately elected, and the interfering with the essential rights of authority, the former appears the less evil. Moreover, it is not good to be Utopian. The idea of absolute human perfectibility is a snare entangling many and exhausting uselessly their energies. Wherever human free-will enters there will be defects to the end of time, and forms of government are no exception. Of these each has its good and its evil; and if our democratic institutions have their special virtues, they have also their liability to special defects, which can be checked in no slight degree by the machinery provided by existing constitutions. But the best means to reduce them to a minimum is the earnest cultivation of Christian morality, in no form of society more necessary than in democracy. "Behold I make all things new," are the words of Christ Himself, and the efficacy of His religion to reform all social evils is the message our present Sovereign Pontiff sent out to the world, in choosing as his motto, when called to the Apostolic throne: "To restore all things in Christ."

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

John Bright*

In a charming preface to a most interesting and instructive book, Mr. Birrell, M. P., pronounces Bright "the greatest orator of his time in England"; Mr. O'Brien's closing sentence declares him "the greatest moral force which appeared in British politics during his generation"; and the illustration of both propositions is the burden of the 280 octavo pages that intervene. An appreciation of his work and character rather than a biography, the monograph brings into relief Bright's advocacy of free trade, parliamentary reform, justice towards Ireland, India and Canada; a policy of peace abroad and retrenchment at home, and, in general, the rights of the people as opposed to the privileged classes.

Sprung from the people, and too large in mind and character to seek a higher classification, Bright remained to the end a man of the people without ever becoming a demagogue. Opposed initially to the leaders of his own party on nearly every great question of the day, he had the courage to stand persistently alone and the force to swing around all parties to his views and enact them into law. A consistent admirer of the United States' system of government, he was the only prominent English parliamentarian who, from the start, advocated in the House and in the country the cause of the Union during the Civil War; and in this, as well as in his denunciation of Irish misgovernment and of England's wars of aggression, he boldly followed his convictions, no matter how unpopular the paths into which they led him.

It does not appear that Bright took much interest in religious dogma, though he was a constant reader of the Bible, and his speeches are saturated with its phraseology. His principle of non-intervention, that "England should mind its own business" and not interfere in the private affairs of other nations, seems to have kept him, as far we can glean, from entering into that close relationship with the continental anti-Catholic revolutionists which characterized most English statesmen of his time. He was the most pronounced and persistent opponent of Lord Palmerston, who may be said to have been the director-general of the anti-Papal revolutionaries of Italy. Whatever may have been his views of the Catholic Church, he was from his entrance into Parliament, an insistent defender of Catholic rights in Great Britain and Ireland, particularly at times when they had few friends and many enemies. Almost alone he opposed the popular clamor against the establishment of the Catholic Hierarchy in England, and denounced the Bill which Lord John Russell introduced to prevent it, as "a little, paltry, miserable measure." It was because of its opposition to the Disestablishment of Protestantism in Ireland that he issued the warning to the House of Lords that is now remembered: "In harmony with the nation they may go on for a long time, but throwing themselves athwart its course they may meet with accidents not pleasant for them to think of."

Bright's views on Irish affairs seem to have been, with one exception, the "life-long convictions" that Mr. Gladstone was said to be able to extemporize at any moment. He denounced the callousness of the Government during the Irish famine, while the code of political economy then in vogue was holding Gladstone dumb; and single-handed he had fought the Irish cause for a quarter of a century before Gladstone took it up. He had advocated the Disestablishment of the Irish Church long before Gladstone declared it outside the range of practical politics in 1865, or Fenianism had made it practical in 1869; and he had been exposing the evils of Irish landlordism twenty-seven years, when the Clerkenwell explosion awakened Gladstone to a sense of its iniquities. Alone he faced the anger of the multitude in defence of the Manchester Martyrs, and even reprimanded Justin McCarthy, then editor of a London journal, for lukewarmness in their cause. He had opposed the Maynooth grant, but only on the ground that it was given as "hush-money to make the priests in Ireland as tame as those of Suffolk," so that they would cease to proclaim the wrongs and cooperate in winning the rights of their people. He found the Land League methods too drastic for his Quaker soul and voted, though reluctantly, for two Coercion Acts, but it was Gladstone's Home Rule Bill of 1886 that first put him out of touch with the popular party in Ireland. He did not state publicly the grounds of his objections, but Mr. O'Brien is able to produce them. Their publication on the eve of the introduction of a new Home Rule Bill is well timed, and should prove helpful to those who advocate a generous measure.

* John Bright, A Monograph. By R. Barry O'Brien. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Co.

In an interview given to Mr. O'Brien just before the vote on the Bill of 1886, Bright seemed less opposed to the principle of the measure than to its defects. He thought the imperial parliament could remove all Irish grievances, but, were he persuaded of the contrary, he would still oppose this Bill. He had no fear that it would result in religious persecution, nor in separation, nor in unjust discrimination, and, unlike Chamberlain, he favored the clause that excluded Irish representation in the British Parliament; but the restrictions of the Gladstone measure would nullify its intent:

"This Bill does not go far enough. It would lead to constant friction between the two countries. Persuade me that Home Rule would be a good thing for Ireland and I would give you a measure that would make it impossible for the two countries to come into conflict. There is the danger. If you get only a half-hearted measure you will immediately ask for more. There would be renewed agitation. . . . Ireland should have control over everything which by the most liberal interpretation could be called Irish. I would have either trust or distrust. If I had trust, I would trust to the full. . . . But this is a halting Bill. If you establish an Irish parliament give it plenty of work, plenty of responsibility. Throw the Irish upon themselves—but give no Irish party leader an opportunity of raising an anti-English cry. That is what a good Home Rule Bill ought to do. This Bill does not do it."

Bright added: "I have been on the Irish side all my life, and now at the end of my life I do not like even to appear to be against you." He wrote to Mr. Chamberlain urging him, as the differences between him and Gladstone were trivial, not to vote against the Bill; and he told his son, Mr. W. L. Bright, M. P., who was a Home Ruler, to vote as he thought right. Mr. Birrell attributes Bright's lack of sympathy with Irish autonomy to the fact that, "like every true-born Englishman, he was encased in an unfeeling armor towards mere historical claims to separate treatment." The claims are not merely historical, but Bright insisted on such treatment for Canada according to her own heart, and, in a lesser degree for India. The true reason seems to be that he thought his great electoral reform bill could remedy all evils, and that, having been with the rest of his party opposed to Home Rule in his youth, he was so rigidly set in his views that he could not change them in his old age.

There are many illuminating historical references in the book, and many deft touches that indicate a practiced hand. Contrasting Parnell, Gladstone and Bright, "the three most remarkable politicians whom I have met," Mr. O'Brien thus describes their conversational characteristics: "Parnell listened and seldom talked, Gladstone talked and seldom listened, Bright talked and listened." It is not made clear that Bright was a good listener, but he is certainly shown to have talked his mind boldly and truthfully, and to have used his great gift of natural eloquence with honesty and sincerity of purpose. In his long public life he made not a few mistakes in application, but his guiding principle was as noble as it was Christian. Answering opponents of his pro-Irish policy, who accused him of lack of acquaintance with the subject, he said:

"There are certain questions with regard to any country that you may settle in your own house, never having seen that country, even on a map. This you may settle, that what is just is just everywhere, and that men, from those of the highest culture, even to those of the most moderate capacity, whatever may be their race, whatever their color, have implanted in their hearts by their Creator, wiser much than my critics, the knowledge and the love of justice." M. KENNY, S.J.

Dr. Albert von Ruville

II.

As a Catholic he has striven to penetrate more and more deeply into the spirit and teaching of the Church, not merely as a philosopher and historian, but as a simple believer. In the spirit of St. Anselm's "Credo ut intelligam" he approaches his study with the firm conviction that the Church, her teachings, sacraments, etc., belong to the supernatural order, and so are not to be compassed by the purely natural. The world of nature is the object of our senses, but the supernatural world is beyond the ken of our unaided faculties, and our speculation regarding it can be nothing more than mere conjectures.

Divine revelation alone, of which the Church is the authorized guardian and interpreter, can instruct us, and our only reasonable attitude is that of humble and docile submission. The contrast between the supernatural and the natural, between the Church and the world, is well illustrated in the chapter on the Holy Eucharist in "Back to Holy Church." The Eucharistic Sacrifice constitutes a fundamental difference between Catholicism and Protestantism. It is the soul of Catholic worship, the central fact of its rich liturgy, the "raison d'être" of its great cathedrals, its rich altars and so many of its devotions. Our Lord demanded an uncompromising belief in this mystery as a distinguishing mark of His disciples. He made it a sharply drawn line separating His followers from the unbelieving world. Peter, followed by the disciples, was the first to cross this line, when, in reply to Christ's query: "Will you also go away?" he replied, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." The Holy Eucharist has, indeed, since its institution been the life of the Church, the touchstone of her faith, the sign of her supernatural character. And yet what a stumbling block this mystery is for the Protestant and Rationalist! Dr. von Ruville tells us frankly that as a Protestant it was his last great difficulty. Once a Catholic, however, he began to realize its profound significance, but it was only, as he says, by crossing the mystic line and humbly submitting to the will of Christ. On the other hand, when the reformers of the sixteenth century started to "purify" the teaching of Christ and do away with the stumbling blocks of the Gospel the Eucharist was one of the first dogmas which engaged their attention. They allied themselves with those who found Our Lord's words "a hard saying." The numerous concessions since made by their followers to rationalism and infidelity have made it evident that "beyond the Eucharistic line there is no longer any bulwark or protection against paganism."

For many Dr. von Ruville's chapter on "Freedom in the Catholic Church" has a special interest, written as it is by a professor of standing in one of those national universities which boast of their "Lehr und Lern freiheit." He does not hesitate to declare that in becoming a Catholic he has found true devotional and intellectual freedom. His parish church is open to him all week, and not only on Sundays. He may attend Mass daily, receive the Sacraments as often as he wishes without exciting attention—in a word, there is no longer any barrier between his soul and its Creator. The Catholic's freedom receives a check in the form of commandments and prohibitions only when he is tempted to abandon God. On the other hand, Dr. von Ruville reproaches Protestantism with granting its adherents a freedom of quite a different character. They are under no strict obligation to attend church, partake of the Lord's Supper, etc. Their freedom lies in the direction of the world and the barriers are indeed elastic. Divine grace is not denied them, but if, while remaining true to their principles, they wish to draw near to God they are sure to meet obstacles. The Real Presence is no longer theirs, confession is impracticable, while invocation of the saints, veneration of relics, religious vows and the many devotions which appeal so profoundly to the human heart are quite impossible or forbidden, for the simple reason that such things are Catholic.

What is more significant still, Dr. von Ruville tells us that he has also found a new freedom in his own special field of study. He has rid himself once for all of Protestant prejudice, and he feels that he is more than ever in a position to write non-partizan history, since he has acquired a first-hand and personal acquaintance with Catholic Christianity, which fills so large a space in the world's history. Finally, he regards it as no small gain to have henceforth divine truth as a guide and as a check in his future researches. His second apologetic work, which appeared only a few months ago, is in a way the complement of the first.

The student of modern history is constantly struck by the antagonism existing between the various Christian denominations since the Reformation. This antagonism has had far-reaching consequences, and the historian who would rightly analyze the events of the last three centuries, and view them in their true light, must seek an answer to the question, "Which religious party was in the past and is now in possession of the truth?" To supply the data for this answer is the task which our author has undertaken from the point of view of a Catholic, and particularly of a historian. The title of his book, "The Sign of the Genuine Ring" (Das Zeichen des echten Ringes, Berlin, 1910), was suggested by a parable in Lessing's drama "Nathan der Weise," in which the three religions, Christianity, Judaism and Islamism, are compared to three rings left as an inheritance, one of which is the genuine talisman and the others such clever imitations that they cannot be distinguished from it. The implication that religious truth is unattainable, and that for all practical purposes the three religions thus symbolized are of the same value, exists also in the minds of many with respect to the various forms of Christianity. While, on the one hand, it is clear to him who reflects a moment that all sects cannot be equally true, on the other it is also repugnant to our concept of God's justice and goodness that men should be forced to spend their whole lives in error. There must, then, be some visible sign by which the genuine ring—i.e., the truth—can be recognized.

Prescinding from the traditional notes of the Church, Dr. von Ruville considers the characteristically Christian virtue of humility as the sign which distinguishes the Catholic Church and marks it as the sole authentic form of Christianity. Such for him is the testimony of history. In the very beginning man's fall was due to pride. The Son of God, in humbling Himself by becoming man and accomplishing the will of His Father upon earth, again restored humility to its rightful place amongst men. Peter by divine revelation humbly acknowledged in his Master the God of Heaven, and was made by Him the foundation stone of the Church. The Apostles became the first pastors of the Church in obedience to the command of Christ, and in their turn entrusted their charge to their successors, who have ever had the same duty of submission to the teachings of the Church and to its chief. The Church for them is what Christ was for His Apostles.

But pride, the enemy of humility, has not been idle since the beginning of Christianity. It manifested itself in the heresies of the first centuries. It played its part in the great schism of the East, but it was the Reformation which proved its greatest triumph. The latter was a complete rupture with the past and its traditions. It was an attempt to form a new Christianity, and those who began the movement acted wholly on their own self-constituted authority. With no divine commission, they made themselves judges of the work of God. They proclaimed arbitrarily their articles of faith on questions of gravest import, nor did they hesitate to change them subsequently as they saw fit. They thus placed themselves on a plane far above that ever occupied by Pope or bishop. Protestantism, then, is nothing but a philosophy of religion, which has accepted and incorporated into its edifice larger or smaller fragments of Christian dogma. It contains much that is true, but of this truth it is incapable of offering any guarantee. Each one, after free investigation, may accept or reject its teachings, as one would accept or reject a scientific exposition. In a word, Protestantism, like the Reformation, is a work of man, and as a system it has set aside the Christian virtue of humility. For submission to divinely constituted authority in matters of faith and morals it offers independence and private judgment.

This little work is an admirable treatise on the place of humility in the Christian dispensation, and shows how thoroughly its author has caught the spirit of the faith he has embraced. We have only been able to point out a few of the features of Dr. von Ruville's two latest books. Full of thought and written in a calm, scientific style, without a trace of bitterness, they are well worthy of perusal by Catholics as well as by sincere truth-seeking Protestants. The author naturally addresses them particularly to the latter, for whom he has set a noble example. Patient study and reflection brought him to the Catholic Church; it was his humility, however, that finally opened her portals to him. HENRY M. BROCK, S.J.

The Machine

The tendency to specialization is perhaps doing more than any other single movement to fix the character of the material civilization of to-day—and of to-morrow. Specialization is not altogether a mere fad of the schools. Indispensable material needs of the common daily life have become dependent on it.

To put the whole case into one typical illustration, let us make a supposition. And to have no argument on the value of the supposition, let it be the purest supposition of something which we know shall never come to pass. Suppose, then, that, to-night, all the shoe-working machinery shall disappear, together with the machine-making machinery by means of which it might be replaced. What would be the consequence? Very many of our ninety million people would go bare-foot during the summer. They might get sandals, but they could not get shoes. And why not? Because they would not be able to find shoemakers.

Shoemakers! There are armies of them in the factories! Slowly. The regiments that converge to the factories in the morning, and pour out in the evening, are not shoemakers. Such they do not claim to be. Many might resent the title. They are shoeworkers. This is what they call themselves. It is by this name that they are always technically and officially designated. There certainly is not one shoemaker in the hundred. It would have to be proved that there is one in the thousand. They have specialized.

There are seventeen main operations in the making of a shoe. The first, the cutting, requires some hand work. The remaining sixteen are committed to the machine. The shoeworker specializes at acquiring accuracy and speed in presenting the shoe, at a given stage of its progress, to a machine that will advance it to another stage. The speed and accuracy that will secure the wage, at some stages, may be acquired by a fit subject in six or seven weeks. These seven weeks of practice in presenting the material to the machine supplant the obsolete apprenticeship, the seven years demanded in the "requirements" for graduating the architect and builder of a shoe.

The illustration could be carried through all the industrial arts. There would, of course, be a variation in the numbers. So, to speak generally, without changing the numbers, we may say that sixteen machines produce an article which was once produced by one man. And the sixteen machines, in the day's running, will produce one hundred times as many articles as could be made by sixteen men. And we may remark here that the secret of specialization has been found very available outside of the mechanical industries. Whenever a commercial enterprise takes on proportions there is an immediate division and a further and further subdivision of occupations. Very little training is needed for most of these fractional occupations. More work is done at lower wages. Intelligent experience, thus liberated from hampering routine and minutiae, is set free for more work of a higher order. But there is this difference, that there is here still an opportunity for advancement, and managers are on the lookout for talent to be promoted. But to return to the machine. There is a division of labor. But the machine does not labor. Though it can wear out, it cannot tire. For it there is a division of processes. The fraction of human energy commits the material to the machine for the fractional process. The man stands between the machines as the living link that unifies the processes.

It is a condition that is particularly lacking in educational value. The continuous repetition, day after day, of the same limited movement is not conducive to advancement in erudition or thought. Even the knowledge that is brought from eight years of school to the side of the machine disappears rapidly in most cases and is never regained. What is a man's occupation? To oil a joint, to reverse a movement, to release a clutch, to supply material to the hammers, and saws, and knives, and chisels, and needles of the unfaltering, unpardoning, unconscious, irresponsible steel mechanism that has been placed in command. From this inexorable master he receives an education in one thing,—in synchronism,—in accurately adjusting material according to the speed of the machine. It is an education in punctuality,—the punctuality of the physical law which measures time itself. The wheels make just so many revolutions a minute, and he has to keep up with the wheels. If he cannot, he must step aside. He must take his stand where the wheels don't go so fast.

We are compromised to a new method for the application of human energy. It conditions the whole social life. It is a condition that we shall not change. It ought to be considered worth studying. It is to become more general, more pronounced, more fixed. It is going to make divisions between men as classes wider than they are now, and to make those on one side feel more bitterly that they are not on the other. It is a fixed condition. Take it away, and before society could be adjusted to new conditions—or rather readjusted to old conditions that some of us knew—more than half of the civilized population of earth would have perished. There would be neither food nor clothing. Take away these specialists and we should soon be without transportation, without means to gather the harvest that is but ninety days ahead. The rich would be running off from their millions. Great processions of famished humanity, with class distinctions gone, would be moving, almost without hope, to the fields of the uncut grain. Arts and sciences and schools, and learned professions would be only remembrances. In lands where population is congested, great cities would be reeking with the pestilence from the unburied. The snows of January would fall as a death-sheet over the remains of the ultra-refinement of a specialized civilization.

O, of course, it will not be. It is a reverie. It is even a dream. And still it is a dream that could not be so much as dreamed of a hundred years ago. It simply emphasizes a universal fact. But upon that fact, precisely, is builded the plea for the transformation of society. For society is practically in the hands of the owner of the machine. And the change proposed is to put the ownership of the machine in the hands of society.

Every man being a member of society will be part and equal owner of all. When he works he will work for society, and hence he will work for himself. When he is paid he will be paid by society, and hence he will be paying himself.

Whatever might be the general effects of this transfer in the ownership of the machine, there is one effect that it would not have. It would not eliminate the condition we are dwelling upon. It would not release the man from the machine. On the contrary, it would put more men at the machine. In fact, it proposes to bring about perfect equality by making synchronism a quality of the work of every man. Well, we think that, in this respect, things are bad enough as they are. Why make them worse? Where is the genius in social science who will suggest a means of remedying the misery without going in deeper? It is time for the learned economists, who have taught the rich man how to make money, to turn their attention to ameliorations in the conditions which they have contributed so much to bring about. There are many things which could be done immediately, and which would be of immediate value in relieving the strain. The rules for making money out of capital are already elaborate enough. There is opportunity for the economist who can calmly look at society from the point of view of its largest part.

W. POLAND, S.J.

In 1876, when Porfirio Diaz was actively engaged in the revolutionary movement against President Juarez, which resulted in the triumph of Diaz, an impetuous youth named Andrés Ortego, composed some ardently patriotic (or Porfiristic) verses which mentioned nobody, but spoke of the "able pilot," called by the voice of "the people" to the helm of the ship of state. Today, the licentiate Andrés Ortega is connected with the department of State. Somebody dug up his verses and scattered copies of them broadcast; his name was attached to them, but the date of their original composition was inadvertently omitted. The "able pilot" was so clearly Madero that the poet, though constrained to admit the authorship, was freed from an awkward situation by giving the age of his effusion.

CORRESPONDENCE

Strikes in Rome and Their Causes

ROME, MAY 14, 1911.

It is the month of May and strikes are in order. This week we first had a strike of all the traction employees, who rose as one man against the enforcement of a regulation of the Tramway Company to the effect that no more than two employees at a time might ride free on the trams, and these must not occupy seats required by paying passengers. The press was united against the absurd position of the strikers; hence at the strikers' public meeting the press reporters were treated contumeliously; they retired with affronted dignity, and passed unanimous resolutions to ease their feelings. The strike is now over—nobody seems to know how or why—and the press is appeased.

Then the stone-masons took their turn: the old, century old and never to be extinguished difficulty, of too much work and too little pay. This stopped work on the monument of Victor Emmanuel for a day, when the government secured non-union help and put them under military protection while at work. Some thirty or forty strikers gathered in front of the monument in protest, and were incontinently arrested in a body by the soldier-police. The monument, by the way, is nearing completion; it will be dedicated on the second of June; the Piazza Venezia in front of it is being improved with two garden plots in which sad cypress trees have been planted, to which a cynical citizen has recommended in the press that weeping willows be added to express more vividly the mourning of Italian citizens over the millions of bullion vainly buried in the structure.

While the masons' strike is still on, the seamstresses in the tailor shops have all walked out with a kindred difficulty, and now, horror of horrors, the hotel waiters have delivered a peremptory ultimatum to their employing Bonifaces that they, too, must have relief. The school children have not yet struck; but there is trouble among the schoolmistresses. It is not a far cry to New York, for they have the same grievance here as there, and are demanding equal pay with the pedagogues, and these poor males are all of a tremor lest the equalization be down and not up.

A tempest in a Municipal Council. Aldermen, one fancies, are something of a piece all the world over. Not so long ago, they worried in New York over the naming of some by-lane with an Irish name. Here, also, there is an aldermanic commission for the renaming of streets, and in the Council demand was made for a Via della Sara Nathan (God save the mark!) and the changing of the name of the Piazza San Ignazio to that of the Spanish martyr (sic), Francisco Ferrer. This looked auspicious of an anti-clerical outbreak, but in a moment all the fat was in the fire. Some one injected a resolution to name one of the new streets after the sometime Minister, Francesco Crispi; then the storm broke, and Radicals and Liberals were at it among themselves hammer and tongs. Though reminded that Crispi had raised the monument to Giordano Bruno to defy the Pope, and had changed Italy from an agricultural to an industrial nation, the Socialists would have none of him; recalling that he sent the "Thousand" to their doom in Africa, that he had made wholesale restrictions of the suffrage and had passed the enforced domicile act, they hooted, howled and hammered till the session was adjourned abruptly in dismay. On re-assembling, the resolution for Crispi was passed in spite of the Radicals.

Meantime, in the Chamber of Deputies, Murri was busy pouring forth one of his spasmodic tirades against the Vatican, the Pope, the seminaries, the religious congregations, and this time against the Catholic organizations for social betterment of the industrial classes. The Chamber listened to him, as usual, contemptuously, but with unbecoming patience, as one of the papers states it, much as one puts up with an irritating hurdy-gurdy on the street. Podrecca, the editor of l'Asino, cynically calls the attention of the authorities to the immunity of the thieves who have been robbing church tabernacles, notwithstanding the clew they have been leaving in a copy of the Asino spread upon the altar.

On the other hand, when the Mayor of Cividale, a town near Venice, was suspended for the reason that in his character of provincial councillor he declined to share in the functions of the Exposition, on the ground of the tone given to it of anti-clericalism and offence to the Holy Father, the Defence, a newspaper of Venice, comes out in the following strong fashion:

"Our fatherland is sacred to us and we are tenacious of the traditions of our country. We were not born fifty years ago, but have been Italians through all the succeeding centuries wherein Italian thought has been our own. And as Italians we do not want the alien in Italy, no matter what be the name he bears, the race to which he belongs. But the Pope is no alien. The Pope is ours, is Italian, though belonging to the world at large through his august ministry. His mission also is sacred to us, his liberty sacred, sacred the right which he has to the respect of the nation in the midst of which he has his dwelling, and which is at once our nation. We cannot for a moment dissociate our love of country from our love of the Church and of the Pope. The one is blended with the other, and in that blending we see the liberty of the Church and the greatness of Italy. This is our two-fold loyalty: we cannot now forget it in the face of a celebration which tends to glorify the captivity of the Church and the enslavement of Catholic principle."

The Holy Father has held the usual public audiences all the week, and on Thursday gave Holy Communion to some sixty of the faithful at his private Mass. The Association of St. Cecilia, founded by Pius IX in 1870, of which Father Angelo De Santi, S.J., is at present president, started in January of this year a school of higher studies in music. This has been a serious undertaking, and has enlisted, as it needed, the best musical talent in Rome to form a staff. It presents three courses, a one year course of Gregorian music, a three year course in harmony, counterpoint and fugue, and a four year course in organ music. The daily classes have been conducted with enthusiasm since the opening in January; they are held in the College of S. Maria Immacolata and in the Seminario Romano. The enrollment of students for this year numbers twenty-eight, of whom twenty-three are priests, three seminarians and two are laymen; one of the latter hails from the United States, Mr. Philip Barrows-Whitehead.

As for the Exposition, the grounds are still commonly empty, except when some function brings the military and the officials. On Thursday, the new bridge across the Tiber connecting the two parts of the Exposition, the Valle Julia section in the Villa Borghesi and the section over the Tiber in the Piazza d'Armi, was opened. It is a handsome structure in white stone and concrete, arching the river in a single span of one hundred metres. It was begun in October, 1909, and completed last week. It cost some $250,000.

On Saturday, the Grand Duke Boris and his Duchess Maria Paulovna arrived with the compliments of the Czar. There was the usual military and social reception, but it created little interest except in strictly official circles, as the ordinary Roman citizen has grown tired of solitary royal visitors, when the essential for success is a multitude, which never comes.

The Minister of Grace and Justice has been appealed to in the Chamber of Deputies to correct the form of criminal procedure which allows the theatrical and undignified scenes daily enacted at Viterbo. Some of the members are worked up over the fact that American papers are exploiting the extraordinary features of the trial to the disgrace of Italy. Remembering the exploitation of the disgusting first Thaw trial in New York, Italy need scarcely fear the criticism of the American metropolis.

C. M.

Spanish Parliament Hears Associations Law

MADRID, MAY 12, 1911.

On May 8, the Spanish Cortes met in answer to the summons of the President of the Council of Ministers. The afternoon of the first day of the new session was signalized by the reading of the proposed measure on Religious Associations, a measure which Canalejas has concocted for the sake of satisfying the Republicans and currying favor with the anti-clericals. The measure seems to have been suggested by that of Waldeck-Rousseau, in France, which inaugurated an era of persecution of the religious Orders; for the points of resemblance between the two are many and marked.

Even though this creation of Canalejas were less openly sectarian than it is, the fact that it was brought before the Cortes without notice to the Holy See, thus violating solemn international compacts and giving a rude blow to the friendly relations existing between Spain and the Vatican, would be enough in itself to make the Catholic opinion of our country view it with disfavor and lively repugnance.

The injury done by Canalejas to the Catholic conscience is seen to be more grievous when one reflects that the right of association for any proper and moral end is a natural right, and that this natural right is limited by the proposed measure precisely in those respects in which it rises above mere natural reason, namely, by fixing arbitrarily the number, the age, the nationality, the vocation, and even the means of subsistence of the members or associates.

The pretext by which the ministry affects to have been moved in proposing this measure is precisely that which Spanish Republicans urge in their campaigns against the Orders, that is, the excessive number of Religious, both male and female; but this pretext is absolutely without foundation. There are now in Spain, according to official statistics, fifty thousand Religious, of whom ten thousand are men and the rest are women. In proportion to their population, both Belgium and Germany, not to mention other countries, have more Religious than Spain, yet they flourish and thrive as few other countries flourish and thrive. But, even if we close our eyes for the moment to this specious pretext, which in itself merely shows the animus of the authors of the proposed law, we can point out in the measure itself several principles which are highly censurable and simply inadmissible. In the first place, the civil authorities enter the domain of conscience and pretend to arrogate to themselves the right to fix conditions for the time when monastic obligations shall have civil effects, and what those civil effects shall be. Again, articles 5 and 8 are so worded as to prevent the existence in one and the same province of two houses of the same Order. Further, by making twelve the smallest number of Religious who may legally form an "association," the bill threatens the existence of many small convents, hospitals, and asylums in towns where larger institutions could not be supported, because not needed. Furthermore, in addition to the imposition of excessive succession and inheritance taxes, the Orders are obliged to sell within six months after entering into possession any real estate that may be freely donated to them. Finally, the bill claims for the civil authorities the power to dissolve by judicial proceedings without any recourse to the Church authorities a religious Order, which exists in virtue of the action of the Church authorities. Now, all this takes on the color of a very high-handed proceeding in a country presumably Catholic, and bound by solemn agreement to the observance of certain rules, laws, and customs of the Catholic Church. The proposed law excepts from its provisions four Orders of men and two Orders of women, as has been noted in AMERICA.

We have already expressed our opinion about the probable fate of the measure, and; instead of having any reason to change it, we are more firmly persuaded that it was correct. All the probabilities are against its adoption. At the present writing, the Spanish Cortes is showing a condition of affairs new and hitherto unknown in the history of Spain. The deputies (members of the lower House or Congress) do not attend the meetings, and all that Canalejas can do by letters and urgent representations to his friends and followers does not bring them. The assembly hall is almost deserted. The ministerialists prefer to saunter about or to spend their time at social gatherings or in restaurants or public resorts; the Conservatives do the same; and even the Republicans remain away from the legislative halls. This tends to make the position of the Premier awkward and ridiculous; for his only surroundings are vacancy and solitude. Nobody seems to attach any importance to his plans and projects; he seems to be looked upon as politically dead.

The words "ministerial crisis" are on everybody's lips; our first care in the morning is to look at the paper to see whether the cabinet has resigned. The fact is that Canalejas remains in office because at the present moment there is nobody to take his place; for the Liberal party is a conglomeration of petty factions, with no cohesive force and common moral bond.

If to this be added that the nation is bowed down under excessive taxes, and is on the point of raising an outcry against mismanagement in the treasury, for between January 1 and May 11, 1911, the cabinet has spent thirteen million pesetas in excess of the estimates, enough has been said to discredit Canalejas; for the country is speeding towards certain bankruptcy.

It is unquestionably true that Canalejas himself is weary of office and dissatisfied with the conduct of his followers. He is simply looking for an excuse to resign and go home. A couple of days ago, he publicly expressed his regret for having convoked the Cortes, instead of governing the country without the advice and approbation of the legislators. We are of the opinion that the distance from this open confession of fault and failure to his permanent retirement from the cabinet is very short. He might have accomplished a great work, a work of pacification and patriotism, but his eagerness to win the applause of the radical elements of the Left has been his undoing. He rose to power with the good will and the support of all parties. When he comes to fall, and fall he must very shortly, he will leave the national finances demoralized, and the public conscience more than ever unsettled and unstrung.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; SECRETARY, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

NOTICE

The editorial rooms and the publication office of AMERICA have been removed from 32 Washington Square West, to Nos. 59 and 61 East Eighty-third Street, to which address all communications must hereafter be sent.

Catholic Spain

The Spanish Catholics mean to leave nothing undone to make the coming Eucharistic Congress in their capital city, June 25-29, a brilliant one. They appear to have set their hearts on outstripping the stately pomp and splendid ceremonial of the public procession of the Blessed Sacrament which made Montreal's Congress so notable. The official program of this chief event in the coming gathering to honor the Eucharistic King has just been published. The procession will form in the Retiro, Madrid's most beautiful park, and in the immediate vicinity of the Church of San Geronimo, in which, it will be remembered, the nuptials of King Alfonso and Queen Victoria Eugenie were solemnized. Moving out of the park, it will pass the National Gallery (Museo del Prado) and wend its way through the Prado promenade, until it enters the Alcada, Madrid's handsomest street. Along this showy avenue it continues its way to the famous Puerta del Sol, then into and through the Calle Mayor, the scene of the cowardly attempt upon the life of the King on the occasion of his marriage, until turning to the right the marching multitude will form for the concluding ceremonies in the Plaza de las Armas, before the royal palace. Although present indications point to an army of 50,000 marching in the public procession, the Plaza will not be crowded; 60,000, it is said, can assemble comfortably in its great open space.

At this point the benediction will be given by the Papal delegate, and the parade will be dismissed. Following the benediction the Sacred Host will be borne up to the great staircase leading to the King's palace, where the entire royal household will be gathered awaiting the Eucharistic King's coming and blessing. Immediately thereafter, surrounded by a guard of honor chosen from the grandes and aristocrats of all Spain, the Blessed Sacrament will be carried to the tabernacle. The entire line of march will be lined by picked troops in gala uniform.

No people in the world are more at home in the art of festive decoration of their cities and homes on occasions such as this than are the Spaniards, and the plans already announced promise magnificent results for the coming festivities. A feature, possible only in Spain, will be the appearance of the heraldic banners and pennants of the united noble families of the country in the public procession. The Blessed Sacrament will be carried in the world-famous Gothic ostensorium, the chef d'œuvre of Enrique de Arse, one of the most precious treasures of the Cathedral of Toledo, whence it will be loaned for that purpose. The ostensorium dates from 1524, in which year de Arse completed its fashioning. It weighs 10,900 ounces, and with the exception of the cross surmounting the whole artistic creation, was formed from the first gold brought over to Spain from America by Columbus.

The Chamber of Deputies has already voted a sum of 100,000 pesetas (about $20,000) for the decorations along the line of march; to this sum the King and Queen have added 5,000 pesetas, the Queen-Mother Christina 2,000 pesetas, and each of the Infantes and Infantas 1,000 pesetas. Corporations and Clubs of the capital city have contributed generously to the same end.

The principal public sessions of the Congress are to be held in the beautiful National Pantheon, the stately Church of St. Francis, which is on the same street as the royal palace, the Calle Faillen. The program already announced contains a list of papers to be read and addresses to be delivered by the most distinguished scholars and orators of Spain.

The Last Look

The island of Ulua was an evil place. So the Spaniards thought, and rightly, when on that June morning, away back in 1518, they explored it under the leadership of Juan de Grijalva, and saw on all sides unmistakable signs of recent human sacrifices. It was a place accursed. Their leader's name was John, and the feast of St. John was near. Therefore, they introduced a religious element into the name of the island. It should be thenceforth San Juan de Ulua, or St. John of Ulloa, as it is called in English.

Lying close to "heroic Veracruz," the Spaniards so fortified it that it became their strongest fortress in all America. But the evil name remained. Great cisterns had been constructed within the fort for the storage of rain water, there being no other supply, and close to these there were dungeons, dark and damp and reeking with miasmatic exhalations. The worst criminals were confined in them, but not for long. Death was always making his rounds. The gloomy fortress was Spain's last stand in New Spain, for it was not until 1825, four years after the formal acknowledgment of Mexican independence, that disease and famine caused Spain to lower her flag on San Juan de Ulua. But change of flag brought no change in reputation. Less formidable as a fortress, perhaps, the island was not a whit less formidable as a Federal prison-house. Sweltering in the blinding glare of the tropical sun, looking down upon waters which are the chosen haunt of the man-eating hammerhead, the fortress has seen armies of prisoners enter its forbidding precincts, but it has seen few go forth to life and freedom.

Five years ago there took place a petty uprising against President Diaz. The result was that some two hundred revolutionists were sentenced to San Juan de Ulua. On May 30, 1910, one of the forty who still survived the horrors of the place, smuggled out a letter, in which he told of what the prisoners were forced to undergo. What were the thoughts of Porfirio Diaz, for thirty years master of Mexico, as he paced the steamer deck, an exile, and gazed upon the island of human sacrifices, Ulua?

Criminal Statistics and Irreligious Schooling

A French student of educational methods has compiled from official statistics a table showing the status of criminality in France and its rapid growth during those decades of the last century in which religious instruction was by law forbidden in the public schools of that country. A study of the table will be profitable in other countries. From 1831-1856, he tells us, the public schools were entrusted to lay teachers, their supervision having been by legislation taken from the Church authorities. In that period the average number of crimes and misdemeanors, as reported from official sources, was:

1831-1835.....	113,000
1836-1840.....	144,000
1841-1845.....	169,000
1846-1850.....	226,000
1851-1856.....	280,000

In 1856 the Falloux Law permitted the imparting of religious instruction in public schools under the direction of the ecclesiastical authorities, and at once there was a notable decrease in the statistics of criminality. From 1856-1860 the record gives 266,000 as the average. In 1861 the liberalizing trend of the imperial officials again restricted the rights of the Church in the matter of religious training in schools, and for some years an increase is noted in the story of the crimes and misdemeanors reported.

1861-1865.....	272,000
1866-1870.....	283,000

Following the Franco-Prussian disaster the Falloux Law once more came into vogue, and the Church in France was allowed to discharge its duty in the imparting of religious instruction in State schools; from 1871-1875 a decrease in crime is noted and the average drops to 250,000.

With the year 1876 began the cruel war ever since waged in the unfortunate land to crush out every religious influence in the education of the children of France. Since 1876 the average reported has been:

1876-1880.....	372,000
1881-1885.....	422,000
1886-1890.....	461,000
1891-1895.....	521,000
1896-1900.....	514,000
1901-1905.....	556,000

This table speaks for itself.

Socialistic Freedom

A curious instance lately chronicled in the story of the happenings in Italy's parliament offers an illustration of the tactics of Socialism deserving of notice. It appears that there exists a Council of Labor, Consiglio Superiore di Lavoro, organized under the supervision of Italy's Minister of Agriculture and made up of Senators, Deputies and Delegates of the Labor Unions of that country. This body is supposed to exert a protecting influence wherever the interests of workingmen are concerned. Heretofore the delegates selected to sit in the Council have been, without exception, representatives of socialistic organizations, and when an effort was made quite recently to secure a place for certain members of Catholic organizations bitter protest was entered by the Socialists. Their reason forsooth was the sectarian character of the Catholic bodies.

Shortly after the reopening of the parliamentary sessions a Catholic deputy, Longinotti, brought the unfairness of the Socialists to the attention of the Chamber, and asked that the numerous organizations of his fellow-religionists be permitted representation in the Consiglio. As is known, the social movement lately inaugurated by the Catholics of Italy has resulted in the formation of many strong bodies among workingmen and women of all classes. Longinotti argued that the very purpose of the existence of the Consiglio Superiore di Lavoro demanded that all labor organizations in Italy be recognized and that their interests be furthered without prejudice. The folly of denying Catholics such recognition because of the sectarian character of their societies is apparent to everyone. The socialistic plea, he insisted, is but a cloak to hide the purpose of those who urge it to retain the care-free and comfortable monopoly of State protection which their unions have heretofore enjoyed.

It is an old fallacy, continued Longinotti, this imputation of liberty restrictions simply because a body happens to be Catholic, and its activities happen to be ruled by Catholic principles. Are there no rules and regulations governing socialistic organizations? Are there no restrictions put upon their members to mark the limitations of their individual action? Are Catholics, simply because they are Catholics, to be excluded from their rights as citizens and to be denied representation in a State Commission organized to safeguard interests which touch them as closely as they do the Socialists now enjoying a monopoly of that representation? Must Catholics submit to the suspicion that their workmen's unions, over and above the industrial aims they claim to subserve, covertly plan and plot political action possibly dangerous to the State, whilst Socialism, though its known purpose is to overturn existing government everywhere, is welcomed to every blessed help the State has at its disposal?

Longinotti concluded a speech which has been enthusiastically praised by his Catholic fellow-countrymen with this appeal for fair play: "Let us have equal justice. Let the Government do one of two things: either reject alike all industrial and labor organizations that, over and above their character as workmen's unions, pursue political or religious aims; or let it aid and assist alike all industrial and labor bodies that, no matter what other objects they have in view, efficaciously work for the material and social interests of their members."

The French Academy and Its Critics

The most distinguished body in France has of late been made the target of much criticism, as venomous as it is petty. As is well known the Academy is wont every year to distribute considerable money in prizes to men and women of French extraction who have done excellent work in the field of science and literature. For many years the number of these prizes granted to priests and religious has been remarked, yet it has never entered into the minds of men of letters in France to question the perfect fairness and impartiality shown by the committees appointed by the Academy to investigate the merits of competitors in the various prize contests and to determine the winners of the distinctions to be awarded.

This year the published list of successful competitors contains an extraordinary number of names of religious, men and women. Among those who received the largest money prizes are: The Sister Superior of the Convent of St. Joseph in St. Dié; the Superior of the Lazarist Fathers in Akbi (Asia Minor); the Superior of the Trappist Fathers in Chekdokhele (Asia Minor);

the Sister Superior of the Sisters of St. Joseph in Adana, and a Marist priest and a Jesuit Missionary in Adana. The considerable sum of 5,000 francs, one of the capital prizes awarded by the Academy, was won by the Superior of the Sisters of Providence in Ambatolampy in Madagascar.

To be sure all this is bitter medicine for the priest-hunters and the persecutors of religious women in poor France. One is not surprised, then, to learn that the Liberal and Masonic press is raising the cry of "clericalism" and charging the honorable members of the Academy with unpatriotic favoritism in their award of these honors. Happily, the Academy of France needs no defenders; their ancient repute for scholarship and integrity is sufficient answer to the foolish whimpering of their detractors.

Decent Propriety

"Twenty-five hundred motorcycle race fans saw one man dashed to death, one probably fatally injured, and another seriously hurt on 'Death Curve,' at Hawthorne race track, yesterday afternoon. Sitting idly while surgeons and track attendants bore off the maimed and dying victims, they waited patiently for the débris to be cleared off the track. Then, when all had been made shipshape once more, they cheered five other races, one of which was almost won by the man responsible for the death of his former opponent."

The record of a day's sport in Chicago, of which the above is an interesting paragraph, is duly chronicled in the Tribune of that city. One can fancy the pharisaical horror a similar description of the incidents of a bull fight culled from some Spanish journal would arouse in the minds of some among us. Probably it is not within reason to expect much tenderness and sympathy of people who rush to trials of speed, where the performers recklessly hazard their lives. Nevertheless, a decent regard for the proprieties would have suggested a suspension of the dangerous races for a day. It would have proved that those present have not altogether forgotten elementary lessons in regard to human life, but that sudden death and suffering still appealed to them a little.

Our readers know how cruelly the Pope has been bullied for his firmness towards Modernism. When the unhappy Tyrrell drew on himself by his obstinacy the papal condemnation, the English press was vociferous, and the Anglican journals were not the least noisy. The outcry was founded, as usual, on ignorance—whether invincible, or crass, or affected, we do not try to determine—of the nature of Modernism and of the Pope's obligations regarding it. As to the former, serious Anglicans seem to have learned something. The Dean of Divinity at Magdalen College, Oxford, J. S. Thompson, has published a scandalous book on Miracles in the New Testament, and the Guardian finds it "gravely disconcerting" that such a work should come from one in such an official position. It attempts to minimize the scandal by taking the paternal attitude towards Mr. Thompson, as an "earnest young man," whose "judgment is not as good as his industry." But it finds the root of his blasphemies in Modernism, of which he is an adept. And thus, as the wise Clown says, "the whirligig of time brings in its revenges."

THE LAST PRIZE OF THE BUCCANEERS.

Once there was a wicked man who went about asking people, "Where is the Spanish Main?" Of those he asked some were prudent, and these quickly parried the fell question, or fled. Some thought it was that part of the Pacific near Lower California. One man was of opinion that it was the locale of "Treasure Island," and some more of Stevenson's stories, but would venture no farther in his placing of it. And one said, "Spanish Main? Why, certainly! The Spanish Main is a bit of the Atlantic off the coast of Spain, near the Dry Tortugas," and smiled in a superior way. Everybody had heard about it. Many had fine, wholesome, boyhood memories of tales of derring-do that clothed those mysterious waters in enduring splendors. But, pushed for an answer, they really couldn't say.

And so the wicked man departed, chuckling, and his victims hastened to a library and thumbed indices under the letter S. But there came another man who, when he was asked the question, looked afar off over the head of the wicked man, and said, with proper solemnity, "The Spanish Main lies off the seaports of Bohemia, and is bounded by Galleons, Buccaneers, and Pieces of Eight." And so it does; and so it is. Its waters wash the coasts of ancient Fancy, and upon them shine

"The light that never was on land or sea,
The consummation and the Pirate's dream."

Any man who would lay a rude, historical hand—speaking very figuratively, of course—upon the Spanish Main, and drag it forth into the common light of day, or put it into a map, or tell veracious and unvarnished tales about it, should at least have the grace to apologize. It is with reluctance and genuine regret, and not without urgent memory of the wicked man aforementioned, that there is hazarded here this bit of description, found in a book:

"The Spanish Main—that portion of the Caribbean Sea adjacent to the northeast coast of South America, inclusive of the route traversed by Spanish merchant ships in traveling between the eastern and western hemispheres."

Yet even about this there is a saving touch of vagueness; as though, when the writer of it had, with disgusting accuracy, just put his finger on the map, his heart misgave him, his better nature asserted itself, and he ended with a fine, sweeping gesture that took in all the broad seas "between the eastern and western hemispheres," and with the gesture sent the Spanish Main back to where it belongs.

One likes to think that even in the days when the fame of the Spanish Main was being builded there was something of this same pleasant uncertainty about its location. One can fancy Sir Henry Morgan telling a loyal friend, "You set sail from Kingston harbor with a good crew of rakehells, and you go to the north, or the south, or the west, or the east, as the wind may blow, and when you sight a Spanish galleon you are on the Spanish Main."

And the story of the deeds done on it is best told without dates. How can one figure a Buccaneer or a Marooner going about with a calendar? He timed himself, beyond doubt, by the amount of water in his casks, and of booty in his hold; or, if on land, by the immediate condition of his purse. He set forth in the year, and on the day, when his funds had given out; and he came back—if he came back at all—when his ship was loaded, by the grace of God, and his own endeavors, with Spanish plunder.

How the history of the Spanish Main began is a question that lands one in a very fog of legend, a fog made doubly obscure by the ghostly crowd of wandering conjectures that haunt it. When it began is equally uncertain. One may not unreasonably suspect that it began as soon as there were enough English and Spaniards in the neighborhood to put up a good fight. At any rate, after the first quarter of the seventeenth century the merry game was in full swing—of robbing poor natives, and then being robbed in turn on your way home with the goods; and a Spaniard going out to His Catholic Majesty's colonies in the New World could usually get enough excitement in one voyage to last a healthy man for a lifetime. The earlier Englishmen who engaged in this pastime were known as Boucaniers because, we are told, they first entered into the business by way of killing cattle in San Domingo, and drying the meat, which was then called "boucan." Of course, such pleasant occupation as plundering rich Spanish ships was not limited to Englishmen only; men of all nationalities took a hand in it. But for the most part the adventurers set forth in English bottoms and under English leaders. Hawkins, Drake, Morgan, Wallace, Parks, and the redoubtable Admiral Benbow, all Englishmen good and true, are at the head of the names that make a glamor upon these seas for our modern eyes.

It is not easy to hold a brief for either side in this matter. The men who made history on the Spanish Main were chiefly rascals, whose single service to mankind is the furnishing forth of much fine reading matter. Only, of the two sets of cutthroats, English and Spanish, the English seem to have been by far the cleverer and more daring, and, therefore, naturally win our interest the more. The Spanish Main lacked ethics as much as it did accurate chronology and precise geographical location. It was a place of action, wherein the actors were so fully occupied, chasing and being chased, that there was little chance left for nice considerations of meum and tuum. It was outside the pale, not merely of trifling laws, but of the Ten Commandments. And for all that we of to-day rightfully delight in the memory of it; it was hardly a place where any modern but a wildcat promoter could be expected to feel at ease.

Spain had taken the lead in American colonization, and in all the excellence of Spanish exploitation undoubtedly there was not wanting extortion and brutality. One can readily learn what must have been the generous feeling of horror in English bosoms at the time over Spanish conduct in America by simply reading the sentiments of unselfish and righteous indignation they feel in our day—over, say, Austria's land-grabbing in the hither East—as expressed, say, in the Spectator, that last home of British respectability. It was positively a pious project in the early seventeenth century to fit out ships to chastise the haughty Don and relieve him of the burden of his ill-gotten wealth, and it was a project most successfully and persistently carried out. To be sure, the English Government could not and would not countenance such high-handed chastisement, even of Spaniards, and no doubt made a pretense of sighing regretfully when some tall English vessel sailed into her English harbor with her decks almost awash, so deeply did she ride under her load of wicked Spanish plate and bullion. Yet, what would you? Was a God-fearing Government to stifle the holy wrath of its people against the Proud Oppressor? So the Government contented itself with sad shakings of the head in public; and, meanwhile, kept a vigilant eye on what might happen along the coasts of the Caribbean.

Finally, however, as the Buccaneers widened the reach and extended the scale of their operations, and repeatedly injured the feelings of Spanish Governors in America—and as there was little left, anyway, in Spanish America except the soil—England decided that the zeal of her children against the Unrighteous must be curbed; her representative, Earl Sandwich, in arranging the terms of the treaty of Madrid, in 1667, agreed that Buccaneershould be discouraged on the Spanish Main.

But indeed it had fallen off even before that time, and for very natural causes. The Spaniards were learning the futility of laboriously extracting hoarded wealth from natives when their own possession of it ceased a few hundred leagues from its port of departure. During this time of slack trade the hardy Buccaneers showed their good business sense by making provision against the day when their occupation should be wholly gone. They had learned much of the topography of the coast in the years through which they had harried the Main. They had particularly discovered the value, as a refuge, of the continuous chain of coral reefs and little islands which run parallel to a great part of the Central American coast, at distances varying from ten to thirty miles to eastward. Behind this natural sea-wall there were shoals which they alone had charted, and snug bights where one might lie at anchor whilst a pursuer hurried unsuspecting by. Navigable rivers ran down to the sea behind the reefs; rivers, the banks of which were covered with logwood and mahogany and rosewood and sapodilla. And the most sheltered coast and the richest streams were the coast and the streams below the peninsula of Yucatan.

Here, then, from 1632 on, band after band of Buccaneers quietly settled, turning their cutlasses into machetes and smiting rich woods in place of rich Spaniards. There is a Pathan saying: "First comes one Englishman, as a traveler or for shikar; then come two and make a map; then comes an army and takes the country. It is better, therefore, to kill the first Englishman." But there was nobody to kill these first Englishmen; nobody there but timid Indians; and these Englishmen were particularly hard to kill. They stayed; and more came to take their places when they died or went back to England to live on their easily achieved wealth. Benbow himself did not disdain to hack a competency out of the tropical forests, and left his name to one of their streams.

Various reverses came upon the settlement. At one time it was practically depopulated, and the settlers taken as prisoners to Havana. But it persisted in spite of all, as only an English colony can persist. It grew in numbers; it became in time conscious of its politic life, and devised a simple and efficient form of government. Great companies were formed to exploit the country; one of them to this day owns fully a third of the soil of the colony. Large fortunes were made in the land and promptly transferred to England. In 1720 negro slaves were introduced from Jamaica. They found their English owners, as elsewhere, no harsh masters. In a few years there were more mulattoes than negroes. Slavery was abolished in 1834.

Internal dissensions in the government of the colony not infrequently arose, some of them being carefully fostered by the mother country, which watched with jealous eye the growth and development of the handful of uncertain Buccaneers into a thriving settlement where huge sums of money might be made in a few years. England was zealous for the "rights" of the colony in respect of other nations, and in diplomacy cleverly outfought the Spanish Crown's attempts to reassert its claims. The country, unsurveyed, and with no definite boundaries, had quietly come to be known as "British Honduras," and British it was to remain. England was not so particularly mindful, however, of the "rights" of the colonists in respect to herself. Gradually the mahogany and logwood cutters were disfranchised and the government of the territory withdrawn to England. Finally, in 1869, British Honduras became "by petition" a Crown Colony, with officials appointed from England, and with all its affairs in the hands of the Crown Agents in London. It was a slow process, but eventually the last prize of the Buccaneers went the way of so many other of their prizes—to the Crown.

From that year the Colony has steadily languished. The woods along the rivers were nearly exhausted; the government did practically nothing to open up the hinterland; the trade in mahogany and logwood fell off; there was not, never had been, much agriculture, and the resources of the Colony lay dead. Bill Nye, in his "History of the U. S.," has a passage that nicely parallels a description of the condition of British Honduras.

"From this time [about 1691]," he says, "on to the Revolution, Mass., Maine, and Nova Scotia became a royal province. Nova Scotia is that way yet, and has to go to Boston for her groceries." British Honduras goes to New Orleans and to Liverpool.

There is a strongly founded rumor that in the early '70s the Colony was offered to the United States in settlement of the Alabama claims. That seems to have been the last real official notice taken of it. There are 7,652 square miles of superb country, of giant forests, of open pasture lands, of fertile valleys, of picturesque mountains; a land of remarkable beauty, of excellent climate, capable of growing any and all tropical plants; abounding in game, full of resources, full as a sunken treasure-ship; but it is a sunken treasure-ship, barnacled, festooned with weed, the playground of sharks; it has not yet been raised.

W. A. M.

LITERATURE

Father Damien. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. Hyde, of Honolulu, from ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON (With a Statement by Mrs. STEVENSON). Notre Dame, Indiana: The Ave Maria Press. Price, 30 cents.

Writing lately on a new volume of Stevenson, a reviewer in the London Academy says that it contains, besides other papers, "the famous open letter to the Reverend Dr. Hyde on Father Damien—a letter which we seem to remember Stevenson afterwards regretted having written." No doubt, the reviewer did hear something of the kind, and is accurate enough when he declares that he seems to remember it. But in a matter which seriously concerns the character and reputation of a saintly man and one of the world's great heroes, one would expect a conscientious writer to refrain from circulating vague and venomous on dits which he seems to remember. This is the way legends grow.

The Ave Maria Press did a real service to history and to humanity when it obtained a vehement expression of denial concerning the rumor, which the reviewer seems to remember, from such an authoritative source as Mrs. Stevenson. The statement is reproduced in its new edition of the letter, and deserves the widest publicity. "As to the 'Open Letter to Dr. Hyde,'" writes Mrs. Stevenson, "nothing can make me believe that Louis ever regretted the subject-matter of that piece of writing. To me, up to his last hours, he spoke always in the same strain. His admiration for the work and character of 'that saint, that martyr,' as he invariably called Father Damien, remained unchanged; and any mention of the cowardly attack on the dead man's memory brought a flush of anger into his face and a fire to his eye that were unmistakable."

Besides Dr. Rawnsley's fine sonnet on Father Damien and the beautiful prologue of Charles Warren Stoddard's, "The Lepers of Molokai," this edition of the "Open Letter" also contains a publisher's preface, in which we are told that Stevenson would never accept literary payment from any source for his defense of the modern Apostle of the Lepers.

J. J. D.

The Second Spring. A Sermon by John Henry Newman, D.D. Edited, with Introduction, Notes and Exercises, by FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J., New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

This is, perhaps, Cardinal Newman's greatest sermon. It was preached before a Synod of priests and bishops, most of whom, we learn from some of those who were present, were weeping before it was ended. It was not a very wonderful phenomenon. It is almost impossible for any Catholic to pick up the sermon to-day and to follow its progress in cold type without being affected to tears. The poignant sincerity of the speaker, the tumult of feeling in his heart, laid open, quivering and palpitating to the eye, by the almost miraculous agency of perfect and adequate words, flick the heart with the sharp ache of sorrow unspeakable. We dare say the famous passage towards the close of the sermon, when the speaker suddenly turns from his "Fathers and brothers" in a piercing cry to God, has seldom been read except through a blur of tears.

A lover of literature will not take much satisfaction in the thought of this delicate masterpiece being subjected to the clumsy clinic of the class in English. But, since such things must be, one has to suppose that the best subjects will promote the best interests of literature, and that heartless analysis is one way of passing on the torch to rising generations.

Father Donnelly has made his analysis as heartless as the most exigent science could wish; but in doing so he only yielded to the demands of the classroom. Once this task is done, he yields to the charm of his subject and favors the student with warm, but judicious, appreciations that ought to enkindle him with their ardor. The introductory essay contains some new and interesting criticism of Cardinal Newman's style. The citations from famous critics who have written about the Cardinal are numerous and illuminating; they are scattered through the editor's notes and suggestions, and are designed to stimulate the student by offering him general literary observations to be applied to some concrete instance under his eyes. The primary purpose of the editor is to make the sermon useful as a subject for class exercises in imitation of it. In this he succeeds with praiseworthy ingenuity. Besides the numerous hints as to how this imitation may be carried on, which he gives on almost every page of his notes, he adds a copious appendix of actual classroom exercises, all done according to the methods described by him.

J. J. D.

The Heart of the Gospel; Traits of the Sacred Heart. By Rev. FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J. New York: Apostleship of Prayer.

This little book of 167 pages deserves, or, rather, demands, more than a passing notice, for it is a distinct contribution to devotional literature. It is full of thought, and its reflections are presented in such a bright and attractive way that it is not necessary to keep prodding one's piety to finish it. It is interesting as well as instructive from beginning to end. Apart from its apt and pleasant philosophy, and its solid spirituality, there is a happy knack of illustration taken from the world around that keeps brightening the doctrine inculcated. The definitions strike us as peculiarly happy. They are framed in such a way that they remain in the mind and furnish excellent material for meditation. Possibly the little volume may solve a difficulty that often confronts Directors of the League of the Sacred Heart, in finding topics of instruction for the Promoters' meetings. One of the short chapters of "The Heart of the Gospel"—and they are all short—will afford excellent subject matter, which cannot fail to satisfy both the speaker and the audience. We heartily commend the book. * * *

Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones Ordinarias Variis in Linguis. Editio Tertia. Auctore J. C. VAN DER LOOR, Buscoduci ('s-Hertogenbosch) in Nederlandis: C. N. Teulings.

This little book ought to be welcome to priests in America, where the tribes of the earth meet. It contains those prayers and judicial questions which are apt to be most used in confession. On one page the Latin version is given, and on the opposite page the translation in one of the principal modern languages. Ten vernaculars are represented, viz.: English, French, German, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, Danish, Polish, Bohemian, Slavonian; to which is added one in Esperanto. We have enumerated the translations in the order in which they follow one another in the book; as a study of the author's point of view in determining the relative importance of the more prevalent modern languages, it is not without interest.

We cannot resist the charm of a little paragraph in the introduction "Benevolo, lector, accipe animo. Quidquid hoc in opusculo corrigendum esse putes, mihi assigna: quidquid laudandum, adjudicetur amicis, qui hoc in libello componendo perfraterne mihi opitulati sint." The age of chivalry is not dead.

We are sure many priests will want this book; and we are quite as sure that the cryptic directions for obtaining it, which we have reproduced from its title-page, will tantalize them. Perhaps the easiest way to get the book would be to write to Rev. Henry Wolters, S.J., St. Ignatius College, Chicago, who helped the author to prepare the versions in Bohemian and Slavonian.

J. J. D.

Club Notes. Monthly publication by St. Aloysius Club, New York.

If any one wants to know what the average Italian-American boy can do, and how much hope for the future can be built on him when he is well managed, he has only to turn to any of the monthly issues of Club Notes, which Father Walsh's boys of Elizabeth street never fail to give to their friends and patrons. They are not only written but printed by the young editors. When the eye rests on the names of contributors such as Tuzzeo, Ciriligiano, Gangichiodo, Peloso, Locascio, and other similar patronymics, we are not prone to expect anything but a very imperfect handling of the English language, especially as these lads never hear a word except Italian in the crowded tenements in which they live. But one is really surprised, not only at the correctness but the elegance of the phrases, and the perfection of structure which characterizes the sentences of these compositions. Of course there is color and brightness in abundance on every page and in every line, for the sun of Italy is still warming the blood of these young writers, though few if any have ever gone beyond the confines of New York streets except to visit Monroe in the summer, where their devoted shepherd gathers them in flocks for an outing. Many a collegian would envy these rising authors their facility and felicity of composition. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages. By Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Authorized English Translation Edited by Luigi Cappadelta. Volume I. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $4.50.

The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church. By the Rev. Edward Jones. Introduction by the Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.25.

A Chinese Appeal to Christendom. Concerning Christian Missions. By Lin Shao-Yang. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Net $1.50.

The Heart of the Gospel. Traits of the Sacred Heart. By the Rev. Francis P. Donnelly, S.J. New York: The Apostleship of Prayer.

The Social Value of the Gospel. By Leon Garriquet. Edited by Mgr. Henry Parkinson, D.D., Ph.D. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.00.

Heroes of Chivalry and Their Deeds. By Frances Nimmo Greene and Dolly Williams Kirk. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Net 60 cents.

Dr. Dumont. By Florence Gilmore. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 50 cents.

Latin Publication:

Graduale Sacrosanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ de Tempore et de Sanctis, SS. D.N. PII X. Pontificis Maximi Jussu Restitutum et Editum, Cui Addita Sunt Festa Novissima. Editio Altera Ratisbonensis juxta Vaticanam. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net $2.25.

EDUCATION

It used to be that the Public School system was looked upon as an "institution" here in the United States, one as assured of its position and as sacredly secure from criticism as the Supreme Court or any similar substantial element in our body politic. Catholics alone questioned its claims, but their contentions were swept aside contemptuously as the dissatisfied outpourings of priest-ridden men and women who were not keen enough to grasp the full broad significance of liberty. Times seem to be changing, and even the cherished public school is coming to know criticism and suggestions of radical change in its methods. Catholics are no longer alone in their protest that religion should not be eliminated from its program of studies; the Sage Foundation investigators attack it fundamentally and from its own statistics show it to be not "free" and not an institution of "general" utility and benefit; schoolmen who look for more than superficial merit and excellency arraign its teaching, pointing out that the tendency it shows to smooth from the path of children every semblance of difficulty and obstacle is a deplorable departure from the a b c of character formation and training; and, unkindest of all, ethical teachers of certain views do not hesitate to proclaim the undemocracy of the present public school system. "We have spent," said a speaker on the child immigrant, before the Child Welfare exhibit recently held in Chicago, "millions of dollars on a school system which is undemocratic and a failure; a system which fits children for a social position which 90 per cent. of them will never fill."

* * *

Probably the most serious complaint now coming to the fore is that which regards its efficiency in another direction. We have undoubtedly multiplied schools so as to put the acquisition of an elementary education within the reach of practically every child in the land, and to make the attainment of secondary, and even higher education, a matter of comparatively little difficulty. And doing this, be it understood, the purpose of the school system established in every part of the land is not simply to fit the young to be expert agents in the promotion of prosperity. The loyalty and resources of the people are put into requisition for the establishment and support of the public schools, the people's interest and patriotism are enlisted in the preservation and defence of the public schools on the distinct ground that these are to be seminaries of citizenship; that their foremost purpose is the formation of the youth of this nation to a manhood that will safeguard, elevate and enlarge American civilization. AMERICA has had occasion already to refer to the utterances of men whose position and experience are confirmatory evidence of the truth of their claim that by far the highest percentage of the crime perpetrated in this country is the work of youthful malefactors. Speaking quite recently in Brooklyn, Judge Otto A. Rosalsky, of the Court of General Sessions, declared that 40 per cent. of the crimes in New York city are committed by offenders under twenty years of age. He adds that the foreigners' contribution to crime is far less than that of the native born,—in the year 1910 there were 1,699 convicted of felonies who were born in the United States, and only 1,100 who were born outside of the United States. He contends, moreover, that the percentage of those who commit crime because of want and destitution can be put down to one-eighth of one per cent. "You will find," says Judge Rosalsky, "many who commit crime because they want to live beyond their means, and when they steal the profits of their evil-doing go to evil living and gambling." All of which brings out clearly a question that must be met by the friends of the system of school training favored here in America: Are the moral and religious training that preserve and invigorate citizenship and civilization being developed wisely and effectively by our present day system of public schools? Are the educational principles, which, during the last three-quarters of a century, we as a people have been reducing to practice, to continue to rule among us?

In an interview accorded to a representative of the Boston Pilot, Rev. John Hill, Pastor of Holy Rood Church, Barnsley, Yorkshire, England, gives an interesting description of the manner in which Catholic schools are conducted—in England, in which country Catholics form a small minority of the population. At the invitation of the Commission of the National Association of Education Officers of England, Father Hill accompanied its members on a tour of school inspection through Canada and the middle Western States. He took the opportunity to look into Catholic school work among us. Of the English system he had this to say: "In England Catholics erect their own school houses completely. The local civic authorities assume all the expense of maintenance, heating, lighting, books, etc., and also pay the salaries of the teachers. The instructors are appointed by the Catholic authorities, and candidates named by these may not be rejected by the civic authorities except on the ground of educational unfitness. The Catholic authorities have the right to dismiss the teachers on religious grounds but not on educational. Such is the law in force in England since 1902 regarding day schools.

"The salaries of the Catholic teachers are on the same scale as those of the instructors in the public schools. The schools are at all times subject to inspection by the local authorities or by government inspectors. This inspection is welcomed by the Catholics, because the sole desire of the managers is that their schools should be on the same educational level as the public schools. Visits are frequently made by these officials and invariably without notice.

"In drawing up the curriculum (or timetable, as it is called in England) for the Catholic schools the authorities allow a certain time, varying from one and one-half hours in some districts to half an hour in others, for religious instruction each day. One result of this plan is to obviate the necessity for Sunday schools.

"In the working of the Elementary Education Act of 1902 this feature of the curriculum is left to the local authorities. In some few instances they have been hostile to the Catholic schools and refused to raise the salaries of the instructors up to the level of those of the public schools, and have restricted the time of the religious instruction to the one-half hour allowed by statute.

"The local authorities have complete control of the secular instruction. They can decide what subjects are to be taught, the time to be allotted to them and what class of teachers is to be appointed. But in most cases the suggestions of the Catholic managers are readily accepted. The managers of the Catholic schools are six in number, four of whom are appointed by the diocese, and the others by the local authorities. The latter two need not be Catholics, though in some cases they are. An important feature of the system is the statutory right of parents to keep their children from school on holy days in order that they may attend Mass and perform other religious duties."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

An encyclical letter, addressed to the hierarchy of the Universal Church, was issued by the Pope on May 29, strongly deploring the anti-religious attitude of the Government of the Portuguese Republic.

The encyclical deals with the violent expulsion of religious orders from Portugal; the suppression of church holidays, religious oaths and religious teaching; the introduction of divorce laws; the arbitrary disposing of the Bishops of Oporto and Beja, and, finally, with the law separating Church and State.

The Holy See, the encyclical says, has been patient up to now, but cannot longer keep silent, as the Law of Separation denies to Catholic citizens even common liberties. Such a law, it is declared, is spoliation of material goods and tyrannical oppression in spiritual affairs. Man is deprived forever of a fixed church in which to maintain worship. The law even violates the will of testators; prohibits the publication of ecclesiastical acts; forbids religious emblems; encourages rebellion and the corruption of the clergy, pensioning those who have been punished by Bishops and those living with women.

The law, says the Pope, aims to detach the Portuguese Church from Rome, and therefore he condemns it as null, it having no value against the inviolable rights of the Church. He feels it is his duty to denounce the Separation Law "to the whole Christian world."

The Pope praises the courageous stand taken by the Portuguese clergy, and exhorts them to continue their strict union with the Holy See.

The "Ne temere" madness which has seized on all Protestantism shows to what length ignorance joined with malice will go. Bishops, ministers, synods, conferences, lodges are filling the air with their phrenetic clamor. All pretend to have a grievance; but when they attempt to state it in plain, temperate language, they fail utterly. Some of them, perhaps, may know the meaning of those two Latin words. If they would explain it to the multitude of their less enlightened brethren, so that all might apply it to their own conduct, they would be doing something that should give them real comfort when they shall have returned to the normal condition.

The following is a specimen of customary clerical ignorance in the matter. As it is an exception to the customary malice, we reproduce it the more gladly:

"There is nothing but humiliation for Protestants in these conditions. From the standpoint of the Roman Catholic Church, they are no doubt justified, however," claimed Rev. B. H. Bolderstone of South Vancouver. "While for my own part I will vote for the condemnation of the decree, I say that ten times more harm will result from the loose ideas Protestant ministers have of marriage than from the promulgation of the Ne temere decree. I know Protestant ministers in this city and province who assert that marriage is nothing but a civil contract and is devoid of all religious significance. The charges of the Roman Catholics can be sustained in many instances. If a couple want to be married in a shop window or up in a balloon you cannot get a Roman Catholic priest to marry them, but you can secure the services of some upstart of a Protestant minister. I have often been approached to marry people in theaters and have refused. But I know other ministers who have not. I venture to say that not one Roman Catholic minister in North America could be bribed to do that.

"One Protestant minister told me that he married a young couple who were in a hurry to catch a train simply by asking them if they wanted each other and then telling them to sign the papers.

"I venture to say that if the Protestant ministers continue to foster the light idea of marriage as many of them are doing, the divorce situation here will soon be as in the United States, where there are more divorces than in all the rest of the world."

SOCIOLOGY

We quoted lately an assertion that the increased value of New York suburban property is due to the labor and thrift of the working people dwelling on it. We showed that the former had little to do with it: we shall now show that the latter has even less.

Thrift is an economic and social virtue that restricts spending and accumulates savings. It may have several supernatural virtues mixed up with it, which is one, at least, of the reasons why it is much rarer than the platform orator pretends. It benefits the thrifty individual, and, if sufficiently common, will benefit the community. Does it benefit the capitalist?

If we open our eyes we find thriftlessness, that is, useless spending, encouraged universally. The newspapers are used for this purpose, and the devising of persuasive advertisements has become a well-paid art. One entering a public conveyance undergoes an exhortation to thriftlessness until he leaves it. The shop windows solicit the passer-by. Saloons, cigar stands, theatres, and other places where money is wasted, line the thoroughfares; and to catch the pennies that escape all those, slot-machines and phonographs are everywhere. One has reason to suspect that the thriftlessness of the wage earners enriches the capitalist rather than their thrift.

As to real property, the Great White Way is the outward sign of concentrated thriftlessness. Yet most property owners would prefer a few hundred feet of it to an equal number of the homes of the thrifty. So, too, in the suburban districts of which we are speaking, the great land-owner aims at having on his property a saloon or two, some cigar stands and ice-cream parlors, a dance-hall and a couple of moving-picture places, from which he will get, drawn from the pockets of the thriftless, a rent larger by far than would be paid by thrifty families occupying the same space. If he acts otherwise, he does so as a philanthropist or a practical Christian, not as a land-owner.

Let us suppose a clothier and a milliner next-door neighbors, and that the former has in his office a young man, and the latter a young woman, each getting $12 a week. If they carry their wages home on Saturday night, to put them in the bank on Monday morning, clothier and milliner have both paid the full sum of $12 to each. But if the young woman goes home with a hat from the milliner and the young man with a lot of fancy shirts and neckties and socks, clothier and milliner have paid in wages only the actual cost of those articles. This example shows how greatly the shop-keepers profit by thriftlessness.

Thriftlessness on the part of the working classes is, in general, advantageous to the capitalist, as it brings back quickly with profit the money he has spent in making trade or other investments, and tends to concentrate more and more the country's wealth in his hands. Thrift, on the other hand, tends to the more equitable division of wealth; and it surpasses some methods of procuring that great social good, in that it is honest with the honesty of the Gospel. Moreover, it agrees with the Gospel in other ways. Every act of resistance to the sensuality which would be gratified by wasteful spending is an act of self-denial, which, if elevated by supernatural motives, becomes a part of the bearing of the cross in which the Christian life consists.

Suppose that twenty million workingmen should practice thrift to the extent of but $1 a week. Each would have $50 at the end of the year, and a billion dollars, most of which would otherwise have found its way back to the coffers of the capitalists, would be in the hands of the workers. Like every other virtue, thrift is hard to practice at first, but soon becomes easy and pleasant. What sums, then, would be amassed in the hands of these workers after ten years is difficult to estimate.

But, some will say, such thrift would upset the industrial world. We believe it would; and this is a strong proof of our thesis. The present industrial world is the capitalists'. It would so modify things that the worker would have to be reckoned with, not as a hostile force, but as a controller of capital. Still we are willing to admit that much of the so-called production of to-day would be limited. There would be fewer great fortunes, fewer demands for luxuries, the consumption of things irreplaceable would be checked. We should no longer be feverishly pumping out oil, digging up coal and iron, to convert them into cash in the shortest time possible. There would, therefore, be fewer wage-earners, but this would not mean unemployment. Thrift carries men back to the land where they work for themselves and not for another. They would go back, not afraid of hard work, to exercise their thrift in living from the land as far as possible, and their children would grow up better in health and purer in morals. Wages would, perhaps, be lower, but food and rent would be lower, too. Thrift would reintroduce the simple life, of which the essence is to live by earth's productions, which can be renewed; to aid life only by those things which perish forever in the using. One might say we are doing just the opposite now, and that our whole social life is a huge mass of thriftlessness.

H. W.

PERSONAL

The news despatches of the week contain the information that Lord Alfred Douglas, son of the Marquis of Queensbury, was received in the Church by Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew and was confirmed by Bishop Clifton. Lord Douglas was for a long time editor of the Academy and is a poet and prose writer of great talent. Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew, it may be noted, is better known to English readers as "John Ayscough", author of "Mezzogiorno", "Marotz", "Dromina", "San Celestino", etc.

A rare experience was that of Monsignor Dr. Francis Xavier Lender, who, on May 11, celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his entrance into the German Reichstag as a member of the fighting Centre. The venerable priest, now in his eighty-first year, retains much of the freshness of his youthful days, and the end of his forty years of uninterrupted service in Parliament finds him quite as interested and active in the work devolving upon him as he was wont to prove himself in the earlier days of tumult and conflict. The honors which have come to him in the service of the Church prove his loyalty to duty in his priestly character as well. Dean of his district, member of the Council of his bishop, and years ago named domestic prelate to his Holiness, he has been a model of indefatigable activity wherever the interests of the Church and its schools and his people called for his service. The electors of his district have never failed to roll up for him an increased majority at each of the elections held during his forty years of political life, and in view of the near approach of a new opportunity to honor him, they are preparing to return him to the Reichstag to be chosen in the coming autumn with a record vote.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

A three days' celebration began on Saturday, June 3, in honor of the completion of forty years in the priesthood by the R. Rev. Joseph F. Mooney, vicar-general of the archdiocese of New York. Monsignor Mooney is in charge of the Church of the Sacred Heart in West Fifty-first Street. On the opening day of the celebration 3,100 children of the Sacred Heart parochial school, the largest in the city, attended Mass, at which Monsignor Mooney addressed them. On Sunday the Holy Name Society paraded through the streets of the parish.

Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal, accompanied by Canon Sylvestre, sailed from Quebec on the Empress of Ireland on June 2, en route for the International Eucharistic Congress to be held in Madrid.

In the presence of President Taft a military field Mass was celebrated May 28, in the shadow of the Washington Monument. It was the first open-air ceremony of that character ever witnessed in the capital of the republic. The vast throng of more than 30,000 that made up the congregation included thousands of veterans of two wars, members of civic and church organizations and a contingent of 3,000 parochial children. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Eugene De L. McDonnell, S.J., President of Gonzaga College, whose eloquent tribute to the Catholic Church made a profound impression. "And you should be here to-day," said Father McDonnell, as he turned to the President in the course of his sermon, "you should be here not only to show respect to the memory of the dead, but also to show your sympathy with the great work the Catholic Church is doing for the country. For no matter what may be said of the Faith she teaches, this much all men must grant her—she stands at the side of God and God's laws against atheism, and socialism, and anarchy."

The sixteenth annual convention of the German-American State Union of New York was held in Brooklyn, May 28-30.

The success of the gathering was fully up to the expectation of the members of the local federation, who had been unsparing in their arrangements to make this year's assembly the most successful in the history of the Union. How well the aim of the organization to arouse the interest and to spur on the activity of the German Catholic societies throughout the State in all matters pertaining to Church and country is being subserved, is manifest from one paragraph of the report presented by Mr. Joseph Frey, President of the State Union. When the first State convention was held, sixteen years ago, sixty district branches were represented by delegates; in this year's assembly two hundred such organizations sent delegates to Brooklyn to act in the name of more than 20,000 Catholic German-Americans. An imposing detail of the convention was the monster mass meeting held in the Academy of Music on Sunday evening, May 28. Bishop Chas. E. McDonnell presided and an address of welcome was made by Borough President Alfred E. Steers. An address in German, "The Position of the Church in Regard to Social Reform," by Rev. V. F. Gettelmann, S.J., Professor of Ethics in St. John's University, Toledo, Ohio; and one in English, "Social Reform in Contrast to Socialism and Our Duty Thereto," by David Goldstein, of Boston, Mass., were the chief features of a singularly interesting program.

St. Gregory's Church, in the Dorchester district of Boston, Mass., celebrated its golden jubilee last week, and during its fifty years of existence has had but two pastors. An idea of the growth of the Church in New England is given in the fact that in the territory this one parish covered in 1861 there are now thirty-four priests ministering to eleven separate congregations.

At the coming Eucharistic Congress at Madrid, the Pontifical Legate representing the Holy See, who will preside, will be his Eminence Cardinal Aguirre y Garcia, Archbishop of Toledo and Patriarch of the West Indies.

On May 7, Feast of the Patronage of St. Joseph, there was read in all the churches of the archdiocese of Vienna a pastoral letter addressed to the workmen by the venerable incumbent of that see, Cardinal Gruscha. The Cardinal deplored the efforts constantly made by unchristian agitators to lay the responsibility for the hard conditions complained of by workmen to a neglect on the part of the Church of the temporal interests of her children and to her indifference to their burdens. The evils against which workmen justly protest, are, however, in no way due to the Catholic religion and teachings; they are rather, contended the Vienna prelate, directly and immediately the result of the proud and unchristian stand taken in our day by those who rebelliously spurn the teachings of Christ's gospel and who endeavor to build up a new faith and a new religion of "Humanity" to take the place of God's revelation to man. And yet, continues the Cardinal, a betterment of the wretched conditions prevailing cannot be looked for, except in the mutually helpful principles of Christian truth laid alike upon master and man by the divine Founder of the Catholic Church. "We hail with cordial welcome," says the pastoral, "every evidence of industrial progress in the world, so long as it is not opposed to man's last end, to the honor due to God, and to the true welfare of the nations; but we do not mean to permit ourselves to be blinded by clamorous outcry for progress that is unmindful of these essential aims. We mean to unite our forces to strive together for the renewal of the social life in the strength and the love of the cross."

In a largely attended congress of delegates from the various conferences of St. Vincent de Paul Society of Germany, held in Frankfort-on-the-Main at the end of April, arrangements were perfected for a new organization of the Society's work in that empire through the establishment of a National Conference, to which the local and particular councils shall be subject. The reorganization, which will be on the lines mapped out in the rules governing Vincentian work, is now being effected.

The radical Democrate lately published an extended criticism of the pretensions made by the Old-Catholic faculty of Theology of Bern (Switzerland), and, ridiculing its efforts to hold its place in the university, claimed that it had long since been a dead thing. "It is hardly worth while to comment on the attack of the Democrate," says the Berner Tagblatt. "Few of us have ever seen any indication of vitality in this appendage of our university. It was from the start a changeling forced upon the university by the politics of Kulturkampf days." The official register shows that in last year's winter semester fourteen students attended the courses announced by the five professors forming the faculty.

Recently there died at the present mother-house in the Canadian metropolis two well-known daughters of the Venerable Marguerite Bourgeoys, the foundress in New France of the teaching Congregation of Notre Dame. On May 18, Sister St. Magdalen of Calvary, in the world Mary Ann Wall and a native of Ireland, passed away in her eighty-fourth year. Sister St. Paula (Ellen Mary Lane), her life-long friend, had expired ten days earlier. Born in Quebec City seventy years ago, Sister St. Paula was a linguist and a writer. During her fifty years of religious life she taught and directed schools, especially in Montreal, Ottawa, Bathurst, Kingston and Cornwall.

SCIENCE

WEATHER PROVERBS.

There is a fine article on Weather Proverbs by W. J. Humphreys, of the U. S. Weather Bureau, in the May number of The Popular Science Monthly. While some proverbs, as he says, are worthless, from a scientific standpoint, others, on the contrary, are very reliable and based upon objective facts. As an instance of the latter class we may take the one:

Evening red and morning gray
Help the traveler on his way;
Evening gray and morning red
Bring down rain upon his head.

Amongst other things he says this about it: "But in many ways the most interesting of all those proverbs that have to do with red sunrise and red sunset is the one which, according to Matthew, Christ used in answer to the Pharisees and Sadducees, when they asked that He would show them a sign from heaven:

"He answered and said unto them, When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather: for the sky is red.

"And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day: for the sky is red and lowering."

"It would seem, too, that Christ sanctioned these views, for it does not appear reasonable that He would teach by illustrations which He knew to be false. Then, too, He follows the above with these words:

"O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

"But whether or not Christ accepted these weather signs as being good, we feel certain that those to whom He spoke must have known and believed in them."

He then devotes six pages to the scientific explanation and proof of the truth of this proverb.

The proverbs given are classified into those relating to the seasons, sky colors, coronas and haloes, moon, stars, wind, clouds, sound, animals, plants, aches and pains, and miscellaneous. The article in question is well worth reading by those that would like the guidance of an able man in such matters.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

In answer to the appeals of jewelers the world over, France has changed the weight of the carat, the unit mass of precious stones and gold, to 200 milligrams (3.0864 grains). It is expected that the rest of the world will follow its example, and that thus the confusion arising from variable standards will be eliminated.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

On the 10th of July, 1908, a party of explorers set out from St. Boniface College, Manitoba, to discover if possible the site of old Fort St. Charles, which was somewhere on Lake of the Woods, a body of water which is chiefly in Canada but whose lower end is in the State of Minnesota. The motive really back of the expedition was to find the remains of the young Jesuit missionary John Aulneau, who had been killed there by the Indians in 1732. In the party was Brother Ulric Paquin. It was his spade that first struck the stones of the ancient fireplace of the fort. The site had been surely found and ultimately the bones of Father Aulneau were unearthed. Last July Brother Paquin, who was only six years a Jesuit, having entered the Society on December 7, 1902, was sent to Alaska. Like Father Aulneau, his body was soon to be sought for. His tragic death occurred last January, but it is only now that the news has reached us. He had set out from the Mission of St. Michael's on January 27 to go to Stebens, about ten miles away, to repair the chapel at that place. The weather was intensely cold, but there was no sign of a storm, so he loaded his tools and lumber on his dog sled and started on his journey. He never reached Stebens. The Father waited for him in vain and then suspected what had happened. The Brother had been caught in a blizzard, which had suddenly swept down from the north, and had lost his way. A search was organized, and on February 2 they found him and his dogs huddled together in the snow, dead. He was born at St. Didas, P. Q., and was thirty-six years of age. He was known as an exemplary religious and was very much beloved in St. Boniface, which he had left only a short time before. Four of his sisters are nuns.

The death is announced of Rev. Martial I. Boorman, S.J., who departed this life May 30, in St. Ignatius College, Chicago, Illinois, after a lingering illness. Father Boorman was for many years a distinguished and successful member of the Jesuit Missionary Band working in the middle western States. He had been selected for the work in the early '90s, and his career in that difficult field of labor had been a singularly creditable one. Two years ago, broken in health, he was relieved of the charge by Superiors, and after a brief term as Assistant Pastor in St. Xavier's Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, his infirmity obliged his retirement. His end came to him peacefully after an edifying example of patience as he awaited its coming.

Father Boarman was born in Booneville, Missouri, March 6, 1853, and entered the Society of Jesus, after his college course in St. Louis University, on July 27, 1872. His philosophical and theological studies were made in the Seminary at Woodstock, Maryland, where he was ordained priest by Cardinal Gibbons in 1886. Before his inception of missionary work he had been a member of the teaching staff of St. Ignatius College, Chicago, and for two years he filled the post of Vice-President and Director of Studies in St. Mary's College, St. Mary's, Kansas. Whilst a missionary he had come to recognize the need of a catechism specially adapted to adults seeking instruction in classes of converts, and he found leisure in his busy round to prepare a catechism to supply the lack, which men well used to the work of instructing converts pronounce the most excellent booklet of its kind in existence to-day. Father Boarman had published, too, a series of talks on Socialism and a number of other useful pamphlets.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

MONTREAL CATHOLIC SAILORS' CLUB.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Once more the splendid work that is being done by the Catholic Sailors' Club of Montreal is emphasized by the publication of its fifteenth Annual Report. From very small beginnings, in a comparatively short space of time this institution has advanced to a high degree of prosperity. Save for an inconsiderable mortgage it now owns a fine building, provided with a concert hall, amusement and reading rooms. In the former not only musical but literary entertainments, in the form of illustrated lectures, are given; in the two latter, games are provided for the amusement of the visiting seamen, or he may read, or write letters, for which an abundance of stationery is supplied. This season, no less than forty-six thousand sailors have visited the Club, and enjoyed not only its material comforts and privileges, but, in the majority of instances, have also benefited by spiritual advantages. Under the direction of the Jesuit Fathers, the Club has its own chapel, where Mass is celebrated every Sunday morning, confessions being heard the evening previous, while on Sunday night there is Benediction, and sometimes a short sermon, or lecture. Numbers of the men profit by the presence of the Chaplain, to be enrolled in the League of the Sacred Heart, or the Scapular, or to take the pledge, for temperance is one of the virtues promoted, though not too aggressively; and it is not infrequent, as in a late instance, for a sailor to return, after many years, to the Port of Montreal, and declare that he has rigorously kept that pledge, which he took of his own free will and without undue insistence. Father Isidore Kavanagh, S.J., who for the third time since the inception of the club has been its Chaplain, retires this season in favor of Father Gorman, S.J., who has likewise filled that office before.

In fact, to the Chaplain, and to the ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, which comprises many of the most representative names of Catholic Montreal, the work and its results are most gratifying, for not only are the "toilers of the deep" singularly appreciative of favors shown them, but reports are continually being received, from outside sources, as to the improved conditions on the wharves, and the greater order and decorum there prevailing, since the foundation and expansion of the Club.

Amongst its works, as heretofore, is the distribution of good literature, which is a widely extended apostolate. Packages of reading matter are placed on board every outward-bound ship, and the management is assured that not only is this literature read, but that it is brought into homes on the other side of the water, there continuing its mission of instruction and edification.

A regularly appointed committee of ladies visits the seamen sick in the hospital, rendering them any possible service, and, when the hospital is a Protestant one, bringing them into communication with the priest. When sailors die in port, they are assured of Christian burial in that plot upon the side of Mount Royal, with its monument, "Our Sailors." Two items in the mortuary records for this year are especially pathetic. One is concerning an unknown seaman, dressed as a fireman, who was drowned in the river. As he wore articles of Catholic devotion, he was claimed and buried by the Club, with the ceremonies of the Church. The other is of an unknown man, found drowned in the canal, assumed to be a Lake seaman and an American. He, too, wore articles of Catholic devotion and was interred by the Club.

During the season past the sailors had a specially delightful evening when they were addressed by Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., with whom some of them already were acquainted, since he had said Mass and preached in the forecabin during his voyage to America. Another speaker of the same evening was Bishop Donahoe, of Wheeling, who gave an exceedingly witty and felicitous discourse. Still another eminent visitor to the rooms was Rev. Dr. Toll, Rector of the German National Church of Santa Maria dell' Anima, Naples, and President of the Catholic Sailors' Home. His visit had a special object, he being intent on founding an International Catholic Sailors' Club, with headquarters in the above named city, in order to establish relations with those already existing, to found others, and give help where help is needed. To this end, he has begun the publication of a little magazine, under the title of Stella Maris. He made a thorough investigation of the work of the Montreal organization, which he considered eminently satisfactory, and on his return to Italy the following note was received by the Manager, Dr. Ather-ton:

"When, on the 12th inst., I had the honor to report to the Holy Father, I mentioned specially the splendid work performed in Montreal, and His Holiness charged me to express to the members his great satisfaction and to convey to them and their families, as a token of his special benevolence, the Apostolic Benediction."

The Club has, in fact, received various marks of favor and encouragement from the present Sovereign Pontiff no less than his predecessor, and, needless to say, the work has the hearty support and approval of the Archbishop of Montreal, as well as the various parish priests. This year, more than ever, the Management may feel that it has carried out in every respect those aims which are briefly set forth upon the front page of the report:

"To welcome a large body of seamen yearly to the port of Montreal . . . and afford them while there a bright and homelike resort, under uplifting influences. To encourage the sailors, while on shore, to be self-respecting, to observe law and order, to save their money and to avoid the temptations of a great city, and in particular to advocate temperance."

Hence, the seaman is urged to make the rooms his headquarters, that when released from the duties of his ship, they shall be his home, his club, where he may meet men from other ships; his library, his reading-room and writing-room, his post office and savings bank, and his place of entertainment and recreation, in the shape of games, lectures, concerts, etc.

The Club, while welcoming to its benefits sailors of every nationality and creed, especially encourages the Catholic seaman to attend to the duties of his religion, providing him with his own oratory and chaplain. It undertakes, as above stated, to visit the sick and the injured, and to bury the dead honorably in the Cemetery of Cote des Neiges.

ANNA T. SADLER.

Montreal, May 31.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 10

(Price 10 Cents)

JUNE 17, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 114

CHRONICLE

Nation Honors His Eminence—Some Features of the Event—Canadian Reciprocity—Split in Insurgent Ranks—Judicial Procedure Reform—Rear Admiral Robie Dead—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Belgium—France—Germany—Austria-Hungary217-220

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Verdesi Case—The International Catholic News Agency—Normandy's Thousand Years.221-225

IN MISSION FIELDS

The Madura Mission225-226

CORRESPONDENCE

No Fears for the Health of the Pope—Portuguese Republicanism—Exciting Times in Mexico—The "Four Nation Loan" to China.226-229

EDITORIAL

By Fast Freight—Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee—Menaces to Our Civilization—What the Maderists Feared—Books by Catholic Authors—Illegal Weddings—God Have Mercy on Him—Catholics and Protestant Hymns230-234

LITERATURE

"Excising" Thomas à Kempis—Religious Questions of the Day, or Some Modernist Theories and Tendencies Exposed—Joan of Arc—Heroes of Chivalry—Sermons Delivered Before Mixed Congregations—A Chinese Appeal to Christendom Concerning Christian Missions—Short Catechism for Those About to Marry—Summula Philosophiæ Scholasticæ, Vol. II, Cosmologia et Psychologia—Books Received.234-237

EDUCATION

Spread of the Students' Eucharistic League—The Unfair Discrimination of the Carnegie Fund Trustees against Catholic Colleges....237

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Letter of the Pope's Vicar to Father Bricarelli, S. J., on the Verdesi Case.....238

SOCIOLOGY

Philadelphia Physicians Form a Guild of St. Luke, St. Cosmas and St. Damian—Advantages of Catholic Colonization—Insurance for Special Benefit of Children.....238-239

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Investiture of Mgr. Russell—Society of St. Vincent de Paul to be Reorganized—Notable Conversions in Baltimore—A Franciscan Community of Native Indian Religious.....239

PERSONAL

Monument to Major L'Enfant—History of Cardinal Gibbons' Work in North Carolina to be Prepared—Testimonial to Patrick Ford...239

SCIENCE

Migrations of Birds—Total Eclipse of the Sun of April 28—Internal Heat of the Earth—Why Mercury Under Pressure Ruptures Steel—Effect of Electric Light on the Human Eye.239-240

OBITUARY

Sister Alphonse—Mother Borgia Kelly—Mother M. Philip—Mother Mary of St. John the Baptist240

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Catholic Books in State Libraries.....240

CHRONICLE

Nation Honors His Eminence.—Never before to a living prelate of any church has there been given in this country a civic demonstration such as that which Baltimore witnessed on June 6, in honor of James, Cardinal Gibbons, primate of the Catholic Church in America. The celebration was in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of his priesthood, and the twenty-fifth of his cardinalate. In the centre of a platform at the Fifth Regiment Armory sat the Cardinal, full of vigor, wearing the scarlet robes of a prince of the Catholic Church. At his right was the President of the United States, at his left the Vice-President. A few feet away was the only living ex-President of the nation; almost within reach of the hand were the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, an ex-Speaker, the Ambassador of Great Britain, the Governor of Maryland and the Mayor of Baltimore. Behind rose tier after tier of seats filled with Cabinet officers, United States Senators, Congressmen, public officers and men of prominence in professional and commercial life. In front, filling the great hall and crowding the galleries, were close to 25,000 fellow citizens, nearly all of them standing. The gathering was the largest and the most notable that had ever assembled under one roof in the City of Baltimore. Addresses were made by President Taft, Vice-President Sherman, former President Roosevelt, Senator Elihu Root of New York, Mr. James Bryce, the British Ambassador, Speaker Clark of the House of Representatives, former Speaker Cannon, Mayor Preston of Baltimore and His Eminence, the Cardinal. Governor Crothers, of Maryland, was the presiding officer. Chief Justice White, of the United States Supreme Court, made a trip from New Orleans in order to attend the exercises. He did not speak, as it is not customary for the Chief Justice to address public meetings. A large number of clergymen representing every denomination in the city were present, occupying a gallery specially reserved for them and filling it completely. No untoward incident occurred to interfere with the perfect success of the demonstration.

Some Features of the Event.—Cardinal Gibbons was born in Baltimore, July 13, 1834; his ordination to the priesthood took place on June 30, 1861, and his elevation to the cardinalate on June 7, 1886. The civic celebration of these two events will be followed later in the season by the ecclesiastical, when Baltimore's old cathedral will be the scene of an extraordinary religious pageant. In the preparation for the recent demonstration religious lines were entirely effaced. To accord with the democratic character of the Cardinal, no tickets for admission to the armory were issued.

Besides the distinguished speakers, other guests invited by the committee of citizens in charge of the arrangements included all members of the Cabinet, all members of the Supreme Court, all Ambassadors and Ministers Plenipotentiary, all Governors of States, members of Maryland's highest courts, its Legislature, and Baltimore City Council. On the official roster of committees for the celebration were 400 of Maryland's most distinguished sons, public officers, soldiers, sailors, judges, journalists, members of the bar, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, college presidents, scientists. John G. Murray, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Maryland, acted as chairman of the reception committee. Rabbi William Rosenau headed the testimonial committee. The Rev. J. Ross Stevenson represented the Presbyterians on the State committee.

Canadian Reciprocity.—President Taft has made it clear that he is opposed to the Root amendment to the reciprocity agreement, which would suspend the proposed duties on wood pulp and print paper until such time as the Canadian provincial governments shall admit these commodities free of duty, and consequently the real struggle in the Senate will be over the amendment, rather than over the agreement as originally drawn. The President, in an outspoken speech in Chicago on June 3, declared that the opposition to reciprocity is inspired by American manufacturers of print paper and the "lumber trust." A poll taken by the Chicago Tribune of 4,303 American newspapers, daily and weekly, of every shade of political opinion, showed that 3,113 were in favor of the agreement and 1,127 against it. That the bill will be adopted by the Senate, and with more than thirty votes to spare, is a prediction based on a careful poll of the Senate after President Taft's Chicago speech.

Split in Insurgent Ranks.—The insurgent movement in the Senate seems to be disintegrating. Members of the movement themselves admit that there are fundamental differences on many questions, that the line of cleavage is being emphasized daily, and that the climax has been reached in the positive refusal of a number of progressive Senators to commit themselves at this time to the support of Senator La Follette for President against President Taft. More recently, the Canadian reciprocity bill has served to disturb the equilibrium. The thirteen are not agreed among themselves as to how they will vote on the measure, and it is manifest there will be a serious split.

Judicial Procedure Reform.—The first step in accordance with President Taft's suggestion for the reform of judicial procedure was taken in the appointment of a committee consisting of the Chief Justice of the United States and Associate Justices Lurton and Van Devanter to undertake a revision of the rules of practice in federal courts of equity. It is expected that as a result the adjustment of disputes in courts of equity will be expedited, and the long delays due to the present rules will be avoided.

Rear-Admiral Robie Dead.—Rear-Admiral Edward D. Robie, retired, one of the grand old men of the navy, died in Washington in his eightieth year. He accompanied Commodore Perry on his epoch-making trip around the world to Japan on the voyage which resulted in the opening up of that kingdom to Western civilization. Admiral Robie served in both the Civil and Spanish-American Wars, and was placed upon the retired list of the navy after having served as engineer-in-chief.

Mexico.—The last official act of President Diaz was to honor the requisition papers for a Mexican citizen wanted in Texas for murder. Just before sailing from Veracruz, Diaz sent in his resignation as general of division in the Mexican army. He was requested to withdraw it, but he insisted on his desire to retire to private life.—Several Americans have already put in claims for damages caused by the revolution. The largest claim is that of the Mormons, who place their loss at one million dollars. Formèr Vice-President Corral underwent a surgical operation in Paris. It was found that his pancreas was affected. The surgeons say that their work was successful.—One of the first acts of President de la Barra was to release some sixty political prisoners confined in the fortress of San Juan de Ulúa, near Veracruz. They were utterly destitute and had to receive alms from the charitably disposed.—Governor Valenzuela of Tabasco is the only "survivor" of the twenty-seven governors of the old régime. He seems to be harmless. On June 7, 1910, Francisco I. Madero was thrown into jail on a charge of sedition; a year later he was received in the capital with wild acclamations and hailed as the savior of Mexico.—An eruption of Colima, the only active volcano in Mexico, caused the loss of thirteen hundred lives and property to an amount that cannot yet be determined.—The socialistic revolutionists in Lower California have lost two of their leaders, and, at the same time, a considerable sum, said to be eight thousand pesos, from their treasure-chest; but they still aim at establishing an independent republic. The United States government has authorized the passage of Mexican troops through American territory to subdue them. The Mexican government has asked for an appropriation of six million pesos to meet the expenses incurred during the Madero revolution. This includes payment for property seized or destroyed, settling claims for damages, and pensioning the revolutionary forces. Madero has made it known that, "if elected," he will appoint both De la Barra and General Reyes to cabinet positions.

Canada.—A strike of the Building Trades in Vancouver has put 4,000 out of work. An attempt to bring about a general sympathetic strike has failed for the present, even the bricklayers refusing to go out. The question is closed shop vs. open shop. There has been some disorder.—The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway complains of scarcity of labor, owing to the refusal of the western provinces to allow the importation of Asiatics. It has only 4,000 men at work, where it could employ 15,000.—The Alberta Central Railway charter has been sold to James J. Hill, who thus acquires the right to build northward into that province as far as he likes.—The Unionists in London are paying marked attention to Mr. McBride, Premier of British Columbia, whom they look on as the hope of the Conservative and Imperial party in Canada. He was entertained at the Carlton Club, and all the chief Unionists came together to do him honor.—The great question now in politics is whether redistribution of seats on account of the changes in population during the last ten years will precede the general election. The government desires it, as it will increase the representation of the prairie provinces, where their strength in the matter of reciprocity lies. The conservatives cannot oppose it. Still, some hold that the present parliament will not meet again and that the government will throw the onus of forcing dissolution on the Conservatives.

Great Britain.—The Unionist press is angry with Sir Wilfrid Laurier for reducing the bonds between the Dominions and the Empire to mere threads of sentiment, ignoring the fact that when the Unionists were in power they ignored the Dominions' desire for more real union, and professed themselves satisfied with such sentimental ties.—The Government proposed in the Imperial Conference a permanent advisory committee of the Empire, to include the High Commissioners of the Dominion. Sir Wilfrid Laurier objected, on the ground that it would restrict the independence of Dominion parliaments. The other premiers agreed with him. They also joined with him in rejecting the Government's plan to use the labor exchanges to promote emigration, fearing that this would result in filling the colonies with undesirable immigrants.—The Indian Government is considering a reduction in the native army. The native members of the council urge that the Anglo-Russian convention makes such a reduction feasible, and that the need of economy makes it desirable. People in England are becoming alarmed.—Lord Winterton and Mr. F. E. Smith, leaders among the younger Unionists, gave a fancy dress ball, which seems to have fallen short of propriety in more ways than one. One deserves notice. It was accepted generally as a political ball, and among the characters was a Unionist member of parliament disguised as number 499 of the 500 peers Mr. Asquith threatens to create if the Lords throw out the Parliament Bill. Both Mr. Balfour and Mr. Asquith, as well as other leaders, were present, and are reported to have enjoyed the spectacle immensely. Not unnaturally, a more serious peer writes to the papers to ask whether the country, as Mr. Balfour says in parliament, is face to face with a grave constitutional crisis, or whether the whole thing is a farce. The affair reveals a state of public morals which does not augur good for England.—Prince Arthur of Connaught has been made a Freemason, and the Duke of Connaught is said to be doing his utmost to prevail upon the King to consent to the initiation of the Prince of Wales, who has just been made a Knight of the Garter, "to the honor of Almighty God and of St. George."—The Birkbeck Bank, a popular institution of long standing, has failed. The directors maintain that the deficiency will be small. The Bank of England has advanced it enough on its securities to pay depositors 50 per cent. immediately.

Ireland.—The Census for 1901-1911 returns Ireland's population as 4,381,951, a decrease of 76,824 since 1901, or 1.7 per cent. The previous percentage of decline was 5.2. Leinster has increased .7 per cent., and Ulster, Munster and Connaught have decreased .3, 4 and 5.7, respectively. The Catholic population is 3,238,656, a shrinkage of 2.1 per cent. All other denominations have also declined, except the Jews, who have grown from 472 in 1881, when legislation made land tenancies security for money lenders, to 5,101 in 1911. There were 3,305, chiefly in Ulster, who refused to designate their religious profession. The birth rate has increased .4, and the death rate declined .6 per cent.—Seventeen colonial premiers, with Messrs. Harcourt, Churchill and Seely, representing the English Colonial office, sat down to a dinner given by the Irish Party. Mr. Redmond welcomed them as representatives of lands where Irish exiles found hospitable homes and became loyal and worthy citizens, and also because they were all in sympathy with Ireland's aspirations for the freedom which the colonies enjoyed. Irish songs by Mr. McCormack and others took the place of speeches, but at the end Sir Wilfrid Laurier broke the rule of "No toasts" by proposing "God bless Ireland."—The Irish Party have appointed a committee to suggest modifications in the Insurance Bill that would make it applicable to Irish conditions. The Chancellor's reply to Mr. Redmond made it clear that he had given no thought to the great differences in the economic circumstances of Ireland and Great Britain. The Supreme Executive of the Irish County Councils and the Council of Agriculture have objected that the bill imposes a far heavier burden, relatively, on Irish than on English employers and employees, and insist that separate treatment and Irish control are essential.—Mr. Dillon had a serious automobile accident in Dundalk, but is announced to be out of danger. He had just returned from the House of Commons, where he had rendered particularly useful service during the session. Mainly at his instance Mr. Birrell made considerable concessions in favor of Irish primary and intermediate education, and announced an additional grant for the erection of 6,000 laborers' cottages. This will make a total of 46,000 cottages erected under the Laborers' Acts.

Belgium.—The fight on the school question still rages fiercely. The anti-Catholics are chiefly worked up against what is called the bon scolaire: the certificate which enables parents to claim admittance for their children to any school they select. A Colonization Society for Latin-America is established at Brussels, with 300 foreign agents supplying information to intending immigrants.—A frantic deputy named Anseele is out with a speech against the celibacy of school teachers. The attack, of course, was intended to be against the Sisters and Brothers, but as there are very many lay teachers in the schools of Belgium the unwise statesman has raised a storm. In many parts of the United States we look at the matter otherwise. When a school teacher marries she loses her position.—On June 8 the Schollaert Cabinet resigned. The President of the Chamber of Deputies, Cooreman, was asked by the King to form a new Cabinet, but he declined. The School Question brought about the disaster. Baron de Broqueville was then prevailed upon to step into the breach, and accept the task of selecting the incoming Ministry.

France.—In spite of prognostications to the contrary, the Cabinet, according to the Temps, will continue to exist, as M. Monis is on the way to recovery. The condition of the Navy will first occupy the attention of the Parliament when it reassembles; the Minister of Public Instruction will reveal his program, which promises to be drastic.—The fighting continues in Morocco. General Moinier had to stand an eight-hour attack by the wild tribesmen, who, in spite of the French machine guns, rushed up to within 100 feet of the fire and refused to withdraw until their ranks were decimated. The French have 30,000 men in the field: 20,000 along the line from Casablanca to Fez, and 10,000 massed on the banks of the Moulouia—all for Mulai Hafid, who was the bitter foe of France a few years ago, and who now has its support against his own subjects. The French army is in a deplorable condition, both for equipment and military training.—The troubles in the champagne district seem to be on the verge of beginning again. The decree of Fallières making two champagne zones has not brought peace. On June 8 red flags were waving in several places, and troops were occupying the roads leading to Bar-sur-Aube, which is the storm centre.—Rouvier, twice Premier of France, once in 1887, and again in 1902, died at Neuilly-sur-Seine, a suburb of Paris, on June 7, at the age of sixty-nine. It was during his first premiership that he removed Boulanger, who was then Minister of War—Boulanger was then at the height of his popularity. The Church authorities refused to give the ex-Premier Christian burial.

Germany.—The possibility of serious developments in Morocco following France's present campaign in that country has evidently not been entirely put out of mind by the German government. It is semi-officially announced that another note has been forwarded to Paris from Berlin, in which attention is again called to the limitations put upon all signatories of the Algeiras agreement, and the policy of Germany in regard to the recognition of Morocco's sovereignty and integrity is once more clearly affirmed. The note, it is declared, cordially accepts the fact of France's special interests in Morocco, but diplomatically warns the French Government not to enter upon a program not demanded by those interests, even though a considerable number of politicians and a large section of the press urge such a program.—Vicar-Capitular von Hartman has been named Bishop of the Münster diocese, in succession to the late occupant of that See, Dr. Dingelstad, who died in March of this year.—Prince Joachim, youngest son of Emperor William, is said to be slowly convalescing after the operation made necessary by a serious accident during the Döberitz maneuvers, late in May. He has been ordered to Homburg to rest and recuperate. The Empress Mother accompanies him.—The press of Germany continues to comment on the remarkably cordial reception of the Emperor and Empress during their recent visit to England. King and people alike, it is favorably noted, were exceedingly hearty in their welcome. Officially, too, it is affirmed that the Emperor was exceedingly pleased, and it is added that his expression of his great pleasure is no mere diplomatic utterance. Whether the visit is to bring about any happy effects remains to be seen; certain it is, however, that a remarkable change appears to have been wrought in the sentiments of the English-speaking people regarding the German nation.

Austria-Hungary.—Official reports continue to give very favorable tidings of the Emperor's condition. The venerable head of the dual monarchy appears to have fully recovered from the illness that lately caused much apprehension among his people. Last week, during a brief stay in his palace of Schönbrunn, in Vienna, he was able to receive in audience King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, and other distinguished personages. Late in the week, Francis Joseph took up his residence in the Villa Hermes, a favorite resort of his, in the suburb of Lainz. It is expected that a few weeks spent there will completely restore his physical strength.—The cordial manner in which King Ferdinand has been received in the capital city is regarded as significant, in view of the fact that conditions in the Balkan provinces are again becoming critical.—The new Army bill has been introduced in the Hungarian Parliament, and it has been officially published in Austria, as well. The details of the bill, as it issues from the hands of the special Commission, are different in no very important way from those already announced. It is too soon to venture judgment on the fate of the bill in the Hungarian Houses, and since Austria's Parliament is dissolved one can, naturally, say nothing of the ultimate results of the consideration of the measure in Vienna. Politicians seem quite confident that the bill will be accepted in both parliaments, though they grant its passage will not be without stormy experiences.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Verdesi Case

On account of the stupendous interests involved, the whole Catholic world has for the last few weeks been watching intently the course of the trial, now happily finished, of the apostate Roman priest Verdesi, who publicly charged a Jesuit Father named Bricarelli, a member of the staff of the Civiltà Cattolica, with having revealed the secret of the confessional. The facts of the case have been already stated in AMERICA, but they may be again briefly recalled.

Verdesi had been educated in the Apostolic School of St. Paul's Outside the Walls. He then became a Benedictine, and, after wearing the monastic habit for some time, suddenly disappeared from the monastery. He was found after a while in the proselytizing establishment of the Methodists in Rome, who make a business of corrupting the faith of the people. The unfortunate wretch was induced to return home, and, later, for reasons which the average mortal finds hard to understand, was admitted to the Roman Seminary of the Apollinare, and in 1907 was ordained a priest. In the following year he visited Father Bricarelli, whom he knew, and in the course of the conversation it transpired that Verdesi had been in the habit of attending the secret meetings of a set of Modernist priests, though, as he said, without sharing in their apostacy. When informed that he was obliged by the law of the Church to denounce the offenders to the ecclesiastical authorities, he did so. Three years afterwards, namely, on April 12, 1911, there appeared in several papers an interview ascribed to him, in which he charged Father Bricarelli with betraying the secret of the confessional, and the following day a declaration was published over his signature authenticating the interview in all its details. Father Bricarelli published an immediate denial, and then proceeded to prosecute Verdesi for criminal defamation of character. The trial opened on May 22d. Besides the presiding officer, there were three judges, the proctor of the Crown, the accused and the accuser, with five of the most distinguished lawyers in all Italy on each side. The courtroom was crowded daily with interested but respectful spectators.

The evidence was substantially as follows: A Roman correspondent of Il Secolo of Milan testified that on April 11th he interviewed Verdesi at the Methodist Institute on Via Novara, wrote up the interview, mentioning Father Bricarelli by name, and handed it in. The editor changed Father Bricarelli's name to "a Jesuit of the Civiltà Cattolica." The editor of Il Messaggero of Rome then obtained the manuscript of the interview and printed it with Father Bricarelli's name as written. On the following night the correspondent summoned Verdesi to the Roman office of Il Secolo, and had him sign, in the presence of the office force, a declaration of the authenticity and correctness of the interview, took a flash-light photograph of the scene in the office, and printed both the declaration and the photograph the next day. The evidence was substantiated by the editors mentioned and by the other correspondents, and was not denied by Verdesi.

Then Verdesi was examined under oath and stated that he had been going to confession regularly to Father Bricarelli since first entering the Seminario Romano in 1904. At the end of May, 1908, he had recourse to Father Bricarelli on a difficulty of conscience about sharing the ideas of some Modernists, was invited as usual to make his confession, knelt down in Father Bricarelli's room, and told him about attending the meetings of some five Modernist priests, who had in the course of these meetings denied the divinity of Christ, the authority of the Church, the existence of God, etc., etc. Father Bricarelli told him that he was obliged to denounce them, but gave him absolution, saying that they would discuss the denunciation afterwards. After absolution, still considering himself secure of the sacramental secrecy of Confession, he named the five priests concerned, who were friends of his. Father Bricarelli imposed upon him the obligation of denouncing them to the Holy Office. Verdesi found this hard to do. He spoke of this to some other priests for counsel, among them to Father Perrotti, the secretary of Mgr. Bisleti, and to Mgr. Bianchi Cagliesi, as he thought, in Confession. He returned to Father Bricarelli to persuade him not to constrain him to make the denunciation. Father Bricarelli then told him that he had been to the Holy Father, had given him the whole story, and had been charged to enjoin upon Verdesi to send to him in writing the names of the five priests and the items concerning them which he had specified to Father Bricarelli.

Verdesi added that on returning home, after consulting Mgr. Cagliesi in Confession about it, he wrote out the denunciation and brought it to Father Bricarelli. Since that time he had not been to Confession to Father Bricarelli. The five priests named were all called to account in consequence of the denunciation, and two of them, Fathers Bonaiuti and Rossi, had been penalized. He acknowledged the interview and the authenticating letter, but added that he acted not with intent to defame, but to defend himself and his friends.

On cross-examination, he said that he had written to the Methodists early in 1909 (but, on suggestion of his lawyers, changed the date to early in 1911), giving his reasons for desiring to leave the Catholic Church. He denied that he had ever spoken to others about the details of his statement to Father Bricarelli, at least as far as the names of the accused were concerned.

Father Bricarelli deposed that he became acquainted with Verdesi in 1904, heard his Confession once during his days in the seminary and once again a few days before his ordination, in May, 1907. Between that and the end of 1907 Verdesi came to him several times, sometimes for Confession, sometimes for a friendly visit; but they never talked over Modernist matters. After 1907 Verdesi never came to him to Confession. He saw him once in January, 1908, and not again till the end of July, 1908, when Verdesi walked into his room and, standing by the desk at which Bricarelli was seated, told him of attending meetings of the Modernist priests, naming them and itemizing their declarations and actions. He advised their denunciation to the Holy Office; Verdesi agreed, but postponed the question of how it was to be done.

Continuing, Father Bricarelli said that on the 10th of August, having occasion to call on the Holy Father on some other business, he asked how a priest in the position of Verdesi, without, however, naming Verdesi, should act. The Holy Father told him to instruct the priest to make his declaration of the names and facts in writing, and, without signing it, leave it with Father Bricarelli, to be brought personally to the Holy Father. He had later to leave town without seeing Verdesi, but wrote him in September of the Holy Father's injunction. Returning to Rome in October, he had a visit from Verdesi, who, on hearing the wishes of the Holy Father, made no difficulty, but, going home, returned two days later with the denunciation written out. Father Bricarelli added that he offered to transcribe the letter for Verdesi, to make him more secure. This he did at Verdesi's request, delivered the transcript to the Holy Father and carefully preserved the original ever since. He never spoke to any one of the denunciation, prior to Verdesi's published interview, saw Verdesi a few times immediately after the denunciation, and has seen nothing of him since until appearing in court,

It was thus a question of veracity between Bricarelli and Verdesi. To impugn the latter's reliability, Mgr. Cagliesi took oath that in 1909 Verdesi told him in detail of his having written to the Methodists about their receiving him, and contradicted him flatly on two other assertions. Father Perrotti, the secretary of Mgr. Bisleti, testified that Verdesi, in conversation with him, had mentioned the chief details found in the denunciation and named the three principal persons accused; he added also that the Modernistic tendencies of these three men were well known in ecclesiastical circles for as much as a year or two before that. Mgr. Benigni, the former Under-Secretary of State, also took oath that these men were long known in ecclesiastical circles to be more or less Modernists, and that the penalizing of them antedated specifically the time of Verdesi's denunciation. On the other hand, the statement of Father Bricarelli is supported by a letter of Cardinal Respighi, the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, in which he states that the Holy Father had charged him to let Father Bricarelli know that he remembered well that when he came to His Holiness in August, 1908, it was to obtain authoritative counsel on the case, that he did not mention Verdesi's name, that the facts related were already well known from another source, and that the anonymous denunciation of Verdesi could have no serious influence on the provisions then being taken by the Holy See against the priests whom Verdesi accused of Modernism.

The line of argument followed by Bricarelli's lawyers was that, whereas Verdesi published that Father Bricarelli had manifested to the authorities facts made known to him in Confession, which manifestation injured his friends and himself, the truth was that the facts were not made known in Confession, that they were already known to the authorities, and, for that matter, to many others, and in a measure by Verdesi's own manifestation of them, and that whatever befell the accused came not from Verdesi's statement, but from other information, and that nobody knew that Verdesi had anything to do with the matter except in so far as he told others himself, and finally published the fact to the world in the public press. The defense began with taking exception to the competency of the court because the publication took place in Milan; this was overruled, according to Italian law. The lawyers for Verdesi then insisted on postponement of trial, which was refused. Later, they wanted Father Bricarelli and Mgr. Cagliesi to testify to what Verdesi may have told them in Confession, promising the permission of Verdesi. Both of the witnesses refused, out of respect for the Sacrament, and the ruling of the court was that, as in a matter of professional confidence, not only the rights of the confiding party, but also of others, might be involved, and the general question of preserving respect for professional secrecy was always involved, it rested with the person receiving the confidence to decide whether he could in justice to all these aspects of the matter declare the confidence even with permission of his client.

The defense then tried to bring in the superiors of Father Bricarelli, on the ground that he could not come to a civil court without their leave, but the court ruled that he had the right of every citizen to come to court for his protection, and whose advice or leave he asked before coming did not enter within the competency of the court. Finally, when the presiding officer declared that he would send a judge to take the deposition of Cardinals Respighi and Martinelli, who were named on the list of witnesses, the defense argued long and vociferously that the cardinals had no privilege before the law, but should come to court. The court ruled that consistently with the law of guarantees and the practice of the courts the cardinals were at liberty to answer by deposition. To this ruling the defense filed an exception.

On the 29th of May, after the deposition of Cardinal Martinelli had been read, the counsel for Father Bricarelli offered in evidence a letter from the Cardinal Vicar Respighi. Verdesi's counsel objected vehemently, on the ground that as Cardinal Respighi was the Pope's Vicar, it involved the person of His Holiness. The objection was overruled, and the letter, which is virtually from His Holiness, was read. [This letter is printed elsewhere in this issue.—ED. AMERICA.]

Finally, on June 6, the New York Sun informed us that Verdesi had been condemned to ten months' imprisonment, besides paying the costs of the trial. C. M.

The International Catholic News Agency

The interest manifested on all sides in the recently founded International United Telegraph Agency (I. U. T. A.) makes a record of the progress of the new venture opportune. The response to the first circular soliciting subscriptions, issued early in March, was a very encouraging one. In Germany alone over one hundred and fifty papers subscribed within a few weeks, among them several of the leading "Liberal" and financial organs of the Empire. Before May first this number had risen to over two hundred. As a matter of course, many other "Liberal" and Social-Democratic sheets opened the vials of their wrath and poured it out without stint over the new undertaking. To them it means an attempt to "clericalize" and "confessionalize" the international telegraph; the upshot of it all would be to catholicize it; one wonders that they did not say to canonize it as well. It is quite characteristic of the style of journalism affected by newspapers of the type mentioned that they gave their attention almost wholly to the one fact that the "Juta" was a product of Catholic enterprise, and ignored the other fact, much more important for a source of information for the organs of public opinion, that the bureau would be strictly independent and objective. But these tactics are nowadays pretty well understood on the continent, so well, indeed, that the comments of the sheets mentioned are never new. Their editorial golden rule seems to be founded on a definition of independence and objectivity unknown to any lexicographer; it has one wording for Catholic and another for anti-Catholic news.

The well-known Centre organ, the Augsburger Post-zeitung, in a leading article filled with exquisite irony, makes sport of the crocodile tears of the "Liberal" and Social-Democratic newspapers, and rightly interprets their attitude as a proof not only of the necessity, but also of the correctness, of the policy of the new agency. It points out that the Wolff Bureau, which supplies so many of the sheets mentioned with their dispatches, is in many respects little more than a clearing office for the dispatches of other bureaus, and these often anything but favorable to German national interests, to say nothing of their attitude towards the Church. The Catholic newspapers are not the only ones, by any means, in Germany who have bitterly complained of such a partisan news-service. Small wonder, then, that many of these newspapers subscribed at once for the "Juta" service.

In Austria and Hungary the "Juta" received an especially enthusiastic reception. Austria's great Catholic press association, the Piusverein, immediately placed its efficient news bureau at the disposal of the "Juta" committee of organization, agreeing to act as distributing centre for the Catholic papers of Austria, some ninety in number. In Budapest a committee of prominent Catholics was formed, and under its auspices a central distributing bureau was established in that city for the Hungarian press, which was turned over to the control of the "Juta" stock company, those who advanced funds for the enterprise taking as compensation a corresponding amount of stock. The bureaus in Vienna and Budapest, as well as those in Rome, Zurich, Munich, Berlin, Cologne, Paris, and the central bureau in Milan, have been furnished with the most modern appliances, and the direction of each is in the hands of a capable and experienced journalist.

Work began promptly on May 1, as planned, and "Juta" dispatches are already a common feature in a considerable portion of the press of Central Europe. Already one bit of "fable" news has been exposed and refuted in its initial stage, the correction appearing in the papers printing "Juta" news simultaneously with the appearance of the story itself in other papers. The total number of papers subscribing has exceeded all the expectations of the promoters of the new enterprise, and they are not unnaturally sanguine of its future rapid development. But they manifest, on the other hand, no desire to force its growth. It is much more important that the agency acquire as soon as possible a reputation for reliability and promptness in service. When this is secured there will be no lack of patronage, as the "Juta" has and will have at its disposal sources of information enjoyed by no other existing bureau.

The incorporation of the stock company took place on May 6 in Zurich under Swiss laws. It is capitalized at 2,000,000 francs, 1,500,000 francs of which is already paid in. Dr. Geser-Rohner of Altstätten, St. Gall, Switzerland, has been chosen President, and the Vice-President, we are gratified to learn, is Mr. F. X. Weinschenk, of Bellevue, Iowa, U. S. A. Dr. Lamprecht of Fribourg University, Switzerland, is Secretary. The Board of Directors will consist of the officers, ex-officio, and thirty-three members chosen from the stockholders. It is greatly desired by the promoters that this board be as international in its composition as possible. At present there are 4,000 shares of stock at 500 francs ($100.00) each. The 1,000 shares as yet unsubscribed will, it is hoped, be rapidly disposed of in various foreign countries. It may be remarked here that all possible legal safeguards have been provided so as to insure in perpetuity the international and independent character of the agency.

Great enthusiasm has been aroused by the announcement of the foundation of the "Juta" in both Belgium and England also, and we may confidently look forward to an extension of the service to these countries in the near future. But the eyes of all interested in the scheme are turned towards the United States, where it is felt there is a field open unexcelled in any other portion of the civilized globe. The writer has been assured through several communications that the plan of the undertaking has attracted not a little attention there. It would seem that a national service would have to be organized for the United States similar to that in Austria and Hungary. Perhaps the mode of procedure of the Budapest committee, or some modification of it, might be followed.

Word has just been received from Switzerland that a descriptive brochure is in preparation, which will be printed in German, French, English, Spanish and Italian, and will contain all necessary information. Those interested may apply to the President, Dr. A. Geser-Rohner, Altstätten, St. Gallen, Switzerland, for the brochure, or for any other desired details. Letters may be addressed to him in any of the languages mentioned. M. J. A.

Normandy's Thousand Years

Gauls and Britons, conquered by Rome, saw their countries incorporated into the Empire. From the Empire both received civilization and Christian faith; and at its fall each was invaded by tribes from the lands to the north of the Meuse. But here the similarity ends. Christianity and civilization had struck deep roots in Gaul, which, losing its Roman masters, did not lose touch with the world they had created; and when the Franks came in, though the material victory was with the conquerors, the moral triumph was with the conquered. These assimilated the barbarians, made them Christians, made them, in the western branch at least, French. In Britain, on the contrary, Roman civilization, always more or less exotic, was trampled to death by Angle, Saxon and Jute; and Christianity was driven into the western mountains. The invaders kept their heathenism long, and were converted at last by missionaries from abroad: they kept their barbarism still longer.

This contrast appears again in the history of the Northmen in each country. Wherever the Danes established themselves in England, the country became Danish, as the nomenclature, still surviving, shows. The Normans took possession of the Lower Seine, only to receive the same benefits as the Franks. Just a thousand years ago the pagan Rolf the Ganger knelt at the feet of Françon, the Bishop, and Charles, the King, to arise the Christian Robert, Duke of Normandy; and when the century had run barely half its course idolatry and barbarism were extinct among his people.

French in much, yet tempering their new character with the strength of the North, the Normans were an eminently warlike race. Their leaders, necessarily brave, showed not unfrequently high military science. Yet underneath was something of the old Berserker, and the coolest broke at times into frenzy. They were a religious people. Religion influenced their whole lives. Prayer and Mass began the day, and the divine office was their delight. Magnificent in their zeal for the beauty of God's house, princes and nobles vied with one another in founding churches and monasteries for the splendid celebration of worship. How thoroughly devoted they were to the Holy See, the history of Robert Guiscard and the Normans of the Two Sicilies proves plainly. But for all this they were revengeful and haughty, to traitors they were merciless, and the stain of blood marks too often their annals. A typical Norman for his great faults and still greater virtues was the greatest Norman of all, William the Conqueror, who freed England from the debasing Danish supremacy for which Harold and all the wicked House of Godwin stood, who, with the Pope's Legate, drove from the sanctuary the sacrilegious Stigands and Sparhavocs, apparently, like Harold, Danes in name and blood, brought in Lanfranc from abroad, prepared the way for Anselm, confirmed at home such men as Wulfstan, and voluntarily renounced his predecessors' usurpations over things spiritual, setting up ecclesiastical courts according to canon law; yet who in the popular mind is the embodiment of tyranny. The making of the New Forest, the desolating of the North are what people remember him by, making little account of the provocation when, after two years of mild rule, according to the laws and customs of King Edward, he saw men who had sworn fealty to him welcoming the Danish invader. They know how he met his death in the fierce revenge he took for the French King's unseemly jest; they do not care to know how he died devoutly, charging his successor to repair his injustices, and passed away in tenderest piety and humblest contrition with the Holy Names upon his lips.

The kings of England held Normandy until John forfeited it by the murder of Arthur, the rightful heir. It was reoccupied by Edward III, Henry V and Henry VI, suffering greatly during the Hundred Years' War. Then the English were expelled for the last time, and the Duchy was attached to the French crown. From time to time its was granted to princes of the blood, the last Duke of Normandy being the hapless son of Louis XVI. The Revolution broke up old provincial France into departments, and Normandy is now little more than a remembrance of a name. But the old spirit is not extinct, a solid seriousness tempering the lightness of the purely French character; and so with the Bretons on one side of them and the Picards on the other, the Normans are preeminent in the France of these evil days in clinging to the faith of their fathers, and are celebrating religiously in Rouen, the thousandth anniversary of the baptism of the great Viking.

Norman Italy disappeared long ago, for the Two Sicilies had to pass through many vicissitudes of Suabian, Angevin, Aragonese and Bourbon rule. On this side of the Atlantic we have still something of the old Normandy. Acadia and Canada were peopled in greater part by Normans, who lived in their quiet farms untouched by the Revolution, preserving their manners and customs to our day. In the rural districts of the Lower St. Lawrence one may still breathe the old religious Norman atmosphere. Alas, that enemies without and traitors within are conspiring too successfully to destroy it!

There is another survival of Normandy, more perfect from the political point of view than any other. The English kings called themselves Kings of France to the beginning of the last century; they have long forgotten that they were ever Dukes of Normandy. The former, they never really were; and the title was a bare fiction after their expulsion in the fifteenth century. The latter they are to-day in the Channel Islands, a remnant of the old Duchy. There continue many vestiges of the old Norman constitution. The estates in the ancient French sense, quite different from the English idea of parliament, are not altogether dead. The cry of Haro, embodying, not improbably, the name of the duke of a thousand years ago, is still raised by those appealing concerning disputed land titles to a higher court, as it was raised against the very corpse of the great Conqueror. But the English connexion has brought about the sad result that there the Norman faith is absolutely dead, and people of Norman name not unfamiliar with Norman speech are as utterly Protestant as the men of Cornwall, Wales and Scotland.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Somebody with a fondness for romancing has said that the epithet gringo, applied contemptuously to Americans by the Mexicans, owes its origin to a song which the Mexicans heard from the American soldiers during the Mexican war; but this is manifestly incorrect, for the word was used in Mexico as far back as the reign of Carlos III, towards the end of the eighteenth century. When his Catholic Majesty determined to expel the Jesuits from his dominions, he was somewhat uneasy about what the regular troops, then in New Spain, might do on receipt of the royal order; he therefore took the precaution to send over some troops from the Low Countries, in whom he put more trust. These troops, as Alegre tells us in his "History of New Spain," were called "gringos," probably on account of their slight knowledge of Spanish. This opinion is borne out by a writer in La Revista Católica, of Santiago, Chile, who has been studying the local peculiarities of Spanish words and phrases. He tells us that the word gringo has long been used in Spanish as a synonym of griego, or Greek. To speak in gringo, therefore, was to speak Greek, that is, to speak a language that could not be understood. He adds that the word is used in Catalan in the same sense, and that in the Valencian dialect, gring means any language which is not understood, or is hard to understand. The word, therefore, is not a corruption of "green grow," as has been asserted, nor is it confined to the New World.

IN MISSION FIELDS

THE MADURA MISSION.

The most southerly diocese on the Coromandel or eastern coast of India, this mission extends from Cape Comorin to the Cauvery River and to the great pagan city of Trichinopoly, the headquarters of the mission. On the west it is bounded by the lofty Travancore Mountains. Its area is a little over 17,000 square miles, with a total population of, roughly speaking, 5,500,000, distributed through 2,620 towns and villages. The great majority are worshipers of the Hindu pantheon and pandemonium; 300,000 are Mohammedans, 100,000 are Protestants, and 250,000 are Catholics.

The Catholic mission dates from the sixteenth century and boasts no less a founder than St. Francis Xavier himself, who, in 1542, rekindled the faith of the Paravas or Fisherman caste, and with the help of the Portuguese government of the time, organized them into an important Christian community, with regular revenues, parishes and schools. Still extant, it musters some 30,000 Catholics, whose vigorous faith and loyal attachment to the Church bear splendid testimony to Xavier's labors and zeal, and to the blood shed in their land by the first martyr of the Society of Jesus, Father Crimalle. Tuticorin, Manapad, Punikael, etc., from which St. Francis dated many of his letters, are now, as then, important Christian centres, and preserve many old traditions and several monuments, churches and shrines built by the Apostle himself.

He also made an attempt at evangelization inland, but without success; and it was only fifty years later that Father Robert de Nobili, the famous Brahman missionary, founded the inland Madura mission (1606), which, up to the suppression of the Jesuits, was quite distinct from the Paravar coast district. Father de Nobili's original plan, to win over the highest caste by making himself one of them and appearing as a Roman Brahman, was a failure so far as the upper caste was concerned, but proved the beginning of a marked step towards conversion among the lower classes, which made the Madura mission one of the most important Jesuit missions in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. From the time missionaries exchanged the black soutane of the Portuguese ecclesiastics for the flowing robes of the Indian Sanyassis or Penitents, and thus escaped the opprobrium attached to the unclean, beef-eating and wine-drinking foreigner, the work of evangelization became easy. After thirty-five years of slow progress—only 500 had been converted in 1640—the movement went by leaps and bounds. The census of 1680 reported 80,000 neophytes—a vast number considering the scarcity of missionaries, a mere handful of six or seven, but heroes, like the martyr Blessed John de Britto. In 1750, after a century, the figures had risen to something like 270,000. Unfortunately, a great catastrophe was near at hand, in which the prosperous mission, with its magnificent organization, was well nigh swept off: the suppression of the Jesuit Order, followed two decades after by the French Revolution. As the last missionaries of the Society died one after another, there was nobody to take their place except a few ignorant and greedy native priests. What with wars and persecutions—Tippu-Sahib, the Tiger of Mysore's fanaticism is sufficiently known—only 65,000 to 70,000 Catholics remained in 1815—and what Catholics! Moved by this pitiable state of things, Gregory XVI restored the Madura Mission to its former pastors, the Jesuits. In 1837 four French Jesuits landed in Pondicherry to build up the Mission from its ruins. They had to contend against all kinds of difficulties: the hostility of the East India Company, the bitter rivalry of Protestants, who had long been established in South India, the obstinate resistance of schismatic native priests to the orders of Propaganda, and the torpor of the Christians themselves, so long left to their own guidance.

Little by little the work of reorganization went on steadily, in spite of the many gaps made by cholera or sunstroke in the small band of missionaries. In 1901, after a lapse of sixty-three years, the census reported 207,003 Catholics (to these should be added some 50,000 more, whom Leo XIII's Concordat with Portugal took from the Madura Mission to join to the Portuguese diocese of Meliapur, near Madras). The latest statistics now show that the Catholics number over a quarter of a million. The old days of prosperity have returned, and the organization has been completely remodeled and put on a firm basis. Religious instruction is now regularly imparted to 13,000 children in 260 primary schools, unfortunately still far too few for such a vast population. Industrial schools have also been started in the various centres, while a training or normal school provides the Mission with a constant supply of able Catholic teachers and catechists. Large orphan asylums, houses of refuge, and dispensaries play a great part in reclaiming souls from paganism. Two prosperous congregations of native nuns and two more of European nuns are rendering invaluable service by using their great influence in schools and dispensaries to win over the female part of the population, the last stronghold of Hinduism.

Nor is Higher Education, now of such vital importance to India, neglected. The Mission counts four high schools very largely attended, and in Trichinopoly an immense college and high school combined, one of the largest educational institutions in the Madras Presidency, as it numbers some 1,800 students, who there prepare themselves for university degrees from matriculation to M.A.

But this wonderful extension of the Catholic Faith and institutions creates also a more crying need of men and of pecuniary resources. With its 130 priests—twenty are of the native secular clergy—the Mission can hardly cope with the work undertaken. Leaving out those engaged in educational establishments, there remains a bare hundred priests to minister to the spiritual needs of a quarter of a million of Catholics scattered over a diocese of 17,000 square miles. These needs may be gauged somewhat by the number of Communion distributed last year (1910), namely, over a million and a half; that is, an average of eight Communion for every Catholic of the proper age to receive the Holy Eucharist.

And yet, though the number of missionaries bears no adequate proportion to the needs of the Catholics, the work of conversion and evangelization would require as many more. Thousands of pagans are asking for admittance into the Church, and must, alas! be put off to more favorable times, when it shall please the Lord to send more laborers to this vineyard. In the meanwhile good opportunities are lost, and Protestants or Moslems are not slow to avail themselves of our insufficiency to cope with the demand.

CORRESPONDENCE

No Fears for the Health of the Pope

ROME, May 21, 1911.

The Holy Father has been constrained again to suspend all public audiences, owing to rheumatic trouble in his knee. Privately, however, he received Bishop Carroll, of Helena, Mont., on Tuesday; the representatives of the Catholic Press Association of Belgium, headed by its president, Albert de Moor, on Saturday; and, in between, a host of little children who had just made their first Communion. There are no fears for the general health of His Holiness, although a wag of a monsignore has confessed to a fear of the end of the world, owing to the dying off of so many cardinals and the appointment of no new ones, anticipating that there will be none left to elect a Sovereign Pontiff; he reassures himself, however, from the fact that the Holy Father has not ceased to appoint new bishops.

This week he has daily received in audience the cardinal secretaries of the different congregations on business of routine, has dispatched through Cardinal Merry del Val a letter of instruction to Catholics in Spain to stand together on matters of vital importance to their faith and religion, while preserving their entire independence in matters of party politics not so involved, and is preparing an encyclical letter to the Catholics of Portugal in the sore trial through which they are passing. He has received now and again visitors in private audience, among others Cardinal Arcoverde, the Archbishop of Rio Janeiro, and Mgr. McDonough, the Vicar-General of the diocese of Portland, Me.

The anti-clerical attacks upon the loyalty of Italian Catholics have been met by a reiteration of their position. "The Catholics of Italy," it is authoritatively declared, "do not reject the national unity of their country; they do not calumniate it; they shrink from seeing it in danger and are ready to defend it; they desire only that with the national unity and independence of the country shall be joined the liberty and actual independence of the Church and of the Holy Father." Meantime they are agitating against the present school law, which menaces freedom of teaching and the indefeasible right of the parent to educate the child. They have also had occasion to protest against the exclusion of Catholic representation on the Council of Labor. This Council is in charge of a governmental bureau of labor in the Department of Agriculture, and is made up of members elected to represent the different labor organizations. The Catholics refuse to foregather with the Socialists in these organizations, because of radical differences in principle: they have formed their own independent bodies, which in many cases are of larger membership than the others; yet so far representation on the Council has been conceded only to the Socialist organizations.

The Italian Parliament is wrestling with the year's budget, and its discussion has opened the way for anti-clerical declarations on the part of the new ministers, Nitti and Finocchiaro. The former has resisted the entry of Catholics to the Council of Labor on the speciously insinuating ground that their admission would open the way to representation to organizations hostile to the integrity and purpose of the State. A mass meeting of protest has been held by Catholic workmen at Milan, the industrial centre of Italy. Finocchiaro announces his belief in the necessity of divorce and proposes legal provision for the same, and while admitting the autonomy of Catholic seminaries in their teaching of purely religious subjects, protests against their extension of curriculum to anything beyond that, and insists that they shall be brought under the execution of the general education laws, especially in matters of morals and hygiene. He also protests against the rehabilitation of the patrimony of suppressed religious corporations by means of legal fictions already condemned, and insists that in the case of bequests made to them by the intermediation of a third party legal action for their nullity lies, not only with the heirs-at-law, but also, owing to infraction of existing laws, with the State.

This is, of course, to prevent religious receiving pecuniary benefits with the consent of the heirs-at-law, and holding property for use with the title in the hands of lay proprietors, foreign or domestic. This is ominous of another raid for plunder on religious houses, for which many of the religious have been preparing themselves by disposing of all property in Italy. Incidentally, the ex-priest member of Parliament proposed a government pension for all suspended priests, a proposal which was received in the House with the jeering cry of "Cicero pro domo sua!"

Another zealous anti-clerical proposed government interference in the guardianship of the archives of religious houses, no longer safe in the care of the religious; and though an indignant member protested that the monks had guarded these treasures safely for centuries, he forgot to add that when the government took to looting most of the monasteries of Italy it left MSS. and folios heaped in huge disorder on the lower floors of the former Roman College, in charge of a drunken porter, who was discovered in 1880 to have been long selling them for paper-waste to keep himself supplied with drink. It was only when a poor scholar found an autograph letter of Christopher Columbus, given him as wrapping for a small purchase of butter in the Piazza Navona, that an uproar was made and an investigation followed.

Podrecca, the editor of l'Asino, insisted in the House that the sacrilegious robbing of church tabernacles was the work of the priests themselves, who left copies of the Asino after them to besmirch the fair fame of that sheet: a declaration received with mocking laughter and many exclamations that Podrecca's readers were the culprits.

There was one strong speech by a member this week against the enormous public expenditures for the army, ever on the increase, while civilized nations the world over were endeavoring to curtail military expense. There was protest also against the carabinieri doing the police work of Italy. The government was charged with weakness, in having the Tramway Company yield to the absurd demands of their striking employees; yet on the other hand the government was promptly strong in putting a company of the engineer corps to work on the Monument of Vittore Emmanuele, in place of the striking masons, an action which brought the strike incontinently to an end. There has been strength also in limiting public meetings at Marino, where the Socialists are particularly dominant and violent.

The educational budget is before Parliament, and the debate has brought out the intent of the government to kill off private schools and absorb the education of the young into its own hands.

The anti-clericals have a new scheme, to wit, to induce all their sympathisers to register in the census as freethinkers, and so cut off from the number of those credited to Christianity all those who have been baptized and are recusant to their faith. A boycott is advocated in l'Asino by all loyal Asinites against the book-stalls and news-stands which, in deference to a sense of decency, or by admonition of those who have right to admonish, no longer expose this exponent of anti-clerical venom for sale.

The Congregation of the Index has prohibited the last novel of the late Antonio Fogazzaro, entitled "Leila." This book was written by its author with the express purpose of showing his rejection of the Modernist ideas, for which his "Il Santo" had been condemned: his want of success goes to show that mistakes of the head are not always corrected by a change of heart.

The Congregation has also "Indexed" the posthumous Commentary on the Psalms of John Conrad Zenner, S.J., edited by Herman Wiesmann, S.J. The present head of the Congregation is Cardinal della Volpe, who has replaced the late Cardinal Segna.

The "San Sebastiano" of D'Annunzio has had its echo in Rome. An ex-priest of Florence, one Salvatore Minocchi, has come out in La Tribuna, a newspaper of Rome, with an article maintaining that Saint Sebastian never existed. This has provoked a learned reply from Orazio Marucchi, at present recognized as the leading archeologist of Rome, in which he exhaustively proves from unquestioned sources the authenticity of the accepted life and martyrdom of the soldier saint.

The personnel of the Papal Mission to the coronation of George V, of England, has just been announced. It will consist of Mgr. Pignatelli di Belmonte, Archbishop of Odessa, as ambassador extraordinary; Mgr. Pacelli, the new Under-Secretary of State; Count Medolago Albani, President of the Social Economic Union of Rome, and Count Francesco Bezzi, member of the Noble Guard.

During the week the special commission from Spain arrived, under General Primo De Rivera, to present Spain's felicitations on the Unity celebration and incidentally to deliver to King Victor Emmanuel the commission as honorary colonel of the Spanish Infantry regiment of Savoy, which King Alphonso has just conferred upon him, thus reminding all Italy that Victor is no Italian at all, but a Savoyard. Later the Dutch commission from Queen Wilhemina, under Baron Van Grovestins arrived, on a like errand of congratulation. Neither arrival caused the slightest ripple in the city, already tired of the pretentious but abortive Exposition. Next week the Duke d'Abruzzi is to be made a vice-admiral, in command of a new division of the Italian Navy.

The necrology of the week includes the name of Mgr. Francesco Bertaccini, for many years the prefect of schools in the Seminario Romano.

Some Greek princes came to town during the week, but whether accredited to congratulate the government on the Exposition it is not easy to say, as no great stir has been made over them. I fancy that United Italy looks down on Greece as a decadent nation. C. M.

Portuguese Republicanism

LISBON, PORTUGAL, May 18, 1911.

In the name of liberty we are cut off from the rest of the world, for the so-called Republicans who misgovern us interfere with the telegraph, with the mail, and even with the telephone service, for the purpose of keeping inside Portugal whatever it suits their interests not to let out. But I am satisfied that not even the bloodhounds of Lisbon will be able to prevent me from laying before the readers of AMERICA a few interesting facts about public affairs as they are; for, if the truth must be told, we have been reduced to a shameful condition by the cunning of a handful of knaves. If our five million inhabitants have not become five million old women, I don't see how the present condition can last.

One of the schemes evolved by the revolutionists is that of bringing strangers to Portugal, who may certify to the public peace and tranquillity that hold sway under Braga. This is not a difficult matter if care be exercised in selecting the visitors. Such has been the case with the recent Globetrotters' Congress, the result of which did not quite correspond to the expectations of those who brought it about. In the first place, very few attended, and they, with rare exceptions, were persons of no social importance. The festivities in connection with the Congress were poor affairs, which the unfavorable weather made even poorer. A resolution, however, which the Congress adopted was not without its significance.

It was to the effect that a Franco-Hispano-Portuguese Federation should be formed, with a permanent central office; each of the three countries, moreover, should have its national committee dependent upon a central executive committee, with offices in Madrid, the geographical centre of the proposed Federation. All this would be harmless enough if there were question of nothing but tours and excursions; but it takes on another appearance when one reflects that in the innocent guise of headquarters and information bureau for tourists there may be maintained an office for active revolutionary propaganda. Color is given to this ominous surmise by a study of the more or less prominent Spaniards who have been journeying back and forth between Lisbon and Madrid. Spanish politicians of a certain type, for example, have been visiting us with suspicious frequency. One of these, a notorious anti-clerical follower of Canalejas, gave out an interview while here, and volunteered the information that the Associations Law of Canalejas is an anti-clerical and Republican measure. A few days after his visit there was formed in Lisbon a "Young Spain Republican Club," which proposes to establish a Ferrer school and a committee to travel through Spain and deliver lectures, the object of which is to stir up such a revolution as Portugal has just enjoyed.

Provisional President Braga has come out strongly in favor of an Iberian Confederation, for he says that the peninsula is like a lyre in which all the strings help in bringing out harmonious sounds. As the strings must be in tune, so must Spain and Portugal harmonize if the best results are to be expected. Spain must pass through a violent political and social revolution, he says, after which will come the Iberian Confederation.

The Separation Law has been very properly qualified by the Cologne Gazette as "monstrous," and this widely read newspaper is so far from being "clerical" that it has more than once advocated measures against the Catholic Church; but in the present case it asserts that Catholics would be justified in making diplomatic representations to the European powers.

The helplessness of the administration was well illustrated recently in the city of Braga, where certain buildings and private houses were illuminated in honor of the Sacred Heart. The rabble organized a demonstration and stoned the seminary and the College of San Antonio, as well as the buildings which were illuminated. They then broke into the club room of the "Christian Democracy" and destroyed the furniture and fixtures.

A prominent member of the Carbonari, one Manuel Lorenzo Godinho, who was concerned with the murder of King Carlos, was recently detained by the police of the Spanish town of Santiago in Galicia, whither he had gone, it is supposed, to do away with the Count of Bertiandos and other Portuguese notables who had taken refuge there. Giving the name of Anthony Francis, and calling himself an Englishman, Godinho secured a room on the floor where the count was lodged; but his suspicious actions caused him to be seized and searched by the police. Two daggers and some compromising documents were found on his person.

I. BLANCO Y P. DE CAMINO.

Exciting Times in Mexico

A personal letter just received from San Luis Potosí gives a graphic description of some of the scenes witnessed in the recent uprisings in Northern Mexico and will be read with interest. What is purely personal has been omitted.

SAN LUIS POTOSI, May 27, 1911.

These are exciting times here. . . . The revolution has certainly raised Cain with us. . . . Almost everything is at a standstill, except the rebels and the bandits, and no business of any magnitude is being transacted.

I went to Mexico City a few days ago, and as the station a few miles ahead of us had been captured by about 200 rebels (or bandits, as they in most cases should be called), all the passengers were advised by the conductor to conceal our money and valuables and get ready to look pleasant into the mouth of a cannon. We concealed our money, watches, etc., in cuspidors and about our underclothing. I had but little money, and then, I was called upon to help others. An old Dutchman, very fat, had about $1,500 in bills, and after I took his outer shirt off and pinned the bills on an inner one, and other parts of his garments, he looked something like an ancient cartoon of Mark Hanna.

Well, it was really a shame, for after all our preparations these bandits rode away and didn't even fire a shot at us. We saw them disappearing over a ridge as the train drew into the station. Before we got to the city we had time to remove most of the pins and fish our watches, etc., out of the cuspidors.

In the city we found everything comparatively quiet; but for the last few days there has been much rioting and plundering, and many persons were killed. Great plate glass windows in most of the big stores were broken to pieces, and in most cases the goods have been either wantonly destroyed or carried off by the mob. President Diaz resigned yesterday and, report says, has fled the country, and De La Barra, the president pro tem., has been installed in his stead.

Many people think we shall never have "sweet peas," but, as the Mexican says, quien sabe? You must know that as many as 50,000 prisoners have been liberated from the jails and prisons, and as a very large per cent. of the poor peon population are criminally inclined, most people here think it will be many months before a real tranquil condition will be brought about. Bandits are being shot down almost daily without trial, but as there are so many of them we are afraid there won't be enough bullets to go around.

On my return from the city our train was held up, but not robbed (that was last Saturday), and we had to come in by a roundabout way over another road. Yesterday, or, rather, the day before, the excitement reached a culmination here in San Luis Potosí. The night train brought in about twenty-five rebels from the rebel army, who demanded the surrender of the city. Our Governor and safe politics told them that if they did not loot and destroy property, etc., the city would surrender, as a large force was waiting outside. The authorities thought it would be jeopardizing many lives to resist. Accordingly, the rebel force of several hundred men arrived at 3:30 p. m. Great excitement prevailed; a big mob marched through the streets, shouting "Viva Madero," breaking windows and demolishing parks, etc. In the large alameda or park in front of our hotel most of the beautiful plants and flowers were destroyed or carried off and sold. Several persons were shot during the afternoon, and the police ordered everybody off the streets. Last night there was much trouble and, as near as we can find out, twenty were killed and a great many wounded. The leader of a company of rebels was literally filled full of bullets in the plaza because he insisted on liberating some prisoners and was inciting the mob to violence. I just came from the spot where he was killed. His body was left lying there on the street all night, a ghastly sight, and great blotches of blood were to be seen all over the plaza, where others had been shot or wounded.

The merchants are combining this morning to protect their property, as more rebels are coming this evening, and much more trouble is expected. We Americans are keeping off the street and only a few are mixing with the rebels here. Most of the Americans and foreigners are leaving the country as fast as they can. We expect to leave here within the next ten days for San Antonio, Texas.

The "Four Nation Loan" to China

SHANGHAI, MAY 15, 1911.

The loan agreement between the syndicate representing the United States, Great Britain, Germany and France on the one hand, and the Chinese Government on the other, was signed in Peking on April 15. Negotiations for this purpose began about six months ago and were finally brought to a close on the above mentioned date. When we consider that till recently China was averse to foreign loans, and that at present there is immense opposition to such a step from the Provincial Assemblies and other public bodies, the Syndicate must be congratulated on having so expeditiously brought the matter to a successful issue.

The Agreement was signed by Duke Tsia-tse, President of the Ministry of Finance, acting under Imperial sanction, and by Messrs. Straight, Hillier, Cordes and Caseneuve for the banks of the "Four Nations." The amount of the loan is £10,000,000 ($50,000,000 gold). The issue price will be 95, and the rate of interest 5 per cent. This shall be paid to the bondholders in half-yearly instalments. The term of the loan is forty-five years. Repayment of principal shall commence after ten years. It may be redeemed wholly or in part after fifteen years, and if fully paid up before a lapse of twenty years, China will add 2½ per cent. on every £100 bond. After twenty years have elapsed, payment may be made without any premium. The Banks' commission is £1 on every £1,000, or a total of £10,000. The sum of £1,000,000 sterling will be advanced on May 15, with interest at 6 per cent., and a similar amount about the month of October.

The purpose of the loan is principally to help carry out the silver currency scheme of the country, and impart to it that uniformity and stability which will protect the people from the endless variations of exchange, hinder the abuses and failures of native banks and give assurance to international trade. It has already been stated in AMERICA (March 4, 1911) how the Government inaugurated in 1910 a currency scheme with the silver dollar as the standard unit, but the silver available was insufficient to launch the new currency on the country, hence the scheme miscarried. In ordinary circumstances, the government purchases an initial limited quantity of silver for immediate use, and then the old coins are called in. China totally ignored this elementary principle of sound finance. It may now be expected that, with the help of the new loan, the errors of the past will be corrected, and that the present year will see the new currency established in every province of the Empire.

Another part of the loan, 30 per cent., will be employed in developing industries and manufactures in the three provinces of Manchuria. What these enterprises are is not stated in the agreement, but very likely they will extend to such pursuits as agriculture and husbandry, cattle and horse-rearing, fisheries, flour mills, millet distilleries, tobacco planting, silk manufacture, bean oil, paper, matches and other articles wherewith Japan floods the market, and will soon monopolize it unless China stirs herself up and protects her own interests.

The securities mortgaged by the Ministry of Finance are the following: First, the duties on tobacco and spirits in Manchuria, amounting to one million taels per annum. Second, the produce and consumption duties of the same country, value one and a half million taels. Third, a new surtax on salt throughout the Empire, producing a sum of two and a half million taels, or an aggregate of 5,000,000 taels. These revenues are expected to meet the payment of interest and principle. If found insufficient, then the Imperial Government will designate other revenues, and if after a reasonable period there shall still be a deficiency, the aforesaid revenues will be entrusted to and administered by the Imperial Maritime Customs, in order to protect the interests of the bondholders.

M. KENNELLY, S.J.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; SECRETARY, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

By Fast Freight

An official notice has just been received from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that after the 1st of July all periodicals are to be forwarded to their destination, not as heretofore, by mail, but by fast freight. Thus AMERICA mailed at New York will take three days to reach Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Tennessee and Wisconsin. It will be four days before it arrives in Missouri and five in Minnesota, Nebraska, etc.

In consequence of this ruling it is evident that we must close our columns one day ahead of the usual time. This, however, will involve no change in our subject matter, nor will it affect even that section of our paper under the heading of Chronicle, which, it is unnecessary to remind our readers, was never intended to be a record synchronizing strictly with the most recent current events. Manifestly that would be an impossible achievement for any weekly publication. The Chronicle was never supposed to be anything else than a historical record of political, sociological, economic and religious occurrences, calculated to furnish material for reflection or comment, and possibly also useful for future reference. It is a study of the ever varying line of the lights and shadows of the world's progress. AMERICA is a Review and not a newspaper, and from the beginning it has deliberately left to the daily press the task of purveying items of news, which, as everyone is aware, are often discovered later on to have been only products of the imagination, if not the results of political or religious bias, or even deliberate misrepresentations of the truth. People who want to be sure are not usually in a hurry.

We trust, however, that notwithstanding the new arrangements of the Postal authorities, we shall before the end of each week be in communication even with those of our subscribers who live on the far-away Pacific Slope.

Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee

Tuesday, June 6, there was presented to certain intriguing and ambitious politicians in Europe an object lesson which must have caused them to gape with astonishment. Whilst these men, unfortunately leaders in lands where, theoretically at least, the Catholic Church is the Church of the people, are bringing into play every unfair means to thwart or to check the influence of the Church upon the national life, here with us a country-wide movement on that day culminated in a magnificent demonstration to honor Cardinal Gibbons. There was no attempt to conceal the purpose of the vast gathering crowded into the Fifth Regiment Armory in Baltimore. Men and women of that and other cities—Catholics and Protestants, high and low, rich and poor, men of power and place in the destinies of the nation, as well as the humblest of the nation's toilers thronged into the presence of the venerable Prince of the Catholic Church to demonstrate the veneration in which he is held as the greatest of our churchmen, and one of our greatest citizens. The President and Vice-President were there, our well-known ex-President, and the Chief of the nation's judiciary and Senators and Representatives in Congress and foreign diplomats, all eager to congratulate Baltimore's prelate on the golden jubilee of his priesthood, and to wish him added years in the peaceful enjoyment of the cherished place he has won in the affection of the people of the United States.

The gathering in the great Armory of Maryland's metropolis on June 6 was the result of no impulse of passing enthusiasm. It was an ovation springing spontaneously from a deep-seated regard which has been growing through many years. President Taft gave cordial expression to this thought when he said:

"This assembly, I venture to affirm, can find few counterparts in history. We come as American citizens to congratulate the American Primate of one the great Churches of the world upon the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ascension to the highest office in his Church but one, and upon the fiftieth anniversary of his entering the Church as one of its priests. We are not here as members of any denomination. We are not here in any official capacity. But we are here to recognize and honor his high virtue as a patriotic member of our political community, and one who, through his long and useful life, has spared no effort in the cause of good citizenship and the uplifting of his fellow-men."

Cardinal Gibbons has long been admitted to be a leading citizen of our republic. In the busy cares attending his exalted position he has found time to dwell upon the welfare of his country and its people, and he has never lacked the courage to point out, always wisely and prudently, the problems that must be solved, the perils that must be faced and overcome. In the years in which he has served his Church and his country so faithfully he has had ample opportunity to observe conditions as they really exist, and he has had the dangers that he says threaten our civilization brought home to him. When, therefore, the Prince of the Church speaks with a frankness that, to those who know him, shows his utterances to be born of mature and deep thinking, of dangers which strike at the root of the family and society among us, his words of warning, uttered in the very glow of the country-wide homage showered upon him, are surely deserving of the careful attention of everyone interested in this country's well-being and happiness.

Menaces to Our Civilization

Sitting in a big armchair in the cozy study of his residence on the eve of his jubilee day, Cardinal Gibbons talked to a representative of the Baltimore Sun of the evils that are to-day menacing the civilization of America. These are the greatest as he sees them: Mormonism and divorce; an imperfect and vicious system of education, which undermines the religion of our youth; the desecration of the Sunday, which tends to obliterate in our adult population the salutary fear of God and the homage that we owe him; the gross and systematic election frauds; the unreasonable delay in carrying into effect the sentences of our criminal courts, and the numerous subterfuges by which criminals evade the execution of the law.

In offering his tribute to the Cardinal in the presence of the Baltimore assembly, than which probably no more distinguished gathering was ever held in this country, outside of Washington, the Chief Magistrate of our Republic is reported to have said: "One of the tenets of his Church is the respect for constituted authority, and always we have found him on the side of law and order, always in favor of peace and good will to all men, always in favor of religious tolerance and always strong in the conviction that complete freedom in the matter of religion is the best condition under which churches may thrive." An admirable testimony, to be sure, to the fair-minded integrity of the man of whom it was spoken. In view of it, were it not well that those among us who, on the plea of liberty, proclaim the need of so-called unsectarianism in our public school system, should heed the wise comment of the Cardinal on the fallacy underlying their position? Speaking of our mutilated and defective school education, Cardinal Gibbons says:

"In this glorious country of ours the citizen happily enjoys the largest liberty, but the wider the liberty the more efficient should be the safeguards to prevent it from being abused and degenerating into license. The ship that is destined to sail on a rough sea and before strong winds should be well ballasted. To keep the social planet within its proper orbit the centripetal force of religion should counterbalance the centrifugal motion of free thought. The only effectual way to preserve the blessings of civil freedom within legitimate bounds is to inculcate in the mind of youth at school the virtues of truth, justice, honesty, temperance, self-denial and those other fundamental duties comprised in the Christian code of ethics.

"Granted that a mother has done her duty by the blessed influence of a home education and by a mother's tutelage, the child's training does not end with the mother, but it will be supplemented by a curriculum in other schools. And of what avail is a mother's toil if the seeds of faith that she has planted attain a sickly growth in the cheerless atmosphere of a school-room, from which the sun of religion is rigidly excluded?"

What the Maderists Feared

Now that the main point has been gained and the Diaz dictatorship has been brought to an inglorious finish, though the independent revolutionary movement in Lower California is still active, and some patriotic leaders in the southern part of the republic are still to be conciliated, the Maderists are so satisfied with their success, that some of them, as if breathing freely after the desperate struggle, have begun to take the outside world into their confidence. Madero, naturally, was sanguine of success; but Doctor Vázquez Gómez, his confidential agent at Washington, had many an uneasy moment, for the United States authorities looked upon the revolution as an attempt to overthrow by violence a strong and popular administration.

Francisco Vázquez Gómez is a medical practitioner, and he was engaged in the practice of his profession up to the moment when he started for Washington. He was on friendly terms with both Diaz and Corral, and used his friendship to dissuade them from completely crushing public spirit and riding roughshod over public opinion. His failure with them threw him into the Maderist camp. His sympathies are naturally with the poor, for it was only by heroic exertions that he rose from the poverty of his home surroundings, made his medical course, and won for himself an honored position among the medical men of Mexico. Abandoning a lucrative practice, he betook himself to Washington, where he devoted himself to a threefold task, namely, to prevent armed intervention on the part of the United States, even to prevent the Washington authorities from dictating how the trouble should be settled, and, finally, to prevent anarchy in Mexico. These three objects he feels that he has accomplished. As Minister of Public Instruction in the Cabinet of President de la Barra, he is out of politics, but not out of public life.

Taking up the rumor that the revolution was made a success by means of American gold, he says most emphatically that the cash outlay made to effect the overthrow of the Diaz administration amounted to only six hundred thousand Mexican pesos, equivalent to $300,000 United States gold, and that the whole amount was from Mexican sources. Truly, the Diaz dictatorship must have been ready to fall, almost of its own weight.

The United States did not intervene, did not impose peace conditions; thus far, Vázquez Gómez succeeded. Is his country beyond the danger of anarchy? We should like to believe that the seething is about to subside, and that an era of constitutional rule is about to dawn; but patriotism, in a Mexican, is too often allegiance to an individual, not to a system of government. A petty military makeweight may dispel all the roseate dreams of reform and liberty and popular government, and keep the country in a ferment. We hope none such will appear on the scene.

Books by Catholic Authors

The latest compilation of "Books by Catholic Authors" comes to us from the Carnegie Library at Pittsburgh. It is arranged in classified form and provided with an author index. The librarian and editor is to be praised for the effort he has made to satisfy Catholics in the preparation of this volume of 243 pages, which is handsomely printed and admirably arranged. He thanks the Rev. Thomas F. Coakley, D.D., for hearty cooperation and acknowledges advice received from several others, among them the editor of AMERICA; yet, with the diffidence of the experienced librarian, expresses the fear that errors will be found, both of exclusion and inclusion, begging the forbearance of critics and promising that notices of mistakes will be gratefully attended to in future editions.

Not having the complete catalogue of the library, we are in no position to note any omissions, but as the compilation will be widely circulated and may be used by others in the preparation of future catalogues, we deem it proper to call attention to some errors of inclusion which we thought we had noticed when we received the advance lists. Henry Charles Carey, the writer on sociology, was certainly not a Catholic, nor was Paul du Chaillu, though the latter is classed in nearly every compilation of this character as a Catholic author. Mrs. Mariana Van Rensselaer would be surprised to find herself listed among Catholic authors, and so, were he now among the living, would Henry Giles, the Unitarian minister of Quincy, Mass. It is regrettable that so much time and effort should be wasted on the compilation and publication of these catalogues, whose value to Catholics may be seriously questioned. Unfortunately, there have been books written by Catholics which it would be better to bury in oblivion. Even in the Pittsburgh list one of the most immoral dramas ever produced on the English stage is cited, though the author, first a Catholic, then a pervert, and again a Catholic, dedicates the work as a Protestant Play to a Protestant Patron.

Would it not be far more serviceable to prepare an annotated list of one hundred or five hundred books which Catholics should or might read with profit, not excluding some works which have been written by non-Catholics? It would be easy to see that all these books were placed on the shelves of every public library in the land. Catholic influence is everywhere strong enough to secure this.

A month ago we printed in pamphlet form a list of the Best Hundred Books in English, which appeared originally in the Catholic Times of Liverpool. In this issue there is a letter from a reader of AMERICA, who sent a copy of this pamphlet to his bookseller, who in turn forwarded it to the State Librarian at Harrisburg. The latter, on his own initiative, at once took pains to have all the Catholic books listed placed in the State Library. The introduction of these Catholic books into the Pennsylvania State Library suggests the ease with which they could be placed not only in State Libraries, but in every public library in the United States.

Illegal Weddings

Much loose talk is indulged in by men and women, who ought to know better, regarding what they presume to consider legislative interference of the Catholic Church with the proper freedom of individual action in regard to marriage. Catholics have but one answer to their thoughtless criticism, to use no stronger term. In the Christian dispensation Christ Our Lord has raised marriage to the dignity of a sacrament, and as a sacred thing it thus enters into the competency of the jurisdiction of Christ's Church. If the sanctity and indissolubility of marriage do not constitute a cardinal principle of the Christian religion we are at a loss to know what does. How can men and women call themselves Christian if they violate a fundamental law of Christianity? And, to emphasize the point, how lamentably is not the very existence of family life imperiled when such facts as that recorded in the following news despatch, coming from Chicago a few days ago, are possible:

"Municipal Judge Stewart to-day held that thousands of weddings of the immediate past were illegal and void because they had been performed by a Justice of the Peace from outside the city limits, in an office in Chicago. This Justice of the Peace was recently ousted from the County Building.

"The Judge volunteered an opinion from the bench that the Justice of the Peace had no legal right to marry anyone in Chicago, being a Justice from outside of Chicago, and because Justices were abolished in the city in 1905.

"At the same time Philip Fishmin was telling Judge Cooper how he was married without knowing it. He wanted the marriage dissolved. He said he inquired of a clerk in the County Clerk's office for a peddler's license. With him was a young woman. A slip of paper was handed him, he said, and they were taken to Justice Stacey's office. He told the court he thought he was swearing to something on the permit when he and the girl said the customary 'I do.' Later he found he had a wife."

The bare statements of such facts as these is a vindication, were one needed, of the Church's position.

God Have Mercy on Him

When the Servian Parliament passed a vote of sympathy on the occasion of the tragic death of the French Minister of War, M. Berteaux, the presiding officer arose in his seat and, while the whole assembly unanimously acclaimed his words, cried out in a loud voice: "God have mercy on him." Such was the message sent to Fallières to deliver to the French people.

Poor Berteaux needed God's mercy if ever a man did. Though naturally kind, he was a relentless enemy of Christ, and after the monster of the air had swooped down upon him, singling him out from all that vast multitude as its victim, he was buried, as he had lived, without a sign to lead one to hope for his salvation. He was typical of the Government of which he was the most conspicuous member; a Government that is stamped with God's reprobation. Even Jaurès, its principal sponsor, says of it: "The French Parliament, with its confusion of parties, its flippant and frivolous legislative schemes, its halting and hesitating majorities, its enormous but disordered and sterile absorption in political plots, its multiple and ever multiplying legislative projects, its interminable delays, which only emphasize the discords of both its houses, its budget six months in arrear, its countless questions coming up for parliamentary discussion, all of them banging at its doors and fighting with each other like a swarm of famished beggars, presents to the world a political mechanism that has gone wrong, that is out of joint, that is horribly overworked, and is every day giving proof that it is unfit to stand any further strain." It is a Babel, not of tongues, but of principles. It has neither religion, nor patriotism, nor justice, nor wisdom, nor common sense. Some unforeseen disaster may swoop down on it at any moment and repeat for the nation what the flying machine did for poor Berteaux. One may well echo the prayer of the Servian Parliament: "God have mercy on poor France," but like Macbeth gripping his bloody dagger the legislators cannot say "Amen."

Catholics and Protestant Hymns

A Catholic journalist, asked lately whether it is right for Catholics to sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" in church, answered that the hymn is in every respect Catholic, highly appropriate for certain occasions, and therefore to be used without scruple.

Every work has five causes, the material, the efficient, the formal, the final and the exemplary; and before one can call a hymn "in every respect Catholic" he must be sure that it is such with regard to all these. The material cause of a Catholic hymn is the hymn itself, inasmuch as it is capable of being accepted by competent authority for Catholic use. Despite a certain vagueness, "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" is probably Catholic materially. The efficient cause of a hymn is its composer.

Baring Gould, composer of this hymn, far from being a Catholic, is as bitter a hater of the Catholic Church as can be found amongst Anglicans, even Littledale not being excepted. The formal cause of a Catholic hymn, that which makes it really such, is the sanction of the Church. We do not think the Church has ever sanctioned "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" or any other Protestant composition. The final cause of a hymn is the purpose for which it is written. The purpose of "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" is to enliven the hearty services so dear to Anglicans and to serve their peculiar processions and recessions. For such a purpose it is admirable. To direct it to the expression of Catholic Faith and worship is evidently in the power only of the authority which might sanction it and has not done so. The exemplary cause is the model according to which a thing is fashioned. The Catholic journalist tries to show that for "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" this is made up of scraps of liturgical hymns, but only succeeds in pointing out a few verbal coincidences. One could prove just as conclusively that its exemplary cause is composed of bits of other Protestant hymns, as "The Son of God Goes Forth to War" and "Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun." Certainly, if Baring Gould had in mind—and this is essential to the exemplary cause—to imitate the liturgical hymns cited by the Catholic journalist, he made a great botch of his work. His hymn is typically Anglican, vague, and as far from the wholesome dogmatism of those concerning Our Lord's Passion and Resurrection as the North Pole is from the South. At most, then, the Catholic journalist has shown that "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" is materially Catholic; for us, it is clear, what is most important is that our hymns should be formally Catholic.

Once upon a time an "Anglican Sister" complained to a priest that a little Catholic child she had got hold of would not join in the prayers, and asked him to induce it to do so. "You know, we say just the same prayers as you." "Not at all," answered the priest. "Oh, yes, we do; we say the Our Father, the Hail Mary, the Creed, etc.," was the rejoinder. "But do you say them in union with the Pope?" asked the priest. When we can be sure that we can sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" in union with the Pope, either because he sings it himself or, at least, has given it his official sanction, we shall be ready to recognize it as equivalently "in every respect Catholic." There is too much singing of Protestant hymns amongst some Catholics.

—•••—
 "A perplexed layman of the Church of England" has written an open letter to the Bishop of London on the erection of stands for the viewing of the coronation procession, and their accompanying box-offices, in the precincts of London churches, expressing his fear lest this should fall under Our Lord's condemnation of the buyers and sellers and moneychangers who turned God's House of Prayer into a den of thieves. We don't know how the Bishop answered him, or whether he answered him at all. To refer him to II Kings, chap. xi (our IV Kings), might only add to his perplexity. The Bible, the sole rule of conduct, evidently is not without its difficulties; how much more, then, the Bible, the sole rule of faith?

LITERATURE

"Exscinding" Thomas à Kempis

Some years ago I noticed an attractive copy of the "Imitation of Christ" in a bookshop. The binding was firm, the print clear and artistic, the initial letters of each paragraph in warm color. In form and detail it was just the sort of book a reading man would have at his elbow or slip into his pocket for a journey.

It bore the imprint of Methuen & Co., London, 1896, and was prefaced by a long introduction by no less a writer than the late Dean Farrar. A new introduction to an old book is always interesting as a sort of involuntary autobiography on the part of the editor.

All at once a word loomed up on the page: "Romish." This was the sentence: "It [the 'Imitation'] has in it very little taint of Romish error, artificial theology or monkish superstition." Then came another illuminating sentence: "(If we excise half a dozen sentences) he scarcely writes a line which might not have been written by Melancthon, or by Baxter, or even by John Bunyan."

This seemed passing strange. I had been reading the "Imitation" for several years and had never noticed that Thomas à Kempis had anything in common with the three worthies so grotesquely assembled. "Excise." It is a pregnant word. It may mean so much and so little. There was a man who amended the Decalogue by excising the "not" in each Commandment. I sought for some explanation of the excision, and found in very small print at the bottom of a page this note: "These are mostly omitted in English editions, e.g., in Imit., i, 25; iii, 56; iv, 2, 5, 8, 9."

I purchased the book and devoted some time to comparing it with the authentic version in Latin and authorized English translations, with the result that the volume gradually took on the appearance of a section of the "Corpus Juris" with glosses.

The very first chapter was disquieting, with its "saints" presented as "holy men" and "favor" taking the place of "grace." Chapter xxiv rendered "imaginem Crucifixi" as "the remembrance of thy Saviour crucified." These were small matters, but to a Catholic reader they did not seem quite honest. I proceeded to find out what had been "excised," and was a bit surprised to see an important paragraph missing. Here it is:

"How do so many other religious do, who live under strict monastic discipline? They seldom go abroad; they live very retired; their diet is very poor; their habit coarse; they speak little; they watch long; they rise early; they spend much time in prayer; they read often and keep themselves in all discipline. Consider the Carthusians, the Cistercians and the monks and nuns of divers orders, how every night they rise to sing Psalms to the Lord. It would, therefore, be a shame to thee to be sluggish at so holy a time, when such multitude of religious begin with joy to give praise to God."

It became quite clear how Dean Farrar could state that the "Imitation" "has in it very little taint of monkish error." His edition had not, for he had made this certain by "ex-scinding" one of the finest eulogies of the religious life ever penned in a paragraph.

In chapter viii of the Fourth book the editor performed a major operation comparable to the work of Henry VIII with the Church in England. In place of the word "missa," which is capable of but one translation in English, Dean Farrar had unblushingly set down "Holy Communion."

When chapter xix of the Fourth book was reached I understood the reason for a statement in the introduction: "He has little to say of * * * masses for the dead." Here is the sentence "mostly omitted in English editions": "Who have desired and begged of me to offer up prayers and masses for themselves and all that belonged to them, whether they live as yet in the flesh or whether they are now departed out of the world."

These are submitted as characteristic specimens of the manner in which the Anglican editor had acquitted himself of his duties. He had also omitted several paragraphs in chapter v, Book IV, describing why the chasuble bears upon it on the obverse and reverse the sign of the cross.

There is honorable warfare, and there is also another kind, of which military men care little to speak. If a member of any sect feels impelled to write a book pointing out the alleged abuses of the Catholic Church, or supposed inconsistencies in her doctrine, and cites texts fairly and plainly, he is worthy of an honest reply. If a writer wishes to take a famous book and put out his own version of it, and sets down plainly the fact that he has made various alterations to suit his readers, we know at least what we have before us.

But the Dean of Westminster showed no signs of fair dealing or literary honesty. He entitled the mangled book "The Imitation of Christ." In the introduction he did his best to convince casual readers that Thomas à Kempis was a thoroughgoing Protestant ahead of his time. He made charges without proof and printed slurs that were uncalled for, and, not content with this, he deliberately removed essential portions of the book, and then made statements that would have been patent falsehoods had he not done so. What can we say of a writer who says that the author he treats of "says little of masses for the dead," and then removes the phrase in which the author speaks of masses for the dead; who avers that the "Imitation" "has little of monkish error" and "excises" the very paragraph in which the author lauds the life of monastery and convents? What literary honesty can we hope for from one who takes a Catholic book that has been a vade mecum for centuries, and substitutes the Anglican words "Holy Communion" for "Mass"?

We wonder at times whence our non-Catholic friends derive their fearful and wonderful ideas of the Church, why they insist on calumnies that are puerile and distortions that are patent. This book is an answer in part. Suppose one who is not generally a reader of religious books picked up this volume we are considering. He would indeed agree with the words of Dean Farrar in his egregious introduction, and, having read the version carefully, would honestly say to all and sundry that Thomas à Kempis was a crypto-Protestant.

There is no need to weary the reader with the pitiful and stealthy substitution that is evident on almost every page of this garbled "Imitation," the paring down and adding on of essential meanings that convert the work of the Catholic mystic into such a farrago as will recommend itself to Anglican readers. It is a sort of petty larceny.

The Latin ecclesiastical words of the Middle Ages had a defined and crystallized meaning, just as certain important words of Roman and English law have a precise meaning. Those key words formed the subject of numerous commentaries. To change their content is to disorganize the entire significance of any sentence in which they occur. "Mass" is not "Holy Communion," as the Anglicans would have it. They have defined in their formularies what they think of the Mass; that it is damnable and idolatrous. Yet this editor calmly makes the two synonymous. The word "religiosus" does not mean "a religious person" in ordinary English. It means "one of those men consecrated to God and living according to the rule so beautifully described in the "Imitation"; the men who were brutally despoiled and murdered by Henry VIII, men who were the rightful occupants of that Westminster of which Dr. Farrar called himself the dean. Such a method of procedure carried into law or government would be nothing less than anarchistic, yet by many it is deemed perfectly fair where the Catholic Church is concerned.

Moral: Beware of Catholic books edited by Protestant clerics.

C. W. COLLINS.

Religious Questions of the Day, or Some Modernistic Theories and Tendencies Exposed. By the Rt. Rev. ALEXANDER MACDONALD, D.D. Vol. III. New York: Christian Press Association Publishing Company. Price, $1.00 net.

These essays are intensely interesting. They are not formal or academic or distinguished by literary tone and self-consciousness; nor do they follow one another in the order of a preconceived plan. The selection of topics seems to have been determined by disconnected incidents in the world of Catholic thought, and consequently bear upon the surface few marks of any unity of design. Still there is a harmonizing element running through all these papers: the author has one purpose in view, arriving at it from every discussion as from a different angle of approach. He has a strong man's appreciation of the solid permanence of Catholic truth: he realizes the vigor and wide extent of the assaults being made upon it everywhere, and he is touched with something like indignation whenever he sees what appears to him to be carelessness, faintheartedness, ignorance, or cowardice in those who assemble to its defence. With a large fund of learning to draw from, he brings his resources to bear upon the point where the line seems to waver, and, without ceremony or periphrases, does what work the occasion seems to demand. There is a hint of bluntness in the author's manner, but no discourtesy.

Those readers who write to harassed Catholic editors, asking why they do not treat this question or that, not realizing the limitations of space and talent and opportunity at an editor's command, should purchase these volumes by the Bishop of Victoria. They are full of just the kind of information needed to answer misstatements about Catholic doctrine. The author writes to be understood: his learning is not on parade, and, like most learning employed usefully and with a serious and practical purpose, it makes attractive, never heavy, reading.

We need not say that we are in entire sympathy with the point of view which deprecates the bold pose in Catholic writings. One sometimes observes Catholics who, under the excuse of scholarship or culture, seem to take a keen pleasure in seeing how close they can sail to the wind without upsetting their little bark of faith. Their hardihood contains an implied boast of their own security which amounts almost to assurance. If they really uncovered buried facts and made solid contributions to the common fund of knowledge, there would be no question of blame or of danger; but, for the most part, their startling discoveries amount to no more than ingenious surmises or fanciful theories, more indicative of vanity than of any seriousness of purpose, and reflecting in a mild way the reckless and irresponsible abandon of the modern spirit.

This is the general object of some severe and frank criticism contained in these essays, and we are inclined to believe that the severity is, more often than not, most justifiable. We trust that it will not seem presumptuous to declare that, in the essay on God's foreknowledge, we are not in entire accord with the author. If we do not mistake his meaning, he teaches that God could not, in the nature of things, foresee how His free creatures would act until He had first willed to create them. The theory of the scientia media may leave many things unexplained as regards God's goodness and mercy; but to deny its main assumption, that God can see clearly how His creatures would act if He should will to create them, is only to substitute one difficulty for another and to ignore strong Scriptural confirmation.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Joan of Arc. By GRACE JAMES. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.50 net.

The title is only loosely significant of the contents, about three-fourths of which deal with anything and everything except the Maid of France. There are long disquisitions on mystics, visionaries, magicians, black and otherwise; irrelevant bulky citations from the journal of the Bourgeois of Paris, and a long chapter on a royal liaison which occurred long after the martyrdom at Rouen, and is introduced for no apparent purpose except to give to the narrative the piquancy of scandal. This latter is called "Amour de Grace"; it does not inspire respect for Grace James. The author, however, has a genuine admiration for the saintly heroine of France, and, when she returns from distant excursions to her ostensible subject, presents a sympathetic and a fairly accurate picture. "A Chapter on Religious Atmosphere" is admirably conceived, but, through ignorance of Catholic beliefs and instincts, it is inadequately and often ridiculously executed. The same applies to many of the numerous reflections and deductions with which the book is interlarded. We are told that the exorcisms at baptism are "twice as long for a girl as for a boy, for the Church distrusted woman's wiles"; that the Church "had to invent a new legend to meet every contingency"; that Jeanne "adored St. Michael", and that "it is easier for a camel to enter a needle's eye than for a saint to have a sense of humor." Jeanne is shown later to have this sense highly developed. There is much unconscious misinformation of this kind, which, with its marvelous mixture of history, gossip, and romance, gives a bizarre effect to the production. It is well written and handsomely produced, but it is not a life of Jeanne d'Arc.

M. K.

Heroes of Chivalry. By FRANCES NIMNO GREENE and DOLLY WILLIAMS KIRK. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 60 cents.

The heroes are Roland and Oliver, the Cid, Godfrey de Bouillon and Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and their heroism is described and illustrated in a neat book of 200 pages. The stories of Roland and Oliver and of Godfrey de Bouillon are presented with sympathetic appreciation of the deeds and the spirit of the age, and with a skill and charm of style that challenge comparison with Kingsley's Grecian Heroes. The biographer of the Cid and Richard the Lion-Hearted reads into the simple, whole-hearted Catholic Christianity of the eleventh and twelfth centuries the survival of the "unco guid" ideas that prevailed in the Protestant eighteenth. She must be also the author of that portion of the preface which warns us that the authors will treat their Middle Age characters in a sympathetic spirit "rather than dwell upon those traits and acts that are justly condemned by the finer moral sense of the twentieth century." We appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States!

Meanwhile we are not surprised to be told "it was an age of violence and fraud. To make war upon your neighbor, with or without cause, was thought worthy of all praise, especially if you conquered him. Might made right," and the Cid, being dead, is safely blamed for "treachery and cruelty" which history does not charge against him. We have thoughts of San Juan, and of modern heroes who were right when they won and wrong when they failed. It must be the same author who wrote the part of the Introductory which informs us that the Moors were much more civilized, less cruel, and allowed greater privileges to their conquered subjects than the Spaniards, who could not appreciate these advantages because they were "proud and intensely religious, and they bitterly resented their state of subjection to a foreign and 'infidel' people." Cœur-de-Lion was similarly fashioned: "Richard was religious, too, in the strange, fierce fashion of those days—days when one could be pious without being good; . . . when the Knight of the Cross was confident that Christ pardoned all sins to the warrior who did battle for His Holy Sepulchre."

Yet we are told that the cruel Cid, no instance of whose cruelty is recorded, raised with his own hands a leper from the roadside, prepared a bed for him, nursed him, and ate with him from the same dish. And the fourteenth century "Rule for the Gallant Knight", embodying the spirit of the preceding period, is translated:

"Amend your lives, ye who would fain
The Order of the Knights attain;
Devoutly watch, devoutly pray;
From pride and sin, oh, turn away!
Shun all that's base; the Church defend;
Be the widow's and the orphan's friend;
Be good and leal; take naught by might;
Be bold and guard the people's right;—
This is the rule for the gallant knight."

But what good was a good rule for medieval "Romishes"? We would gladly recommend this book if the writer of "Roland and Oliver" and of "Godfrey" had written the remainder.

M. K.

Sermons Delivered Before Mixed Congregations. By HENRY B. ALMEYER, Pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Huntington, W. Va.

The people of Huntington who listened to these sermons are to be congratulated. A great deal of valuable instruction on the vital question of religion was imparted to them in a simple, direct and interesting manner, and we have no doubt also that many who are not of the household of the faith must have availed themselves of the opportunity of listening to these very learned, and at the same time very lucid, explanations of the chief points of Catholic doctrine. * * *

A Chinese Appeal to Christendom Concerning Christian Missions. By LIN SHAO-YANG. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

If Lin Shao-Yang is a Chinaman, and not an American or an Englishman masquerading as an Oriental, his knowledge of the English language is unusual and his knowledge of conditions outside the Flowery Kingdom most comprehensive. The book is a protest against the attempt to Christianize China.

Naturally, Catholics will be concerned about the writer's opinion of their work in the Far East. They will be gratified to discover that, beyond an occasional gibe, there is nothing very offensive. The Catholic Church is all going to pieces, of course, in Europe, and does not measure up to the scientific standards set for us by Harnack, Loisy, and Joseph McCabe—an array that need not worry us. The author is chiefly, if not exclusively, concerned with the Protestant missionaries, and he has bitter things to say about them, as, for instance, their assumed superiority to the yellow man, the contradictory doctrines they inculcate, their dishonesty in the statements of their revivals, the emotional character of their religion, their bibliolatry, their extravagant observance of the Sabbath, their churches and church-bells, and hymns, their home subscriptions for the heathens, etc. His verdict is that the Chinese should be left to work out their own salvation, until Europe and America can show something better than the present doctrinal and moral anarchy that prevails in Protestantism. * * *

Short Catechism for those About to Marry. By Rev. ANDREW BYRNE. Rochester: St. Bernard's Seminary. Price, 15 cents.

We have not been so well provided in the United States with suitable handbooks of instruction as are Catholics of other countries. Probably the need is never so directly brought home to the pastor of souls as when he sets about the serious obligation imposed upon him of instructing those about to marry. Father Byrne's little book is published to meet this need. It gives a short and clear explanation of the nature of the Sacrament of Matrimony and of the privileges and obligations of those who enter this state. In a country like our own where the danger of mixed marriages is ever present, a little work like the Short Catechism will be decidedly useful for Catholics, and for non-Catholics, who are meditating entering into the marriage relation with a Catholic. It presents a succinct idea of the laws binding in such contracts, which it is but fair both parties should know and understand before they admit the obligation. The first edition of 3,000 copies of Father Byrne's excellent booklet was sold in a few weeks, a satisfactory evidence, one would say, of the merits of the Catechism and of its capability of supplying the lack of such books of instruction among us. * * *

Summula Philosophiae Scholasticae, Vol. II, Cosmologia et Psychologia. J. S. HICKEY, O. Cist. Editio altera. Dublin: Browne and Nolan.

Leo XIII, as we all know, admonished our professors to make St. Thomas the foundation of their philosophy, and Pius X is of the same mind. Some authors obey by filling a preface with praises of the Angel of the Schools, adding a paragraph upon the importance of understanding rightly the mind of St. Thomas, and hinting modestly that they hold the key. Then they go on to support any modern theory they choose in the course of their work. This is not the method of the author of the book before us. Loyalty is its characteristic from beginning to end. He accepts St. Thomas with his whole soul, following with docility the great commentators; and when he finds modern science contradicting the teaching of his master in essentials, he holds to this, and gives good reasons for doing so. His acquaintance with modern physicists is wide, and his quotations from them are valuable. We may differ with him on some points; but these are few, of minor importance, and he is as likely to be right as we. Every professor, and we recommend the book to every professor, will find something to dispute about in a fellow-professor's book; otherwise the monotony of professorship would be deadly, and the multiplication of such books would be useless. Some may be displeased with a certain simplicity that characterizes this work. Truth can afford to be simple; only error needs to clothe itself in pompous verbiage. It is a thoroughly good and practical text-book and will repay study. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

Post-Mortem Use of Wealth. By Daniel S. Remsen. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Net $1.50.

The Legends of the Jews. By Louis Ginsberg. Translated from the German by Paul Radin. Vol. III. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

Deer Jape. By Isabel Cecilia Williams. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons.

Pamphlets:

Devotion to the Sacred Heart. New York: Joseph Schaefer. Net 60 cents per 100.

A Memorial of First Communion. By a Member of a Religious Order. Net $2.00 per 100.

The following have been received from the office of The Irish Messenger, 5 Great Denmark Street, Dublin, Ireland:

The Holy Hour. By the Rev. Joseph McDonnell, S.J. One Penny.

Daily Mass, or, the Mystic Treasures of the Holy Sacrifice. By Rev. J. McDonnell, S.J. Sixth Edition. Net One Penny.

Miniature Meditations for First Fridays. First Series: The Apostleship of Prayer. By the Rev. J. McDonnell, S.J. Net One Penny.

Miniature Meditations for First Fridays. Second Series: The Sacred Heart. By Rev. J. McDonnell, S.J. One Penny.

The Devotion of the First Fridays. By the Rev. Joseph McDonnell, S.J. One hundred and twenty-eight thousandth. One Penny.

The Decree "Ne Temere," and the Marriage Laws of the Catholic Church. By Rev. Peter Finlay, S.J. One Penny.

Frequent and Daily Communion. By Rev. Joseph McDonnell, S.J. Fourth Edition. One Penny.

Temperance Catechism, and Manual of the Total Abstinence League of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. By the Rev. J. A. Cullen, S.J.

The Pioneer Popular Penny Reader. "Ireland Sober—Ireland Free." Compiled by Rev. J. A. Cullen, S.J.

Owen Roe O'Neill. A Sketch of His Life and Times. By E. Leahy. Second Edition. One Penny.

Francisco Ferrer, Criminal Conspirator. A Reply to the Articles by William Archer in McClure's Magazine, November and December, 1910. By Rev. John A. Ryan, D.D. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 15 cents.

German Publication:

"Lasset die Kleinen zu mir Kommen!" Die zeitige und häufige Kommunion der Kinder nach dem neuen Erst-Kommunion Dekrete. Von Emil Springer, S.J. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 40 cents.

Spanish Publication:

Mas Alegria. Por el Dr. Paul W. von Keppler. Traducción del Aleman por Felipe Villaverde. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 80 cents.

EDUCATION

It was a genuine pleasure, some months ago, to make brief mention in this department of an association organized in St. Ignatius College, Chicago, Illinois, to comply with the wish of our Holy Father that the practice of frequent Communion be promoted, especially in all Christian establishments for the training of youth. That announcement embodied a wish thus expressed in the leaflets describing the "Students' Eucharistic League" early sent out from Chicago: "This is only a beginning, and, small though it is, it is hoped and desired that in course of time a large proportion of the college students will become frequent communicants. If they do not, who will?" This desire of the association's first promoter has been more than realized. The spirit of solid piety that has developed is sufficiently manifested by a May offering of the members of the League in the Chicago college of a spiritual bouquet of 2,846 Communions in honor of the Blessed Virgin.

But a wider evidence of the League's practical value is found in the record of its unlooked-for introduction into many other colleges, academies and parish schools. The Students' Eucharistic League has been established not only in the eight Jesuit Colleges of the middle West, but it has also found its way to colleges on the Pacific coast, to New Orleans, Boston, Kentucky and Canada. And everywhere its introduction has been followed by surprisingly happy results among the students pledging themselves to its purposes.

The teaching orders of Sisters have been quick to recognize the value of the plan for increasing Communions among their students, and flourishing branches of the League now exist in the leading academies in Chicago and in the neighboring districts. The organization is only in its infancy, but enough has been accomplished to prove that it contains great possibilities and is destined to play an efficacious and important part in the Christian formation of students in Catholic institutions.

The Director of the Students' Eucharistic League (St. Ignatius College, 1076 West 12th street, Chicago, Illinois,) will be pleased to send leaflets of information to those who may be interested in the aims the association fosters.

Some weeks ago we urged in an article on the Catholic University of Louvain (Belgium) what we claimed to be an effective concrete argument against a contention advanced by the trustees of the Carnegie Fund for the Advancement of Teaching. These gentlemen, as is well known, refuse to give any financial help to institutions in any respect controlled by religious bodies. They explain their refusal by the statement that such institutions, by the very fact of their connection with religious bodies, are incapable of the broad, liberal scholarship looked for in colleges of advanced training. The writer of the article referred to based his argument on comparative results achieved by students hailing from an institution strictly religious in its control and management in competitive tests with men educated in schools of which the Carnegie trustees would certainly approve. One may concede a certain difficulty in measuring the relative merits and standing of educational institutions, but surely results achieved under conditions practically identical for all engaged in a similar work is a fair norm to guide one in forming one's judgment of the efficiency of school training. Reports recently to hand from schools in our own land permit us to insist once again on this argument. The Journal of the American Medical Association of May 27, 1911, contains the results of the examinations made last year by graduates of medical schools throughout the country before licensing boards of the various States, in order to obtain a license to take up the practice of their profession.

* * *

The Journal's report enables us to note the remarkable fact that the St. Louis University, an institution under religious control and management, had ninety members of the class of 1910 examined before eight different State boards and that there was not a single failure. According to the average fate of the medical graduate, there should have been ten failures; for there were more than 400 failures, or about 11 per cent., from the graduates of all the colleges. Not only did St. Louis surpass the average, but, when we look over the list to find what other of the 121 schools had no failures, we note that Jefferson College, Philadelphia, had 105 examined, with no failures; St. Louis University, 90; The University of Michigan, 67; Rush (Chicago University) Medical, 65; Cornell University, New York, 50.

These five are the only schools in all America that had half a hundred examined with complete success.

* * *

From Chicago there comes to us a bit of confirmatory evidence to strengthen our contention. Perhaps for the first time in the history of medical education in Chicago, a college has made one hundred per cent. in the Cook County Hospital examinations. This singular honor was merited recently by the Loyola University Medical Department, again an institution controlled and managed by Catholics. Competition to gain a place in the Cook County Hospital is keen; naturally so, since an internship in a hospital where 38,000 cases are yearly treated is considered an opportunity of invaluable training for the future physician. Other medical schools, after spending two years in preparing special students, and sending forty to take the examinations, had seventy-five per cent. of failures. One school sent twenty representatives and won but one place. Loyola University spent but three months in preparation, sent six students, and won six places.

* * *

To win internships in the Cook County Hospital has long been accepted as a supreme test of efficiency in medical education in Chicago, and this victory consequently puts Loyola University fairly in the front rank of medical schools of the West. One may well be curious to know how the Carnegie trustees will meet evidence such as this, when it is urged against their narrow claim that schools where religious influence prevails cannot win distinction in the field of broad and liberal scholarship.

M. J. O'C.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The following is the letter of his Eminence, Cardinal Pietro Respighi, Vicar of His Holiness, to the Rev. Father Bricarelli, S.J., referred to in another column:

THE VICARIATE, ROME, MAY 9, 1911.

REVEREND FATHER:—

The slanderous charges made against your Reverence on the occasion of a sad event about which the daily press has recently said so much have deeply grieved the Holy Father, who measures their gravity not only by the dignity of a priest who is blamed and insulted in the exercise of the most sacred functions of his lofty ministry, but also and especially by the very grievous scandal that those charges may produce among the faithful.

It is plain, then, that although the accuser is an unhappy priest who, by means of slander, has tried to justify his apostasy and his thanklessness to the Church which, with motherly affection, nourished and exalted him, the accusation is calculated to wound not so much a humble religious as the institution which he in his priestly character represents, namely, the Catholic Church.

With the desire of encouraging your Reverence to be comforted in the Lord, His Holiness wishes me to convey the assurance of his paternal benevolence to your Reverence, who has been deemed worthy to suffer contumely for the name of Christ. Be sure that the Holy Father is fully persuaded of your innocence. Were other proofs wanting, the slanderous nature of what has been brought against you by Verdesi is most clearly established by the defectiveness noted in the circumstances with which the accuser has clothed it for the sake of giving it the appearance of truth. Indeed, the august Pontiff remembers well, and, in his goodness, he has been pleased to tell me, how, in mentioning to him, for the purpose of obtaining authoritative advice, what you had heard from Verdesi, you did not mention his name; rather, you stated expressly that you had learned those facts outside of confession, in an ordinary conversation with a priestly friend of yours. There is no reason to reproach or blame your Reverence, either because you conferred with the Holy Father or because you told Verdesi that he was bound to make the facts known to the competent authority, since you thereby praiseworthy fulfilled your strict duty as a priest who respects Church regulations.

Another circumstance that the Holy Father has deigned to make known to me is that the facts mentioned to him by your Reverence in August, 1908, had already been brought to him from another source. The anonymous denunciation, therefore, made by Verdesi could not have any influence on the action of the Holy See against those priests whom Verdesi accused of Modernism.

These are the points which, with the apostolic benediction, I am commanded by the Holy Father to communicate to you, that you may draw comfort from them in your present trouble.

Praying the Lord to grant you every blessing, I am, Reverend Father,

Yours most devotedly and affectionately in Jesus Christ,

PIETRO RESPIGHI, Cardinal Vicar.

SOCIOLOGY

A group of Catholic physicians, with Lawrence F. Flick, M.D., at their head, have organized in Philadelphia the guild of St. Luke, St. Cosmas and St. Damian, for the purpose of "elucidating the principles involved in the application of morality to medical and surgical scientific subjects." As Catholics accept the moral teaching of the Church in the light of faith, and as educated Catholics can find no difficulty in seeing that the decisions of the Church in matters medical and surgical are always in conformity with sound principles of reason, we infer from the word "elucidating" that, though the guild will have something to say for them on matters as yet undecided, its chief work will be to take up an aggressive, though kindly, attitude in the face of that daring medicine and surgery which is utilitarian, hedonistic, malthusian, anything but Christian in its principles. No greater benefit can be conferred upon the profession and its members than the frank, fearless and capable exposition of Catholic moral principles concerning not a few things in practice, about which many feel uneasy, yet, because they have no solid principles to go on, allow themselves, against their conscience, to drift with the tide. As the guild has "the enthusiastic approval of the ecclesiastical authorities", we look for no little fruit from it. We should like to see a federation of such guilds, with its own periodical to explain the Catholic position on certain grave questions to the whole profession.

* * *

Some time ago we called attention to the colonization work of the Rev. Julius E. de Vos and a number of priests associated with him. Since then we have learned with pleasure that at their last annual meeting the Archbishops of the country took it under their patronage in order to extend its scope, and approved of a convention, to be held in St. Louis, to complete its organization under the name of the Catholic Colonization Society of the United States of America, and to provide it with a responsible directorate.

The convention met on May 2, with prelates and delegates attending from all parts of the country, the Archbishop of St. Louis being temporary chairman. Father de Vos was elected president, and he will bring to the larger work all the executive ability he showed and the experience he gained while engaged in it on a smaller scale.

The society is prepared to establish colonization bureaus in every diocese to prepare the way for Catholic colonies, and we hope to see bureaus so established, especially in the more sparsely settled regions which are calling for immigration. It is good for people to come from the crowded countries of Europe to our wider spaces and broader opportunities. It is not good for them to do so at the peril of their faith. To obviate this danger, which has brought ruin to many in the past, is the principal object of the society. But colonization has its material advantages, which should commend this society to public authority, which must wish to see its immigrants do well. Their prosperity is the prosperity of the State they make their home. One immigrant prospering in a new country will draw others: each failure will keep others back. Nothing secures more surely individual prosperity than cooperation, the gist of the colonization idea. Twenty, thirty, one hundred families of the same race, language and manners, settling down together in a new land have every reason to expect success. "Brother helped by brother is as a strong city"; and they know nothing of the discouragement, the loneliness, the many obstacles which too often make one coming alone into the midst of strangers the victim of undeserved failure. One of the largest lumber companies in British Columbia brings colonies of woodmen from Quebec, with their families and their priest; it builds them houses and church and school, and counts the money thus expended well spent, because of the better service it receives. No one who has seen the prosperity of such enterprises as the Italian colony at Asti, in California, can be blind to the material advantages of such undertakings. When to such advantages are joined the moral and supernatural blessings of a Catholic colony, such a work calls for the utmost encouragement and assistance.

* * *

We mentioned lately how English insurance companies are issuing special policies to cover the very heavy succession duties now imposed when larger properties pass into new hands on account of death. Another policy is proposed by at least one company, to provide for the education of children, or for a lump sum to be paid at a given age, as a marriage portion in the case of girls, or as the means of starting the boys in business. Of course, it is not a speculation on the part of the company upon the chance of the girls not marrying, or of the boys not going into business. They will get the money anyhow. The objects are mentioned rather in an advertising way, to give the father a strong motive for taking out a policy.

H. W.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Cardinal Gibbons, on June 4, invested the Right Rev. Mgr. William T. Russell, D.D., pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Washington, with the purple robes of a domestic prelate of His Holiness, Pius X. The ceremony was performed in St. Patrick's, the Very Rev. Mgr. Bonaventura Cerretti, auditor of the Papal Delegation intoning the Mass, and the Rev. John T. Whelan, of Baltimore, preaching the sermon.

Unanimous approval of the plan for reorganizing the Society of St. Vincent de Paul was given at the National Conference in Boston. This plan had been authorized by the Council General of the organization in Paris and approved by the national assembly of Archbishops in this country. Presidents of the Superior Councils in America were authorized to select a committee to complete the details, which will probably take several months. The new plan is for one central administrative body, to be known as the Superior Council of the United States, with a central organization in each archdiocese. The New York officials now supervise the work generally.

On the day following the great celebration in his honor, Cardinal Gibbons was up at his usual hour—6 o'clock—and after the 7 o'clock Mass in the Cathedral confirmed a family of seven, a father and six children. The candidates were Jewish converts. The mother had already been received into the Church. The Cardinal gave the family a heart-to-heart talk after the ceremony.

The Franciscan Brotherhood at Bellary, in the Archdiocese of Madras, India, is a community of native Indian religious, who undertook some years ago to supply the want of institutions where Catholic Telugu boys might be lodged and cared for and given a good Christian education, and where pagan boys also might be instructed for baptism. St. John's Boys' Institution for the Telugu caste boys, conducted by the Monastery, is the only one of its kind in an area of 41,000 square miles, a district as extensive as the State of Ohio, with a Telugu native Catholic population of 22,000, in the midst of six million pagans. In a humble way the Institution serves also as a sort of preparatory seminary; it is the chief source from which subjects are obtained for the Monastery, and it further serves as a catechumenate. An appeal, endorsed by the Archbishop of Madras, the Most Rev. Dr. J. Aelen, is made to the generosity of Catholics to help the Franciscans in charge to find the necessary funds to build new quarters, which are sadly needed, for the accommodation of more lads. The number of students now in residence is 70. There are a good many willing and anxious to enter, but there is no room for more, and the boys are still using a part of the Monastery proper.

PERSONAL

On a green knoll in Arlington Cemetery, Va., a memorial was unveiled, on May 22, to Major Pierre Charles L'Enfant, the French engineer to whose prophetic vision Washington owes its broad avenues and its symmetry of design.

President Taft, Ambassador Jusserand of France, and Senator Root of New York, spoke in eulogy of Major L'Enfant. The ribbons of red, white and blue that bound the American flag to the marble face of the memorial were lifted by Miss Eleanor Carroll Morgan, great-granddaughter of William Dudley Digges, in whose home L'Enfant found refuge when he was dismissed from the service of the Government. Mgr. Russell, of St. Patrick's Church, Washington, made the invocation and pronounced the benediction.

"There are not many," said President Taft, "who have to wait one hundred years to receive the reward to which they are entitled, until the world shall make the progress which enables it to pay the just reward. The man whose memory we celebrate to-day had a highly artistic temperament, and he had the defects which not infrequently accompany that temperament; and it is that fact that has obscured at times and in some degree the merit of what he did, and lessened the gratitude we owe him for what he did. L'Enfant will now lie here appropriately in state and in rest, with the gratitude of the nation he served so well."

Standing in front of the Lee mansion, the monument overlooks the Potomac River and the city of Washington. The low base of stone supports on its top a carved map, a fac-simile of the original map of Washington as drawn by Major L'Enfant when he laid out the Federal capital, under the direction of President Washington, in July, 1790. L'Enfant was quite forgotten till 1909. From the time of his death in 1823 until last year, his body lay in a lonely grave on a marsh-land farm. Congress made, in 1909, an appropriation for the transfer of the body to the National Cemetery.

The North Carolina Society of Baltimore has appointed a committee of five of its members to compile and have bound a history of Cardinal Gibbons' life and work in North Carolina, where he spent the first years of his life as a bishop. A copy of the history will be presented to the Cardinal at the ecclesiastical celebration in September. Mr. Oscar D. Green is president of the Society.

The fortieth anniversary of the Irish World has brought to Patrick Ford, the following testimonial of its services to the Irish cause from John E. Redmond, leader of the Irish Party:—

"I write to offer you my most hearty congratulations upon the fortieth anniversary of the foundation of the Irish World.

"That period covers a long span in the history of Ireland. I have witnessed many great and blessed reforms. The National Party during all of that period has received valuable aid from Irish-America, and, though the Irish World has sometimes advocated views not shared by the leaders of the constitutional movement at home, it has been always inspired by unselfish devotion in the cause of Irish Freedom. For many years it has consistently supported the views and policy of the Irish Party and given to the National movement invaluable assistance. I feel sure I voice the universal sentiment of Nationalist Ireland when I say we are grateful to the Irish World and to you, and we all pray that Patrick Ford may live to witness the crowning of his life-work with the establishment of a free Irish Parliament."

SCIENCE

THE MIGRATIONS OF BIRDS.

The National Geographic Magazine, in its April number, contains a most interesting article by Wells W. Cooke on "Our Greatest Travellers: Birds that Fly from Pole to Pole; and Birds that Make 2,500 Miles in a Single Flight." It gives the principal routes used by birds in their migrations between North and South America, together with much collateral information. Some birds travel by day and some by night. Some make their journey in short stretches, others in long ones. As an instance of the latter class, the American golden plover, when the weather is propitious, flies without rest or pause from Nova Scotia to South America, a distance of 2,400 miles. In stormy weather it makes emergency stop-overs at the Bermudas and the Lesser Antilles. The Pacific golden plover, however, travels the same distance, from Alaska to Hawaii, across an islandless sea where a stop is impossible. The Arctic tern breeds in Greenland, and spends the winter within the Antarctic Circle, and thus travels almost from Pole to Pole. It takes scarcely twenty weeks for the round trip of 22,000 miles, and must make at least 150 miles a day on an average. During eight months of the year the bird lives where the sun does not go below the horizon.

The same journal gives also an article by Charles Lester Marlatt, of the Bureau of Entomology, on Insect Pests and Parasites. It shows the ravages and spread of many species, and suggests means of destroying them. The article is well illustrated.

* * *

THE TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE SUN OF APRIL 28.

We read in Nature of May 11 that "Major Hills, secretary of the Joint Permanent Eclipse Committee, has, according to the Times of May 5, received a telegram from Father Cortie stating that thick cirrus clouds persisted at totality, but photographs of the corona and spectrum were obtained; the corona was characteristic of the minimum sun-spot period.

"A telegram received by the Astronomer Royal from Mr. Worthington, who was also stationed at Vavau, reads: 'Splendid photos, inner and outer corona, one and a half degrees.'

"A later communication states that Mr. C. L. Wragge, formerly meteorologist to the Queensland Government, saw the eclipse under excellent conditions at Lifuka, Friendly Islands. Hydrogen prominences were wonderfully distinct, and, apparently, a four-vaaned corona was seen extending some distance from the moon's disc."

* * *

THE INTERNAL HEAT OF THE EARTH.

Science of May 26 discusses quite a number of observations upon the increase of temperature with depth below the surface of the earth. It is very different in different places, and varies from 40 to 250 feet or more for one degree of Fahrenheit. There is no general law, and it is very probable that the rise of temperature diminishes below the superficial zone of about one mile of the 4,000 through which the observations extend.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

Why mercury under pressure should be possessed of a greater capability of rupturing steel and kindred metals than other liquids under like pressure is a problem which has of late been attacked by students of hydraulics with very interesting results. Twelve similar cylinders, cut from a bar of Krupp's special chrome-nickel steel, were tested in the Jefferson Physical Laboratory, six with mercury under pressure, the others with a glycerine water mixture, with ether, and with carbon disulphide. Of the former six, five burst at pressures ranging from about 2,640 to 4,180 pounds to the square inch, whereas of the latter, none yielded under pressures less than 21,120 pounds to the square inch. A microscopical examination of the fissures established the fact that the rupturing was due to amalgamation. Once started, the amalgamation spread rapidly through the metal. The natural affinity of steel for mercury and the tendency of the pores to open under the strain of the pressure tend to hasten the rapidity of this interaction. This latter view is strongly supported by the fact that the amalgamation could be traced readily along the distended pores.

* * *

From a series of measurements made on the thickness of the several media of the human eye, and on the coefficients of resistivity to the flow of an electric current through these thicknesses, it has been calculated that but 0.0023 of the energy of the light waves incident upon the anterior surface of this organ reaches the retina. As this reduction is independent of the frequency, that is, of the color of the light, the limitation of the vision at the blue end of the spectrum is attributable either to selective absorption or to the photochemical inactivity of the visual yellow and purple in ultra-violet light. In the course of the investigation it was noticed that the fineness of the fibres in the reticulated optic nerve prevented "skin effects", thus permitting a uniform electrical distribution over each cross-section. An approximate estimation of the minimum current required for light sensation was deduced by considering the distance at which the sun would become invisible in conjunction with the absorbed solar radiation, the result being that a current of $2.87/10^{14}$ amperes in a fibre 0.0004 cm. in diameter equals an energy of absorption of $1.31/10^{11}$ ergs per cm. of fibre per sec. These figures argue a sensitiveness of the eye over the ear of twenty to one.

F. J. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

Sister Alphonse died at the Convent of Notre Dame, Reading, Ohio, in her eighty-seventh year. She was a native of Belgium, and entered the Mother-house of her congregation at Namur seventy years ago. She was among the third band of its workers sent to the United States, arriving in Cincinnati in 1845, and her life since was spent in the cause of Catholic education. One who knew and loved her says she "was a wonderful character. Musician, philosopher, teacher, she possessed a magnetism that drew all hearts to her, and thousands will learn with sorrow that she is no more. A noble woman, a great educator, a model religious, her death was a fitting closing for a soul ripe for heaven, a peaceful, happy one."

Mother Borgia Kelly died on June 1, at St. Joseph's Convent, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, in her eighty-seventh year. She was born in Calais, Maine, and joined the Sisters of St. Joseph fifty-two years ago in Philadelphia, to which city her parents had removed in her youth, and were there among the pioneers of what is now St. Ann's parish.

Mother M. Philip, a native of Wexford, Ireland, the oldest Sister of St. Joseph in Canada, died at St. Joseph's Convent Hamilton, on June 1, aged eighty-five years and in the fifty-ninth year of her religious life. She was the first Superior of the convent in Hamilton, and was especially notable for her heroic charity during the cholera epidemic in that city.

Mother Mary of St. John the Baptist, Superior of the Convent of the Good Shepherd, at Cleveland, Ohio, died there in her seventy-third year, and the fifty-eighth year of her religious life. Mother Baptist (Margaret Elizabeth Jackson) was born in Cashel, County Tipperary, Ireland, and joined the Community of the Good Shepherd at St. Louis, Mo., of which her maternal aunt was Superior, in 1853. Before she was twenty-one years old she was sent to found a home in Chicago, and governed it successfully for five years. She later labored in Philadelphia, Cincinnati and Newport, Ky., holding many positions of importance in these communities. Two of her sisters are also members of the Cleveland community.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When I received my copy of the Catholic Mind containing a list of the hundred best books, I ordered a couple of extra copies and sent one to the bookman in this city through whom I order many of my books. He forwarded it to the State Librarian at Harrisburg, with the result that he received an order for the furnishing of forty of the books for the State Library. I am assured that the remaining sixty are already on the shelves. This was very gratifying to me, and I thought it would be to you. Besides, it suggests the ease with which all of these books could probably be put upon the shelves of every State Library in this country; hence, this communication to you.

JOHN A. COYLE.

Lancaster, Pa., June 2.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 11

(Price 10 Cents)

JUNE 24, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 115

CHRONICLE

Direct Vote for U. S. Senators—Negro Lawyer's Appointment—Express Lines and Postal System—Transportation Rates Excessive—White House Silver Wedding—State Control of Cold Storage—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Spain—Portugal—Germany—Austria-Hungary—Belgium241-244

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Lesson of the Cardinal's Jubilee—The Coronation—The New Sodality Rules—Ireland's Population245-251

CORRESPONDENCE

Pope Commends the School of Higher Music—The Millenary of Normandy—Cuban Politics.251-253

EDITORIAL

The Independent Once More—Sane Fourth Movement—Duez Called to Trial—A Catholic Daily—Santo Tomás, Manila—The Catholic Appeal—"That Which Remaineth Give Alms"—Cicero's Poems!—Note254-257

IN MISSION FIELDS

An American Seminary for Foreign Missions.257

THE PAROCHIAL SCHOOL.....258-259

LITERATURE

Uncle Sam's Periodicals—Dailies—Science of Education—Manual of Christian Pedagogy—Essays—California Under Spain and Mexico, 1535-1847—History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages—Books Received.....259-261

EDUCATION

Religion in Our Schools—The Specious "Non-Sectarian" Argument—Explicit Religious Instruction in Prussian High Schools—Appropriations of the Rockefeller Endowment....261-262

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Spiritual Advantages of Membership in the St. Vincent de Paul Society.....262

ECONOMICS

The National Waste of Modern Naval Armament Expenditures—Ventilation in Subways.262-263

SCIENCE

Peary's "North Pole"—The Microstructure of Hatstones—Eliminating Barnacles—An International Volcanological Institute—Revolutionizing the Running Cost of Electric Lighting...263

PERSONAL

Bequests of John P. O'Connor—Michael F. Dooley—Rev. Michael Moynihan, S.J.—Canon Quinn263-264

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Increase of Chinese and Japanese Catholics—Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin—New Bishop of Achonry—First Money Grant to a New York Catholic Free School.....264

OBITUARY

Rt. Rev. William Gordon, D.D.....264

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Objectionable Moving Pictures.....264

CHRONICLE

Direct Vote for U. S. Senators.—After a controversy that has extended over more than a quarter of a century the United States Senate passed the resolution to place before the legislatures of the various States a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. The resolution as adopted, however, carried with it the Bristow proviso, reserving to the Federal Government the power to prescribe the time, place and manner in which Senators shall be elected. If the House, to which the resolution is now to be returned, acts favorably on the measure in its amended form, it will go to the States for ratification as an amendment to the Constitution. The vote on the Bristow amendment was a tie, 44 to 44, Vice-President Sherman casting the vote which added the amendment to the resolution.

Negro Lawyer's Appointment.—The nomination of William H. Lewis, the Boston negro attorney, to be Assistant Attorney General of the United States was confirmed by the Senate. Mr. Lewis's name was sent to the Senate for confirmation on February 28. For a long time the nomination was held up in the Judiciary committee, but eventually it was confirmed in the most perfunctory manner, without debate or a demand for a roll call. The new Assistant Attorney General is the son of parents who were formerly slaves, although they had been freed at the time of his birth. His father was a Baptist clergyman at Portsmouth, Vt. Mr. Lewis was graduated from Amherst in 1892 and from the Harvard Law School in 1895. He was very successful in his practice as a lawyer, and has held the position of Assistant United States District Attorney in Boston since January, 1903.

Express Lines and Postal System.—The sub-committee on post offices and post roads took up for consideration the Lewis bill, which provides for condemning and purchasing the express companies and adding them to the postal system. Mr. Lewis pointed out, as one of the main reasons why the express companies should be added to the postal system, that the express company service does not reach beyond the railways to the country or the farms, while the post office does, through the rural free delivery, which is waiting with empty wagons to receive the express packages and take them to the country stores and the farmers. Moreover, he maintained that as a consequence of the coordination of the express company plants with the post office and rural delivery there would be an elimination of the express company profits, which are averaging over 50 per cent. on the investment.

Transportation Rates Excessive.—Mr. Lewis believes that the express companies are obstacles to the business of the country. In Argentina the average charge for carrying a ton of express is $6.31, and for the countries of Europe $4.12, while the average express company charge in the United States is $31.20. In other countries they charge five times as much to carry a ton of express as a ton of freight. Here the express companies charge sixteen times as much. These charges are simply prohibitive for more than half of the traffic in the United States. The food problem, the high cost of living, according to Mr. Lewis's figures, is largely the result of the lack of a proper articulation of our transportation with the rural sources of supply. While prices are often prohibitive to the consumer, crops may be rotting at the place of production for want of a real express service.

White House Silver Wedding.—A reception and dance were given at the White House on Monday night to celebrate the silver wedding anniversary of the President and Mrs. Taft. The floral decorations in the draw-ings-rooms where the distinguished couple received their guests were on a scale of unusual beauty and magnificence. Gifts of every variety, addressed to Mrs. Taft, were received at the White House. One of the most beautiful is the watch and chain presented by the wives of forty generals of the army; both watch and chain are of platinum, wonderfully wrought and set and almost incrustured with diamonds. Handsome sets and pieces of silverware for use and ornament were received from the Senate and House, from the Supreme Court circle, headed by Chief Justice and Mrs. White, from the Vice-President and Mrs. Sherman, Secretary and Mrs. Knox, Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. MacVeagh, and from many other persons of distinction. One of the most attractive decorations of the White House was a great electric flag, with its red, white and blue lights, suspended from the south portico. But what the President and Mrs. Taft prized more than the costly and elaborate manifestations of the affection of friends was the consciousness that they were the recipients of congratulations that could not find a medium for utterance welling up from millions of warm hearts in the land which Providence has so blessed during their occupancy of the White House.

State Control of Cold Storage.—Regulation of cold storage plants in New York State is provided for in the bill of Assemblyman Brennan, which was signed by Governor Dix and goes into effect immediately. The new law provides that all cold storage goods shall be so marked, and that they shall not be kept in storage for more than ten months, except butter products, which may be held twelve months. The State Health Department has authority to inspect and supervise all cold storage plants and to make reasonable rules and regulations governing them. Warehousemen are required to file a report with the State Health Department in January, May and September in each year, setting forth the quantity of foodstuffs in cold storage. The act prohibits the return of food to cold storage when once placed on the market for sale. Violation of the new law is made a misdemeanor.

Mexico.—On June 14 fighting was reported as going on at Chihuahua. There are 4,000 Federal troops in the city, and they have orders not to permit the rebel army of Orozco to enter. Other fights are reported from various places. The Mormon colony at San Antonio, Mexico, is harassed by bandits under Zalazar. Two thousand Yaqui Indians are also said to be in the field.—It is reported that Governor Gonzales, of Chihuahua, declared that under the new régime foreign concessions which are regarded as monopolies will not be extended or renewed, and that every legal effort will be made to restrict them. "Undoubtedly," he says, "foreigners who profited so greatly under the Diaz administration will be hard hit." He has decided to admit into the city the insurrecto army of General Orozco.

Canada.—The Liberal Government has been sustained in the Nova Scotia Provincial elections, though the Conservatives won six of their seats and defeated three ministers. The new House will contain 27 Government members and 11 Opposition.—Charles D. Sheldon, the stock broker, who fled from Montreal some months ago and was apprehended in the United States, has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment for embezzling his customers' money.—The strike in the western collieries is causing a serious coal famine in the prairie provinces.—The Government and the Opposition are engaged in a vigorous campaign in view of the elections. Messrs. Bourassa and Monk are speaking chiefly in Quebec; the ministers, in Quebec and Ontario, and Mr. Borden, in the Prairie provinces.

Great Britain.—Lord Halsbury declares that he will vote against the third reading of the Parliament Bill. He has been Lord Chancellor in every Unionist Cabinet since 1885, and is a leader amongst the irreconcilables. He will have, probably, some following.—The Insurance Bill may prove a source of considerable difficulty to the Government. Apart from opposition arising from interests involved, it is distasteful to a large body of persons of small income, who object to be included with the working classes, and to these also, because they do not like to be compelled to contribute.—The Government has proposed to the Imperial Conference a Court of Appeal for the whole Empire, to consist of the existing members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with two English judges and one judge from each Dominion added. The proposal did not meet with unanimous approval, but the Conference decided to submit it to the Dominions.—The seamen's strike seems to be gathering head. The Olympic and one or two other ships secured crews by granting some advance in wages, but it is for the round trip only. The companies assert that they will have no difficulty in getting crews, and the coaling companies say the same with regard to coal-passers. Still, ships are being delayed and there is talk of laying up not a few, both in English and Continental ports.—The London, County and Westminster Bank has taken over the assets of the Birkbeck Bank.

—The new Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Inge, successor of Gregory and Church, preached his first sermon on Whitsunday, and showed himself unorthodox on the personality of the Holy Ghost. It is to be seen whether this is held to be important in the modern Church of England.

Ireland.—At the invitation of the Cork Industrial Association the United Irish League of Great Britain held its annual meeting in that city, June 3. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who has been elected president for twenty-nine successive terms, paid a merited tribute to the Irish of Great Britain, who, with nothing to gain and often much to lose, had always been faithful to the old land, and had rendered incalculable services by always casting their votes in the numerous constituencies in which they controlled the political balances as Irish needs demanded and the Irish Leader directed. "They were inspired by one motive—that the high intelligence and character of the majority of their people entitled them to a high place among the races and nations; and they would not rest till Ireland had a chance to reassert herself and take her place among the nations of the earth." Later, Mr. O'Connor said: "In a few months we shall be conferring with the Liberal leaders on the details of a Home Rule Bill. We will make the best bargain for Ireland we can. If we are offered a small measure we will reject it and take the field again; but if the bill guarantees to our people their liberties and rights, in a year or two it will be on the statute book."—Messrs. O'Brien and Healy, who also held a convention in Cork June 3, were not so hopeful of immediate results. Mr. O'Brien would win Home Rule by "hand-shakes" with all classes. Mr. Healy prophesied ultimate success: "Years, decades, centuries are but moments in the life of a nation; and we at least can say that in the thirty years that compassed our day and generation we have put some foothold under the steps of our people, have done something to discipline and train them, and that the army so disciplined, should we be left behind, will still be found headed by gallant men, who will lead it to final triumph."—Mr. Birrell, speaking on Home Rule at Manchester, said the right rule was to grant every demand that was just, and then add what is generous. Mr. Redmond has signified his approval. A number of writers who are discussing the financial aspect of Home Rule in the Irish papers intimate that "what is just" will be amply sufficient, but are not very hopeful of obtaining it.—The first week in June saw two notable celebrations, the golden Jubilees of Blackrock College, Dublin, and of St. Mary's College, Dundalk. Blackrock, founded by the French Fathers of the Holy Ghost, has developed into one of the most famous educational institutions in Ireland, having been eminently successful in the Intermediate and University examinations. The Dundalk institution, which was also founded by French missionaries, the Marist Fathers, is the educational centre of the Archdiocese of Armagh, and has produced a large number of eminent men, lay and ecclesiastical. His Eminence, Cardinal Logue, presided at the Dundalk Jubilee, and Archbishop Walsh sung the Solemn Mass of Thanksgiving at Blackrock.

France.—Only 1,700 soldiers remain in Fez. Possibly the city may again be attacked. But the Diario de Cadiz, which is generally well informed, announces that three Spanish battalions are to be sent into Morocco. This reinforcement may cause new disturbances. A body of troops left Cadiz for Africa on June 3.—On June 15 the Senatorial committee approved the La Marseille Bill, prohibiting the fabrication and sale of absinthe. In 1873, 147,686 gallons of absinthe were consumed in France. In 1908 it had jumped to 5,246,274, but in 1910 it had decreased to 3,786,552.—The champagne question is imperiling the existence of the Cabinet. Only the illness of Prime Minister Monis has held it together for the moment, but the crisis is at hand.

Spain.—The Holy Father has granted permission to have the celebration of Masses in Spain's capital city begin at one o'clock in the morning during the Madrid Eucharistic Congress.—The great feature of the Congress, the grand public procession of the Blessed Sacrament, will take place at six o'clock in the evening of June 29. At that same hour in every city, and town and village of Spain, the Sacred Host will be carried in solemn procession—a magnificent demonstration of national homage to the Eucharistic King. Up to June 1 nineteen foreign bishops had sent in notice of their intended presence at the Congress, several North and South American prelates being in the number. A very charming detail of the announcements made by the Reception Committee is that which informs us that many private families, as well as the proprietors of many hotels in Madrid, have freely offered the hospitality of their establishments to invited guests.—On June 8 detachments of Infantry and Marines left Larache to proceed to Alcazar to restore tranquillity. An official note states that the Powers who were signatories of the Algeciras act have been duly informed. The Moors have issued a protest, while in Madrid the Liberal ex-Minister Villanueva denounced the Government's policy in Morocco and regretted that Spain had not accepted Germany's offer, instead of uniting itself with France. Señor Maura supported the Government against this attack.

Portugal.—Late despatches tell us that fourteen persons of distinguished position in the country, among them two Canons of Coimbra and a prelate of Braga, who had been charged with participation in a plot for the restoration of the monarchy, were conveyed on board a man-of-war to be brought to Lisbon. Thence, so it was expected, they were to be deported to Africa.—

A strange story is that telegraphed from Lisbon. It tells how the Portuguese Government commissioned its representatives in Spain to ask for the expulsion from that country of the Jesuit, Father Cabral, who published a strong pamphlet in protest against the manner in which his religious brethren had been dealt with in the early days of the republic. Father Luiz Gonzaga Cabral, who happens to be Provincial of the Portuguese Jesuits now in exile, writes thus from his actual residence in Brussels to the press of Belgium's capital city:

"The newspapers of Spain and Portugal have lately published that the 'Chargé d'Affaires' of the Republic begged of Sr. Canalejas to have me withdrawn from the Portuguese frontier further into the interior of Spain. Several newspapers, indeed, have affirmed that I was to be found sometimes at Pontevedra and at other times at Vigo. The fact is I have never been one single moment of my life either at Vigo or at Pontevedra. As to Spain, I departed thence on the 16th of January on my way to Holland, and since then I have not even once left Holland or Belgium, except on one or two occasions when I spent a few hours in Germany. You can therefore judge for yourself, my dear sir, how well informed these people are, even with regard to affairs they do not hesitate to treat diplomatically, and in what way they proceed in order to satisfy their hatred and prejudice, perhaps, likewise in order to seek a retrospective justification for the revolting acts of tyranny they have practised against us."

Germany.—The Catholic papers report a mistake made just of late by an anti-Catholic journal of Rome. Probably, not understanding an announcement published in the Kölnische Volkszeitung, the editor of the Roman paper gleefully informed his readers that the powerful Catholic Volksverein of Germany appeared to be on the down grade, its numbers were decreasing, and that last year alone it had lost no less than 10,000 members. The report was caught up and quickly spread by other journals on the Continent. "Of course," says the Catholic press, "the thing is a ridiculous canard." The only appearance of truth in it is thus explained: The managing board of the Volksverein is accustomed on April 1 each year to issue a reminder to such of its members as have not paid their annual dues. This year, as usual, the reminder was published as an insertion in the Volkszeitung, and the Verein's members were told that the number of delinquents was an unwontedly large one this year, namely, a round 10,000. There was not a hint of any defections from the organization, and, as a matter of fact, a second insertion in the Volkszeitung, of a later date, informed its readers that the warning had had excellent results, and that a considerable number of the delinquents had paid their arrears. Not only was there no question of a large defection, but the last report of the Verein shows an increase of 14,000 members, the organization having on its rolls to-day 682,-

000. The increase in membership is, in fact, reaching higher figures these last few years than it has ever shown before. That in a total of 682,000 members, some 10,000, or 6.82 per cent. should be backward in paying their dues, is no very remarkable thing, and really can bring but cold comfort to the enemy.—According to the official program arranged by the German naval officers for the entertainment of the second division of the United States Atlantic fleet on the occasion of its visit to Kiel, the American battleships are expected to anchor at Kiel, June 21. This allows ample time for the exchange of official visits before the arrival of Emperor William, who will receive Rear-Admiral Badger and his Commanders immediately when he reaches Kiel.—The Berlin City Council decided to float a loan of $80,750,000, the proceeds of which will be used for the construction of subways and other utilities. Two tunnels to relieve the cross traffic in Unter den Linden will be built.

Austria-Hungary.—Heartfelt congratulations and good wishes have been pouring in from all sides on His Eminence, Cardinal Katschthaler, Prince Archbishop of Salzburg. On April 29 the venerable Prince of the Church entered upon his eightieth year, and he is still active in all the busy round of duties his exalted station imposes upon him.—No great excitement developed in the empire during the campaign preparatory to the parliamentary elections, which took place June 13. The Christian Socialists, the name is used in Austria to designate Lueger's old following made up of Catholics banded together to seek proper social reforms, had made heroic efforts to effect a combination with other political sections of the Germans opposed to Social Democracy. It was thought that a fusion between the Christian Socialists, the German Liberals, and the German Nationalists would make it an easy matter to wrest from the Social-Democrats many of the eighty-seven seats held by them in the parliament recently dissolved by imperial mandate. Unfortunately religious bias and prejudice proved too strong in Austria to permit the combination.—The Christian Socialists met with an unexpected reverse in the elections in Vienna. Instead of the 33 seats held by them in the capital and surrounding districts in the last parliament, the record at the close of the first day's ballot is, two seats certain, with a good chance in twenty-three districts, in which a second election will be needed.—The results of the early balloting seem to make good, however, the claim that the Christian Socialists will form the strongest group in the new parliament.

Belgium.—Five members of the de Broqueville Cabinet are taken from the old one. They are M. Davignon, Minister of Foreign Affairs; M. Renkin, Colonial Minister; M. Hubert, Minister of Labor, and General Hellebaut, Minister of War.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Lesson of the Cardinal's Jubilee

The great civic demonstration held a week ago in Baltimore in honor of Cardinal Gibbons furnishes more than one fruitful subject for reflection. His Eminence in his brief but happy address touched upon one of these subjects when, admitting there was "no official union of Church and State in this country," he denied that there was on that account "any antagonism between the civil and religious authorities." "Far from it," he said, "the Church and State move on parallel lines. They mutually assist one another." One of the leading secular newspapers of the day has taken the occasion of the celebration and the address of the Cardinal to read a lesson to the Catholics of France and Spain and Portugal in general, and to the Vatican in particular. Only a distorted vision can see in the position of Church and State in those countries an identity, or even a faint similarity with the conditions of Church and State in our land, and, laying aside the doubtful compliment of praising American Catholics at the expense of their brethren in Europe, it betrays a woful amount of hard-headedness or unenlightenment to fail to grasp the essential differences between our own and the abortive Republics abroad.

The Springfield Republican finds the Cardinal's brief response to the felicitations tendered to him by President Taft and other distinguished men at his jubilee as being "in exquisite taste." "All Americans," it says, "will be grateful to this prince of the Roman Catholic Church for his reference to the Church's relation to the State in this country"; and the writer declares "it was an utterance not without special significance, perhaps, in view of the serious troubles that have arisen during the past ten years in France, Spain and Portugal between the civil and ecclesiastical authority." But the special significance which the Springfield Republican finds in the utterance of the Cardinal is the supposed inconsistency of the Church here in America as represented by His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, and the Church in Europe as represented by her leaders there in their attitude towards the State. Cardinal Gibbons is praised, his address is in "exquisite taste," but the churchmen, and particularly the Vatican, are condemned, because "in both France and Portugal the papacy has opposed the separation of Church and State, no less on grounds of principle than for reasons connected with the details of administrative acts."

The expressions that the Church is in opposition "on grounds of principle" and "details of administrative acts" are abstract terms and vague. In the concrete the "grounds of principle," on which the opposition of the Church is based, is the illegality of the methods by which this separation of Church and State was decreed and carried out, the injustice of taking another's property without his consent. In the concrete the "administrative acts," which the Church in France and in Portugal opposes, are the spoliation and desecration of her churches, the wanton absorption into State ownership of the temples of worship which are in their entirety the heritage passed down to the children of the Faith by their Catholic ancestors, or the property pure and simple of the Catholics of a later age, who out of their generosity built them and paid for them, and were their undisputed owners. The "administrative acts" to which the Church in France and Spain is opposed are the forced exile of her children, the closing and dismantling of her schools, the premium put on irreligion and atheism, and, under the folds of the tricolor and the cry of liberté, égalité, fraternité, the bitter persecution of those who ask to worship God according to their conscience and in accordance with the laws which have held force in France from the days of Clovis. It is transparent sophistry for the Springfield Republican to say: "It has been made clear to the world that the Vatican sought to preserve the official connection between the two powers, temporal and spiritual." The Vatican sought to preserve the rights guaranteed by a contract and protested against the framing of laws for her government in which she was not even consulted, and which, if carried out, would result in her destruction.

"The State," said the Cardinal, speaking of the United States, "holds over the spiritual rulers the ægis of its protection without interfering with the sacred and God-given rights of conscience." This the Springfield Republican quotes, and yet in the same breath has the temerity to add "such testimony concerning a 'free Church in a free State' deserves to be noted at the Vatican. The more deeply it is pondered, the better surely for the papacy." It is not the Vatican that needs to ponder the words of His Eminence, but the irreligious and Masonic rulers of France and Portugal, who insist that while the State is free to do as it pleases the Church shall be bound hand and foot and accorded that freedom which we accord to the rebel and the slave. His Eminence could never say of France or of Portugal to-day that in those countries the Church and State move on parallel lines. Thanks to the tyranny exercised through iniquitous laws they move on lines diametrically opposite.

"Who but a tyrant," says Edmund Burke, speaking as if in prophecy of our Jacobins of the Third Republic, "could think of seizing the property of men, unaccused, unheard, untried, by whole descriptions, by hundreds and thousands together? Who, that had not lost every trace of humanity, could think of casting down men of exalted rank and sacred function—some of them of an age to call at once for reverence and compassion—of casting them down from the highest situation in the commonwealth, wherein they were maintained by their own landed property, to a state of indigence, depression and contempt? The confiscators truly have made some allowance to their victims from the scraps and fragments of their own tables, from which they have been so harshly driven, and which have been so bountifully spread for a feast to the harpies of usury. But to drive men from independence to live on alms is itself great cruelty. . . . To many minds this punishment of degradation and infamy is worse than death. Undoubtedly, it is an infinite aggravation of this cruel suffering, that the persons who were taught a double prejudice in favor of religion, by education and by the place they held in the administration of its functions, are to receive the remnants of their property as alms from the profane and impious hands of those that had plundered them of all the rest; to receive (if they are at all to receive) . . . from the insolent tenderness of known and avowed atheism the maintenance of religion, measured out to them on the standard of the contempt in which it is held."

Thus did the great Irishman bequeath to after-times his protest against the iniquitous despoilers whose aim was to destroy the Church in France and introduce, like their recent imitators, a system of government in which the name of Christianity and of Church and of God would be a hissing and a mockery. Justly is their memory branded with infamy.

What the Cardinal of Baltimore thinks of the present rulers of France is a matter of record, of which it seems that some writers should be reminded. Of His Eminence's address at the recent celebration the Springfield Republican says: "It was an utterance of an American Cardinal, true to his country and his Church, and it was American to the core." Yes, and we ask, was not the Cardinal equally true to his Church and equally an American to the core when five years ago he said with an eloquence no whit inferior to Burke's:—

"France has treated her noblest citizens with injustice and inhumanity, and America, which has sympathy for the oppressed of all nations, has raised no protest or uttered a word of sympathy.

"If I believed that my countrymen would knowingly see a great beneficent organization unjustly deprived of its property and the means of continued usefulness; would knowingly see tens of thousands of honest men and noble women robbed of their just income and means of support; would knowingly see hundreds of thousands and even millions of people brutally wounded in what they hold dearest and most sacred; would knowingly see a majority in the Chambers utterly disregard and trample upon the rights of the minority and the rights of millions of their countrymen in the name of liberty; would knowingly see tens of thousands of men and women, who happen to be priests and nuns, turned out of their homes for no crime but that of loving God and serving their neighbor—I say if my countrymen can see and recognize all this injustice and tyranny and cruelty and refuse genuine sympathy to those who suffer by them, because of their religious belief, then I will leave life without that faith in American love of justice and liberty and humanity which has been my comfort and support and hope during a long career."

His Eminence has nothing but condemnation for the so-called Republics of France and Portugal in their treatment of the Church, and would denounce the liberty taken with his address in Baltimore, admittedly in such "exquisite taste," to cite it in condemnation of the equally noble stand taken by his brethren in the hierarchy against the men who, under the name of separation of Church and State, destroy the liberties of the Church and trample on her most sacred and inalienable rights.

E. SPILLANE, S.J.

The Coronation

Before the Reformation the crowning of an English king and the consecration of a bishop were much alike in the outward rite. In both occurred the Veni Creator Spiritus, and in both the Litany was recited with special suffrage for the one to be consecrated or crowned, who lay prostrate on the ground. In both was the anointing with chrism, and the tradition of instruments and insignia in words expressive of their meaning. The coronation robes were not unlike some of the episcopal ornaments, as the alb, the tunicle, the stole, the cope; though, of course, the resemblance was no more than material. But the term "coronation," to-day applied to the whole ceremony, was then confined to the imposition of the crown, the entire function being named from the anointing, held to be its most important part, the "benediction," "consecration," or, more commonly, the "sacring" of the king. This similarity was not found in England only, though for obvious reasons we speak at this moment chiefly of that country.

Still there was an essential difference between the two acts. The consecration of a bishop is a sacrament conferring a special sanctifying grace and the indelible character of the episcopate. The sacring of a king conveyed neither grace nor character to the soul. In it the Church prayed for helping grace to enable the sovereign to rule well, but it gave no title to that grace. Still there was evidently an analogy between the two. The Church demands from bishops about to be consecrated the testimony of their election and an oath to perform their office duly; and so it demanded testimony of the king's right in the acceptance of him by the nobles and people present, and bound him by oath to deal with his subjects in justice and mercy, to protect Holy Church, and to respect its rights. The Church recognizes in bishops special prerogatives, springing from their sacred character, not to be violated with impunity, and so, too, it received the king and his prerogatives under its protection as sacred; for all authority is holy since it comes from God. And as the bishop goes forth from his consecration with the episcopal character to be accepted by all and to be impugned by none, so the Church guaranteed solemnly the anointed king's legitimacy to the whole world.

Hence, the coronation was so important that until it was accomplished the sovereign, despite his hereditary right, was hardly more than a king-elect. During the seven years following the death of Charles VI of France, the uncrowned Charles VII was, even to his faithful followers, still the Dauphin, and God had to lead him by the hand of Jeanne, the Maid, to be crowned like his ancestors at Rheims, before he became in name and deed the King. The English and their partisans tried to secure their position by crowning the infant Henry VI, the only English claimant of the French throne ever crowned King of France; though no true Frenchman could recognize the validity of an act done in Paris, not in Rheims, by another than the successor of St. Remigius. Consequently the sacring of the king followed immediately the obsequies of his predecessor. It was not essential. It did not make him king, but it conduced very efficaciously to the happy exercise of his functions. He became by it sacred, and his title was made secure under all but most extraordinary circumstances, and this is the true sense of the words Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Richard II,

"Not all the waters in the rude, rough sea

Can wash the balm from an anointed king."

And all this was eminently right. Supreme authority in the civil order is from God, and he who exercises it does so in the name of God, the author and infinite ruler of human society, in which by divine ordinance man must live to work out his appointed task for time and for eternity. But in instituting civil society God bound it to no special form. Every legitimate form is acceptable to Him, the republic no less than the monarchy, the limited monarchy no less than the absolute, and their rulers are by right all equally His representatives, the president no less than the king. But the spiritual society is His direct creation. He has determined its form, its constitution, and has made its dominion conterminous with the world. He dwells in it as he dwells in no civil society; its rulers are his vice-gerents as no temporal rulers can be. To it these, no less than their people, are subject in all that concerns faith and morals, for it is the infallible guide of all in the way of truth and justice. Hence, by clothing civil society with its lustre and confirming civil rulers with its authority, the Church confers upon both that solidity which is the greatest social good. If, to-day, conditions are such that these advantages cannot be enjoyed to the full, this is a misfortune to be bewailed, rather than an emancipation to be gloried in, unless the words of St. Paul have ceased to be true: "There is no power but from God: and those that are, are ordained of God."

The Revolution changed all this, and the ephemeral revolutionary kings of Europe think little of a coronation. For the solemnities of Rheims Louis Philippe substituted the oath to the Charter in a paltry ceremony that was the laughingstock of the day. Napoleon I called himself Charlemagne, and would establish himself by being crowned by the Pope; but he played a shabby trick on the Holy Father, taking with his own hands the crown he was to wear for barely ten years. Like him, though with some excuse, the Russian Czar and the German Kaiser crown themselves. Napoleon III dreamed of a coronation by Pius IX. His unchristian conduct made it impossible, and he took the road from Sedan to Wilhelmshöhe, a fallen, uncrowned emperor. The old rite survives in some way in England, deprived of its Catholic character, perverted by Protestant additions and by changes made in favor of the exaggerated Stuart notion of divine right. The sacring has become a shadow of a great name. What is the use of praying God to establish with His free and princely spirit, or of undertaking to anoint, as Solomon was anointed, one who has no exercise of royal authority? What is the use of exhorting to stop with the sword of justice the growth of iniquity, to protect the Church, to restore what is decayed, to preserve what is restored, etc., one whose action depends wholly on his ministers? If some such ceremony were used over Mr. Balfour and Mr. Austin Chamberlain, Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George, according as they alternate in office, more good might be hoped for than can come from one who, were he to attempt to be king in the sense of the coronation service, would see his reign come to an untimely end.

Another question. Why is it that the Stuarts—Elizabeth was crowned in the old Catholic way—preserved the coronation rite, adding to it their exaggerations of the royal power, while the rite of consecrating bishops was maimed and mutilated, shorn of everything Catholic, and infected through and through with Protestantism? The answer to this should throw great light on the Anglican theory of continuity.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The New Sodality Rules

The Sodality of Our Lady is "a religious body which aims at fostering in its members an ardent devotion, reverence and filial love towards the Blessed Virgin Mary. Through this devotion and the protection of so good a Mother, it seeks to make the faithful gathered together under Our Lady's name good Catholics, sincerely bent on sanctifying themselves each in his state of life, and zealous, as far as their condition in life permits, to save and sanctify their neighbor and to defend the Church of Jesus Christ against the attacks of the wicked."

This first number of the new Rules immediately singles out the Sodality of Our Lady as essentially a select body, a character which has been several times declared by competent authority, and is clear of itself from the aims which the Sodality professes, for surely to "be sincerely bent on sanctifying" oneself is not an object of the many. In this way, besides others, the Sodality differs from the Apostleship of Prayer, which only requires the simple and easy-going morning intention as its essential practice. For a similar reason it differs from many other excellent associations of piety and zeal, precious as is their work for souls.

The power to make Rules for Sodalities in Jesuit Houses and Churches was placed by Gregory XIII and his successors in the hands of the General of the Society of Jesus. The General has three times since the beginning issued Sodality Rules. The first time was shortly after the Roman College Senior Sodality of Our Lady of the Annunciation (it then had no secondary title) became the head and mother of all Sodalities, namely, in 1587. The second time was just after the definition of the Immaculate Conception, in 1855. The third was in the year 1910.

Needless to say, these Common Rules, as they are called, are not exactly identical. Indeed, those of 1855 present striking difference from those of 1587, and the new Rules differ in certain important features from both. This, although the general lines of tradition are faithfully preserved throughout.

As we have mentioned the Common Rules previous to 1910, we may call attention to the fact that the "General Statutes," first published in 1885, and found in the "Directions" issued up to 1907, are not a Sodality Rule at all, but only the nucleus of one. Some writers have been misled by their manner of publication into giving them a higher importance.

So much for the Common Rules in general. Let us now note some salient features of the new ones.

First come the particular means of sanctification proposed. Besides the avoidance of sin and of whatever may give disedification to others, the Rules set down as daily practices, vocal and mental prayer, Holy Mass and Communion, spiritual reading and examination of conscience. Among less frequent practices, Confession to a regular Confessor is urged, as also a General Confession during the year, faithful attendance at the weekly or more frequent meetings, with the devotions and the instruction and exhortation from the Director which these imply, the General Communions, once a month, the celebration of the one of two titular feasts, and the yearly Retreat. There is a hint also of the practice of Monthly Recollection.

These are the specific helps for personal sanctification offered by the Sodality. The works of charity and of zeal for the neighbor are also of various kinds. First come the traditional ones—"the teaching of Catechism, visiting the sick in hospitals, and those confined in prisons—works to which the early Sodalities devoted themselves with great zeal." After them are mentioned in general "others like these, as the circumstances of our times may in different places require."

It will readily be seen that the double program contained in the above paragraphs involves very serious application on the part of the Sodalists, individually and as a body, not to speak of the grave nature of the Director's duties, who is charged with fostering the interior spirit which is to animate this program and with guiding the spiritual, intellectual and material forces meant to conduce to the grand result.

What has so far been noticed is not new in Sodalities of Our Lady. The practice, no doubt, has often failed of the high standard set, but the things prescribed have always been prescribed since the first Rules were made in 1587.

But the Rules of 1910 are not wanting in several new and very interesting and important details, which we may now briefly indicate. First in practical import is the insistence on frequent and daily Communion. The Holy Table has always been frequented by Sodalists more than by ordinary Catholics, but the practice has never been so strongly urged as in the present Rules, which expect the Sodalists to "consider as addressed in a special manner to them the invitation to frequent and daily Communion, which the Holy See has made to all the faithful." If one remembers the late Decrees of the Holy See on this subject, and also the high aim of the Sodality of Our Lady, he will not wonder at this modern addition to the Rules.

The second new detail is formed by what are called Sections. Through specially chosen officers, the Sodality manages a number of Committees, "each with an organization and life of its own," among whom its members are distributed. The Committees are technically known as Sections, and each has charge of some department of the common good works, whether of piety or of zeal, and consists of such Sodalists as desire to join it. In this way—to give one instance—the great Barcelona Sodality of Our Lady Immaculate and St. Aloysius has a Section for the practice of devotion to Our Lady, for promoting daily Communion, for managing hospital work, for the teaching of Catechism, for the giving of lectures on social and economic subjects to workmen, for the apostolate of the press. The purpose of this institution of Sections is to enable each Sodalist to choose the particular form of work which is most to his taste, and so to employ himself in some way to advantage; the grand result aimed at—that of "procuring the greatest possible holiness for the members and of extending to many others their salutary influence for the good of souls"—being much more satisfactorily attained than if the Sodality, as a unit, attempted to conduct the works.

Another new feature are the Academies. These are helps to the literary and scientific development of the members, especially in "questions connected with Catholic faith and morals." Bodies of this kind are found in our American Sodality debating societies and lecture series, and appear in some of the entertainments got up or managed by Sodalities. Academy work in connection with Sodalities is very old, but is not mentioned in the Rules preceding the present.

Still another new detail of the Rules is the place assigned in them to the Director. This has always been a prominent one, and the Director has always been the guiding spirit of these bodies, which considerably differ in this way from self-governing associations. But no other Common Rules have spoken so clearly on the subject as do the present ones. As their starting point, these call attention to the Brief Laudabile Romanorum of Benedict XIV, and from that outline the Director's rights and duties towards the Sodality in a masterly way. He is the head of the body, subject, of course, to his ecclesiastical Superiors, but over all the Sodalists, singly and collectively. The Officers derive their authority from him; he defines its limits and can withdraw it when he thinks good. His consent is a necessary element in every vote of the Council; without it no act of theirs is valid. The Officers, one and all, from the Prefect down, are best named by him, and are required to report to him and receive instructions from him. Provided he does not touch the Common Rules, he has even power to make new regulations and change old ones, without the concurrence of the Council, and in receptions into the Sodality he is the only one who has authority for the act, which he can perform without any consent of Council or Sodality, given or asked.

While very important and far-reaching, all this is not new, but it is newly and clearly expressed in the Rules of 1910, which leave no doubt and are not vague in the matter. Of course the Rules do not recommend the Director to discard his Officers and Council and manage without them. Quite the contrary is the intention, as prudence requires. Under the new Rule, no less than formerly, the Prefect and the Council will be the visible authority in all Sodalities, their advice will be asked and usually, if not always, followed. No step of importance will be taken without its being thoroughly discussed in Council and without the course to be followed being agreed on there. And the execution of the Council's decrees will be entrusted to the proper Officers no less now than formerly. A Director who would manage differently would make a vast mistake and probably land his Sodality in the slough of inertia.

There are two other items in these Rules which call for remark. Both are entirely new features and both are concerned with the intercommunication of Sodalities. The first is the approbation of Sodality Congresses. Of this event in Sodality life the readers of AMERICA have already heard something, and it is to be hoped that so powerful and modern a means of success will soon be employed in America. Certainly there is plenty of zeal among our Sodalists to take the work in hand, and we are convinced that the Hierarchy, most of whom, undoubtedly, are Sodalists of Our Lady from their college days, would only be too ready to accept the leadership. Neither are our numbers small. Accurate statistics on the matter cannot as yet be given, but one can guess that there must be at least 2,000 Sodalities in the United States, with certainly 200,000 members, all told.

The second new item is the Rule regarding the publication of Sodality periodicals, "which treat of Sodality matters and foster the Sodality spirit in their readers." Of these there are already as many as ten, in nearly as many languages. The earliest we know of was founded in 1895, and now boasts of 15,000 subscribers, being an exceedingly well written and interesting monthly called Die Fahne Mariens, published in Vienna. It was started by the Prefects of four Viennese Sodalities of men.

The third new detail is the proposal to bring Sodalities together in a permanent league, especially those of the same class or the same country. This has been done already in some countries, where a common Council has been established, sometimes under the headship of a priest or prelate named by the bishop or bishops concerned.

The Rules of 1910 are formally approved by Father General Wernz "to be the Common Rules for the use of all Sodalities of Our Lady erected in Houses or Churches of the Society of Jesus." In the new "Official Directory," just published in English, a few words have been added in proper places to adapt the Rules to non-Jesuit Sodalities also, to which the "Directory" recommends their use.

Such are the new Sodality Rules. It is not too much to expect that their publication will lead to more and more fidelity to Sodality ideals, and will contribute powerfully, not only to the spread of the devotion to Our Lady, but also to the greater sanctification of all her children, and to their work for the neighbor in every walk of life, as her faithful and devoted Sodalists.

ELDER MULLAN, S.J.

Ireland's Population

The Irish census returns for the last seven decades are among the most sadly pathetic records, if not absolutely the saddest, in modern history. Each new announcement of Ireland's population is scanned with a wider and more sympathetic interest than is excited by such figures in other lands, for the steady efflux of her emigrants has created throughout the world a public interested by birth and blood in this, the pithiest answer to the old question, "How is old Ireland and how does she stand?" So far the reply has been, unfortunately, but a statistical translation of the refrain, "She's the most distressful country that ever yet was seen"; and for a much graver reason than that given in the ballad. The loss of "men and women" by famine and emigration has been incalculably more terrible than it ever had been by "hanging," even in Cromwellian days. In sixty-five years, despite an unusually high birth-rate, the population has been cut in half. Every decade showed a decrease so appalling and so monotonously constant as to threaten the speedy extinction of the nation. One year only, 1908, had an increase, which, however slight, carried a message of hope. The latest decennial figures still mark a decline, but so small, comparatively, that it indicates a stoppage of the outflow and gives promise that the next census will register a turn in the tide.

The present population of Ireland is 4,381,951. At the end of the seventeenth century, the battles, famines, massacres and expatriations of the Elizabethan, Cromwellian and Williamite wars and similar causes had reduced the population, according to the reckoning of Captain South of the Royal Society, to a little over one million. This estimate was probably too low, as some forty years later Dobbs, adopting fairly reliable methods, set it down as slightly under three millions. The Hearth Tax figures show that at the end of the eighteenth century the numbers had risen to four millions and a quarter. The upward tendency had begun during the period of Irish trade described by Swift as "glorious and flourishing," and was further stimulated by the "Free Trade" of the Volunteers, and the fresh impulse and helpful encouragement given to Irish industries by the Grattan Parliament, 1782-1800.

This "Free Trade," it should be noted, was something quite different from that of Cobden and Bright. Whenever Irish industries, such as tobacco and woollens, began to rival those of England or her colonies, the British Parliament promptly forbade their export or ordered their discontinuance. The armed Volunteers affixed to their cannons the legend, "Free Trade or else—" It was at the end of the American Revolution, and their demand was granted. It was a question of free exports, not of imports, for Ireland had then within her borders both in manufactured and raw materials more than her domestic needs required. The Napoleonic wars, and, later, the protective system, kept up the prices of agricultural products; home-raised wool and wheat, manufactured in their own mills, supplied the people with clothes and bread; the potato crop was abundant and healthy; a morality of probably unequaled purity prevailed in family life; and so the population rose till in 1846 it approached nine millions.

They were strong men and healthy women. Luxury and vice were both unknown to them, and O'Connell did not exaggerate when he declared them "the finest peasantry in the world." Throbbing with vigorous life, they gathered in hundreds of thousands around their great leader to hear the story of their wrongs and rights; and, tiring of hope deferred, they were "burning," to use their own expression, "for Dan to give the word." The wisdom of his refusal to give the word of war has been often asserted and denied; but Famine came, and soon there were no strong men, and the only word the starving populace could hear was death or exile.

The census of 1851 shows a decrease of 1,622,319, or 19.8 per cent. on that of 1841. Eloquent as the figures are, they do not express the full horror of the situation. The decline commenced in 1847, when the usual increase would have brought the 8,196,597 of 1841 to at least 8,700,000. The population in 1851 had fallen to 6,574,278; that is, in four years of peace Ireland lost over 2,100,000 persons, or twenty-four per cent. of its people. Most of them died of starvation or cholera at home, or of typhus contracted in the foul fever-ships in which the emigrants were huddled. Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet, who was Resident Physician of the New York Emigrant Refuge Hospital in 1850, describes in "Incidents of My Life" (1911) the horrible condition of the surviving remnants of those death-traps; and he also shows that the foodstuffs exported from Ireland during the famine years to pay rents and taxes were more than tenfold sufficient to have fed the people and saved a million lives.

"A second or third rate despot," says Sir William Butler in his Autobiography, "would have at least parried the blow." A constitutional government, he sarcastically observed, could not modify its system to meet the crisis, but it could suspend its constitution by Coercion Acts and organize or permit "Crowbar Brigades" to tear down the homes of the starving, impoverished peasants. Of one such eviction he writes: "I was twelve years old at the time; but I think if a loaded gun had been put into my hands I would have fired into that crowd of villains as they plied their horrible trade."

The landlord continued to exact and augment his rents, and, if the tenant made an improvement, to put a rent on that. Thereto were added Gladstone's rearrangement of the financial terms of the Union, by which Ireland was more heavily mulcted; the development of cotton manufacture and of other machine-made goods in England, killing off the remains of Irish industries; the establishment of Free Trade and the consequent influx of raw products from non-rent-paying countries at terms with which Irish agriculture could not compete; and the crushing of hope by the rejection of every remedial measure and by the persistent operation of a system which left Ireland "a corpse on a dissecting table." The picture of Davis became terribly realistic: "In a climate soft as a mother's smile, in a soil fruitful as God's love, the Irish peasant mourns"; and the peasant's most enterprising sons and daughters, and often all his family, set out for lands where mourning would not mingle with their bread.

The second decade after the famine showed a shrinkage of 11.8 per cent, and the third 6.7, reducing the population to 5,412,377. Church Disestablishment, and the Gladstone Land Act of 1871 acknowledging the tenant's property in the soil, were probably instrumental in lowering the next decennial decline to 4.4 per cent., but the famine of the early eighties, with the consequent agrarian troubles and the unsettled conditions that ensued under coercive government, raised the percentage of 1881-1891 to 9.1. The Ashbourne and Wyndham Land Purchase Acts and the County Councils gave to the people the ownership of the land, or promise of it, and some responsibility for its management, and in 1901 the percentage fell to 5.2. These measures continued to work satisfactorily and were further developed; plots and cottages were extensively provided for the laboring classes; the Gaelic League rose and flourished, stimulating self-help and creating a new interest in the native language, music, customs, and industries, and in everything distinctive of Ireland; the Irish Party, after winning many practical advantages, including an acceptable settlement of university education, made the grant of self-government appear within measurable distance; and for the first time since 1846 there was one year, 1908, in which Ireland's population increased.

The census for 1901-1911 shows a loss of 76,824, or 1.7 per cent., but reveals several assuring signs of a turn in the tide. It is the only one since 1851 in which any province has had an increase. Leinster has gained, while Ulster's loss is slight. It is the agricultural districts of Connaught and Munster in which land purchase has not made progress that have suffered most, and this condition is being gradually remedied. The already high birth-rate has become higher and the death-rate considerably lower. Ireland's external trade increased more than 50 per cent. in the decade, totaling for 1909 $625,000,000, and showing by its nature, as well as amount, varied agricultural and industrial progress. "Wherever one looks in Ireland now," writes Mr. Boland, M.P., by whose efforts the Irish National Trade-mark was officially recognized, "there is visible the laying of strong foundations for a nation's progress. Freedom to raise the edifice cannot be long denied us."

Hence, there is good hope that the next census will show Ireland well on its way back to the figures of 1841. Expectations of an immediate reversal of conditions are unreasonable; even a strong Irish government, soundly financed and empowered to stimulate industrial activities, will not stop emigration all at once. Deep-rooted evils are not eradicated in a day. The attracting influence of brethren or relatives across the seas—and every Irish family has them—will continue to operate for a while; the illusion of easy gold on foreign strands will not vanish at once, nor will young people cease to follow rain-bows. But there will be also counter attractions; a happy, prosperous, Catholic Ireland, educated and educating with the intelligent and forceful zeal of old, should draw many an exile home.

America will rejoice to see "the Light of the West," which Sir William Butler saw carried to the New World in the fifties, relit in its native shrine. "It came, borne by the hands of Ireland's starving children. The old man tottered with the precious burthen from the fever-stricken ship; the child carried the light in feeble hands to the shore; the strong man bore it to the Western prairies and into the cañons of snowy sierras; the maiden brought it into the homestead to be a future dower to her husband and a legacy to her children. . . ." It is gratifying that new conditions promise to unroll the clouds which for centuries obscured that light in Ireland and enable it to shine with the effulgence which won for her the title, "Insula sanctorum et doctorum."

M. KENNY, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

Pope Commends the School of Higher Music

ROME, June 4, 1911.

The Holy Father's seventy-sixth birthday fell on Friday, June 2, and he was the recipient of congratulations innumerable from home and abroad. At his Mass in the morning he administered First Communion to the little daughter of the Chilian Ambassador to the Holy See, Señor Errazzuriz y Urmeneta. He has held no public audiences during the week, but has daily received in private audience a number of bishops, officials and distinguished Catholic laymen. The entire membership of the School of Higher Music was presented to him one day, and after greeting each one personally, he made a little address of commendation to the school and of congratulation to Father De Santi, S.J., its founder. He has appointed Cardinal Cassetta Prefect of the Congregation of Studies in place of the late Cardinal Cavichioni.

The Congregation of Rites on Tuesday resumed the question of the canonization of Blessed John Eudes, took up the introduction of the beatification of the Passionist Father Dominick of the Mother of God, confirmed the devotion exhibited from time immemorable to the Augustinian Archbishop of Naples, James Capocci, the revision of the writings of the servants of God, James Sales and William Saltamoch, priest and laybrother, respectively, of the Society of Jesus, as well as of Father Magino Catala of the Friars Minor.

Owing to the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of the Portuguese bishops having the encyclical, which the Holy Father dispatched to them early in the week, printed in Portugal, it has been translated here into Portuguese, printed and forwarded to Portugal. Recalcitrant governments in the olden time were wont to prevent the faithful from receiving documents from the Holy See. It remains to be seen whether the present travesty on human government in Portugal will rise successfully to the malicious ingenuity of their heretical forbears.

Last Sunday, from the parish church of San Lorenzo, over five thousand people joined piously in the procession in honor of our Blessed Mother for the closing of the month of May. The anticlerical papers had called upon the Giordano Brunoites to gather in force to break up the procession. The policing of the neighborhood during the procession was perfect and doubtless foreseen, as only seventeen of the champions of Giordano appeared to view in silent disapproval the manifestation of Catholic faith and devotion. From Milan comes the canard that a strictly Catholic political party is being formed, entirely independent of the Holy See, but with its approbation. "Iniquitas mentita est sibi," but that is no novelty in newspaper circles on either side of the water.

To-day the monument to Vittorio Emmanuele is to be dedicated, and the syndics, or local mayors, of some eight thousand municipalities were invited; some five thousand have come; three thousand have declined. Italy is not as United as it would like to appear. The organized republicans would not come, because Mancini and Garibaldi have been put aside for the glory of this first King of United Italy, and they have no use for kings, anyway. The organized socialists will not enthuse, for the reason that they are deeply dissatisfied with the condition of the laboring classes under this kingship business. The Catholic organizations refuse to formally share in the celebration, because, while they rejoice over the union of Italy, and over Rome as its capital, they consider the want of freedom and security of the Holy Father, the head of the legally established religion of the land, guaranteed by special legislation, grossly and deliberately violated by the present government. In Parliament, Podrecca, the editor of Il Asino, who is a member of the body, provoked the government to declare that they had suspended several Catholic syndics who had refused to have anything to do with the celebration, and then went on to chide the government for having appointed Catholic mayors in four districts where the voting populace had returned four Israelite members to Parliament. He added that the Archbishop of New York also should be in the black books for his interference with the coming of the spending Manhattanite to the joy-feast.

Meanwhile the government must have money, and the people of Nicotera have this week risen in riot against the excessive taxation, and were promised for their pacification that the tax on hearth-fires would be remitted; still they are not content. The government has launched a gigantic Exposition lottery, out of which they expect to raise millions; but the latest project is to make a government monopoly of life insurance, and, judging by the wealth stowed away in the great companies in New York, that ought to pay the expenses even of this extravagant government; that is, if they will spend all of the receipts, which they will doubtless do, relying on the credit of the country to pay policies as they become due.

It is really not so far from New York to Rome. Here last week one Col. Frederick Cummings of the U. S. A. (sic) cleaned the gullible Roman in a few days out of six thousand lire with a bogus employment bureau, and that without the help of the name of the Thane of Skibo. What's in a name after all? There are already two Cummingses and only one Andrew.

On next Saturday among those ordained to the priesthood will be from the American College Bernard McNamara of Baltimore; Thomas Carroll, James Flanagan, Christopher Molloy and James Rogers of Brooklyn; Leo Gifford, Richard Haverlin and Joseph Murphy of Boston; Paul Drevniak, John Ford, Moses Kiley and John Lannon of Chicago; John Hennessy of Dubuque; Eugene Burke of Newark; Martin Cavanagh of New York, and Edward McCarthy of Seattle. As a result of this year's examinations at the Propaganda, the American College will send home thirteen doctors of theology to the United States.

The Congregation of Rites has held its session for the discussion and decision on the heroic virtue of the Venerable John Nepomucen Neumann, Bishop of Philadelphia, and the result will be announced shortly.

Father Filippo Maroto and Father Antonio Velarde, both regulars, have been appointed consultants of the Sacred Congregation of the Council.

News has come from the Argentine Republic of the appointment of Señor Angelo Estrada as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Holy See, in place of the late Minister Donaziano del Campillo.

There has been an energetic revival of the agitation to make Rome again a maritime port by suitable connection with the sea at Ostia, the National Industrial Congress at Turin calling on the government in strong terms to put into execution the recommendations of the Ministerial Commission on Internal Navigation in this regard.

The Cardinal-Vicar has prescribed that, owing to the uncertainty of public feeling at present, the Rogation processions of next week shall be confined within the limits of the respective churches. He has also summoned the Roman clergy for the 22d instant to elect the Camerlengo of the diocese of Rome.

The English Ladies of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin, nothing daunted by uncertain rumors, have purchased a new place on Via Nomentana, at the terminus of the tramway, near Sant' Agnese, and will open a boarding school there in the fall.

C. M.

The Millenary of Normandy

PARIS, June 3, 1911.

Within the last few years local celebrations, pageants, processions, fêtes, instituted with a view to reviving the past glories of a province, or even a town, have become the fashion throughout France. This simple fact touches on wider issues than appear at first sight; it is only one feature among many of the movement called here régionalisme, a movement the object of which is to preserve the traditions, literature, artistic treasures and local legends of the ancient French provinces, that, since the Revolution of 1789, have been, geographically at least, merged into the departments. This modern method of dividing the country may be practical, but it is essentially unhistorical, besides being unpicturesque. The names of most departments have no particular meaning, whereas those of the ancient provinces unfold pages of glorious or, at any rate, eventful history. They also convey a distinct idea of the individuality and racial characteristics of the inhabitants. A native of "le département du Var" means nothing; a "Provençal" brings up the vision of the son of a light-hearted, sunny, artistic race, half Greek and wholly original, as distinct as possible from his Norman, Burgundian, Gascon or Flemish cousins.

A movement must be commended that preserves all that is most valuable in the history of a country; that enriches the nation's heritage by adding the treasures of its past to the achievements of its present. This is especially precious in France, where political passions are curiously destructive in their tendencies and are apt to wage war against local and historical monuments and traditions; indeed, in the Government schools French children are taught to believe that the history of their country is only worth knowing since 1789!

The secret of the attitude of the men in power towards the past lies partly in the fact that the history of old France is closely bound up with the history of the Catholic Church, and for this reason the Church acts wisely and well to assert her place in local celebrations that appeal strongly to the imaginative and emotional French people.

Thus, on occasion of the Millenary of Normandy that was celebrated this week, Mgr. Fuzet, Archbishop of Rouen, Primate of Normandy, commanded a solemn Triduum to take place from May 28 to May 30. In an eloquent pastoral letter he pointed out to his people that the Church was justified in celebrating a national event that was brought about chiefly by her means. He advised his diocesans to conciliate the claims of the past and those of the present: "so that while they show that they are men of tradition, they may more safely be the men of the future, who thank God for the country and the lineage that He has given them, and who remain faithful to Him in their loyal faith and generous love."

This was brought out in eloquent language by Mgr. Touchet, Bishop of Orleans, himself a Norman by birth, who preached in the glorious Cathedral of Rouen, "the heart of Normandy." Sixteen archbishops and bishops were present as well as a delegation of English Catholics, led by Bishop Keating of Northampton. On the previous evening the English pilgrims joined in a manifestation in honor of Jeanne d'Arc, that took place on the Place du Vieux Marché, where she was executed.

Mgr. Touchet is among the finest French orators of the day; his theme was the exchange of gifts that was the result of the treaty of St. Clair sur Epte. France, through her bishops, bestowed on the Normans the precious gifts of faith and baptism, of Christian influences and methods; the Northmen, in return, brought to the country that adopted them their vigorous and adventurous blood, their genius for fighting and for building, their adaptability and intelligence, the supple, clear and active brains that enabled the Scandinavian pirates to become in a comparatively short space of time distinguished agriculturists, merchants, artists and writers.

While in the Cathedral of Rouen thousands of hearers hung spellbound on the lips of the Bishop of Orleans, several local literary and historical societies assembled at the small town of St. Clair sur Epte; a marble tablet was erected on the bridge where, says tradition, Charles the Simple and the Northman Rollo had their memorable interview. The tablet bears the following inscription:

911

At St. Clair sur Epte, was concluded the treaty by which Rollo and the Normans were established in France. The grateful Normans to their ancestors, 1911.

Monday, 29th, the second day of the Triduum, a monument to the late Cardinal Thomas, Archbishop of Rouen, was unveiled, and in the afternoon Mgr. Fuzet, his successor, received the English pilgrims at Bon Secours, a famous shrine that stands in a unique position on a steep hill above Rouen. The entente cordiale—of which so much has been said and written—is never more solid and secure than when based upon a common faith. The presence of the pilgrims from England was even more typical of this good feeling when, on the next day, May 30th, they were present at the inauguration of the statue and altar that have been erected to Jeanne d'Arc within the Cathedral of Rouen. It was the anniversary of the execution of the "Maid of France," an execution in which both France and England played an evil part. The memory of the girl-warrior was thus aptly commemorated by the nation whom she freed and the nation against whom she fought, now united by a link of sympathy and by a common feeling of atonement towards the injured heroine.

Again Mgr. Touchet ascended the pulpit. On the previous Sunday he had related in eloquent language the history of the province, whose millenary is a national event; this time he naturally spoke only of Jeanne, the inspired peasant girl, whose courage, born of faith, is a living lesson to her countrymen, and whose memory is so tragically connected with the City of Rouen. The Bishop of Orleans is a born orator, his impassioned, picturesque and vivid speech, very French in its somewhat florid eloquence, appealed so strongly to his hearers that at certain passages they openly testified their approval.

The civil and official fêtes of the Millenary of Normandy will take place at a later date, under the patronage of the Government. They will undoubtedly be picturesque and interesting, but the French Catholics may be allowed to rejoice that the Church, which is systematically excluded from these public celebrations, has, through the happy initiative of the Archbishop of Rouen, celebrated in her own way an event in which her representatives played so important a part. The ideal of French Catholics would be to see the Church and State joining hands in matters that touch the interests, past or present, of the country, but this cannot be under the present Government. The men in power have over and over again, in the fêtes of Orleans, for instance, signified their intention of preventing any contact between the official and ecclesiastical element; hence the necessity in which the Church is placed of acting independently and of asserting her right to celebrate national events on her own ground. She thus proclaims a fact that cannot be brought too often before the public: that in the twentieth century, as in the tenth, patriotism and religion go hand in hand.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Cuban Politics

CIENFUEGOS, CUBA, June 2, 1911.

It is almost two years before the next presidential election, yet the question of prospective candidates is already discussed with much warmth. There are three political parties in Cuba, namely, the Conservative, the Liberal, to which President Gómez belongs, and a wing of the Liberal headed by Vice-President Zayas. Several attempts have been made to unite the two wings of the Liberal party, and a coalition was effected at the recent election; but the union is not strong, and promises to break up in preparing for the next election.

President Gómez has publicly declared that he does not wish to be re-elected, but, in spite of his assertions, many refuse to believe that he is sincere in his protestations; and it is clear to all that his particular partisans are taking steps to insure his candidacy. All this is disagreeable to Señor Zayas, who is frankly a candidate for the office; for his following is numerically inferior to that of Gómez, and he would lose the support of some were Gómez to run for another term.

The Conservative candidate, Señor Menocal, who was defeated at the late election, has signified, like Gómez, his intention to seek no more presidential honors, but his followers will not hear of any other candidate. Menocal is manager of one of the largest sugar plants in Cuba. His former companions in arms, for he fought for independence, have issued a manifesto to the people and have called on them to support him at the polls.

As a matter of fact, difference of party in Cuba does not denote a difference of political principle or ideal, while in what is nominally the same party there is ample room for various tendencies. Some politicians, for example, always have a warlike spirit. If they are defeated at the polls or are disappointed in their expectations for a political job, they are ready with threats of uprisings and revolutions.

S. B. S.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; SECRETARY, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The "Independent" Once More

We are inexpressibly shocked at the gross discourtesy exhibited in the editorial columns of the Independent for June 15, 1911, when referring to a recent ecclesiastical appointment. We commend the person who is guilty of it to another editorial entitled "Spiritual Impudence" in the same issue.

"Spiritual Impudence" says the writer, who seems to be a past master in his subject, "is another thing from spiritual impotence, and may characterize those who may have a very positive spiritual nature, but who insist that their sort of spiritual experience on religious belief shall be imposed on other people, or those who are shameless in making public their own intimate experiences and emotions. The older meaning of impudence is that of the Latin impudicitia, immodesty, shamelessness. It is the fault of low culture among those who have not the reserved gentlemanly instinct."

Sane Fourth Movement

Efforts to devise effective and entertaining ways of keeping Independence Day are multiplying, one is happy to note, and it appears altogether likely that the movement started in most of our large cities for a reasonable celebration of our birthday as a nation will be a successful one. Certain it is that plans being evolved in the great civic centres this year will make the Fourth of July an appropriate, interesting and beautiful festival, instead of a public nuisance and peril. These plans have developed two principal phases; one is the direct attack upon the use of explosives, the other is the substitution of other and saner means of celebrating the national holiday.

It is more than five years since the Chicago Tribune inaugurated its crusade against the destruction of life and limb by explosives used in the holiday-making on Fourth of July. Year after year it has been compiling a record of Fourth of July casualties and publishing the results for the information of the whole country. The facts it collected formed a tragic story. They challenged the attention of the press and the public, and for the first time public opinion began to crystalize against the evil.

Last year the Tribune's record told us that 131 lives were lost, that 2,923 persons were wounded, that the fire loss to property was enormous. Its story of the day's mishaps and fatalities reads like the tale of a battle. What more is required to educate the people to a realization of the gravity of the evil and to bend every effort to make an end of it? By all means, let the record be a text to be used by press and pulpit in all parts of the United States that the Sane Fourth movement may spread and grow in force everywhere.

Duez Called to Trial

By this time the people of France will have been informed officially of the wretched story of the Duez stealings. Duez, it will be remembered, was judicial administrator for the civil tribunal of the Department of the Seine. In that capacity, in the proceedings following the enactment of the laws dealing with the suppression of religious congregations in France, the liquidation of the property of thirteen of these bodies was entrusted to him. Duez discharged the trust to such good effect that he was arraigned in court on June 12 on an indictment which affirms that he had embezzled $1,150,000 whilst liquidating some $2,000,000 for the religious congregations. The peculations began in 1903, and covered a period of five or six years. Rumors of what was being done had been bandied about almost from the moment Duez commenced his work, but the Government was strangely remiss in giving heed to reports until the matter became a notorious scandal in officialdom. In March, 1910, Duez was arrested, and shortly thereafter he frankly admitted his stealings, explaining that he had been unfortunate in speculations on the bourse. His private secretary, Martin Gauthier, who was arrested with him and later released on $8,000 bail, has since fled the country, and is believed to be in hiding here in the United States. It is openly charged that Gauthier was allowed to escape, as he knew too much, and if brought to the witness stand against Duez might tell discomforting tales touching men higher up in official places. It will be interesting to note just what will be done to punish Duez, who, since his arrest last year, has been living quietly in Paris, apparently unconcerned over his impending trial. Whatever punishment shall be decreed will avail little in making good the disappearance of the millions which the despoilers had boasted were to be used in various projects for the social betterment of the poor and afflicted of the country.

A Catholic Daily

A recent issue of the Brooklyn College Bulletin discusses sanely and modestly the question of a Catholic daily paper. It states that a committee has been formed in New York of prominent Catholic gentlemen of experience and wisdom, who are devising ways and means for the successful pursuit of this important enterprise. Some time ago we heard that another committee, with the same purpose in view, had been formed in Brooklyn, composed of journalists, editors, business men, lawyers, bankers, who are apt to give the matter prudent and practical consideration. The formation of these two committees in such great centres of Catholicity as Brooklyn and Manhattan, where the Church is represented by men of culture as well as by men of wealth and influence, and the assurance that these committees will be keen to see the difficulties of the enterprise and to devise ways and means of grappling with them, are a hopeful indication of the seriousness with which the matter is considered and a reliable guarantee that forward steps will be taken, provided the project be at all feasible.

We are not of those who believe that the management of a daily newspaper would present fewer difficulties than those which have been successfully met with in the establishment of several of our successful Catholic weeklies. This, however, is a matter in which only the unsophisticated may differ; but men who have reached the age of discretion will undoubtedly realize the magnitude of the task, whether relatively great or not, which the founding of a representative Catholic daily implies. With the funds on hand to float the enterprise, with financial backing to carry it on in times of stress and storm, and with the management in safe and competent hands, there is little to fear from an apathetic or indifferent laity. We should be the last to deprecate the proposal of a Catholic daily. At the same time a friendly warning, not given with the intention of blocking the venture or rendering its achievement more difficult, may save many heartburnings over financial failure or unsuccessful accomplishment. By all means let us have a Catholic daily, and bravo to the men who will conceive the plan and carry it out successfully.

Santo Tomás, Manila

In another quarter of a century Harvard will celebrate its tercentennial, the famous school having had its beginning at Newtown, now Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1636. It is commonly thought to be the oldest institution of learning within the limits covered by the American flag; in reality, however, that honor belongs to another school. The three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the most ancient university in an American domain was celebrated in April last, when the Dominican Fathers in Manila solemnly commemorated the founding of the University of Santo Tomás in 1611.

Twenty-six years before the first building was erected at Harvard the doors of this school were opened to the young men of the Philippines. Bishop Miguel de Benavides, a Dominican and the first Archbishop of Manila who personally directed the affairs of that archdiocese for any length of time, provided the funds for the initial endowment of Santo Tomás. It was successful from the start, and was confirmed as a pontifical university in 1645, and as a royal university in 1680. In 1836 the Senate of Santo Tomás petitioned Spain for authority to establish a chair of Spanish and Insular Law. The request was granted and the law department of the university was then begun. To complete the faculties and to make Santo Tomás a full university, with every needed equipment for advanced professional training, departments of medicine and pharmacy were opened in 1871.

The chief glory of the venerable school is its University Press, established at the end of the sixteenth century, before the first classes had been organized in the university. Since 1623 the University Press has been an important element of the scholarly life of Santo Tomás, and during its long career it has issued countless works of a religious and educational character, not only in the modern and classical languages, but in various native dialects of the Islands. Greek, Hebrew and Sanskrit are included in its rich assortment of type.

American Catholics are glad to recognize in the memories the celebration in Manila awakened another evidence of the zeal with which their Church seizes upon education as a help in her efforts to spread the Gospel. The beginning of the record of her school achievement in Manila, as in so many other places, is practically synchronous with the beginning of her mission work among the natives.

The Catholic Appeal

The New Zealand Tablet cites appreciatively from AMERICA the tribute of a Canadian Episcopal organ to the Catholic Church for its uncompromising insistence on the sacredness of the marriage law, on religious education and the divine institution of Christianity. New Zealand also has an Anglican review, the Churchman, which does not find it necessary to close its eyes to the Catholic position, even when our Church's stand on these questions has been instrumental in making converts, or as it puts it, "perverts," from the most distinguished and intelligent of the Anglican body. The February issue presents the following statistical summary for its readers' consideration:

"An alarming list appears in the new edition of Mr. W. Gordon Gorman's 'Converts to Rome.' It includes the names of 572 clergymen of the Church of England, 23 of the Church of Scotland, 12 of the Church of Ireland, and 13 Non-conformist ministers. There are 29 Peers and 53 Peeresses, 432 who are described as 'Members of the Nobility,' 42 Baronets and 21 Knights. The names are given of 303 clergymen's wives, 350 clergymen's daughters, and 269 clergymen's sons; 306 of these perverts were officers of the Army, and 64 of the Royal Navy. Of University graduates, 586 were of Oxford University, 346 of Cambridge University, 24 of Durham, and 63 of Trinity College, Dublin; 425 were 'Public School men,' Eton heading the list with 93 names. Of these perverts, 612 have become Roman Catholic priests, of whom 369 became secular priests, and 243 joined one or other of the monastic orders. Of these latter 109 became Jesuits. The book affords melancholy reading to Protestants, but it certainly proves the immense service rendered to the Church of Rome by the Oxford Movement and Ritualism."

These are the comparatively recent British converts, whose position in life made their names accessible to the compiler. Those who were beyond his reach, both in Britain and America, are, of course, immeasurably greater in number and their testimony is no less valuable, as their souls are not less valued by the Church; but this list is useful in illustrating the fact that the Church Catholic still appeals as strongly to people of education and distinction as to those who do not possess such advantages.

"That Which Remaineth Give Alms"

Mr. Lispenard Stewart, one of the substantial citizens of New York, made known his purpose recently to act as his own executor, in a qualified degree at least, and he has thus set an example which many men of larger wealth than his would do well to follow. Conscious that to give while one possesses, and has the power to give, is the safer and better way, Mr. Stewart determined to distribute himself that portion of his fortune which he had already by testamentary provision set aside for charitable and benevolent purposes.

The ancient Christian notion that the rich man is but a steward, and that his superfluous wealth belongs to the poor, seems to be one of the old-fashioned ideas which present-day materialism has obliterated from men's minds. Time was when the rich scarcely needed to be reminded of the obligation, when each of those favored of God in the possession of material wealth beyond the need of his family and beyond the need of his station recognized the precept contained in the word: "That which remaineth give alms." That was before the lust of wealth had taken hold of us, however, and had developed social and economic conditions which fill the thoughtful student of present-day problems with awful dread of the future. When the rich spontaneously accepted the obligation to give something of their superfluity, so that the necessities of the poor might be relieved by the common contributions of all, the world's atmosphere was not thick with wild and visionary schemes for the amelioration of the condition of the poor and wretched among us.

May the example bravely set by the recent action of Manhattan's distinguished citizen become more common in this country than it has unfortunately been in recent American experience. To dispense one's fortune for the good of one's fellows is to use one of the strongest weapons at hand against the folly of agitators, who kindle in the souls of the poor the flames of an envy that is deadly.

And Mr. Stewart is to be congratulated especially on his recognition of the truth that post-mortem benevolence is a hazardous manner of proving his loyal appreciation of the duties of stewardship. What he has done makes his giving a certainty—and his enjoyment in the good he achieves must far outweigh the pleasure that would be his from his knowledge of provisions drawn up on a few sheets of legal cap reposing in a steel box until his death should make them effective. As the New York Times says editorially:

"The money he is giving now to various institutions is clearly all his own. His heirs-at-law have no possible claim upon it. The most cleverly contrived will may be broken. The rich man who keeps all his money for his own use, and bequeaths some of it to build hospitals or libraries after his death, does so at the risk of having his good intentions defeated through the interference of clever lawyers."

Cicero's Poems!

A western newspaper tells how a professor of the University of Minnesota, attacked by footpads, put them to flight by reciting in a loud voice some stanzas from Cicero. As Sir Toby Belch asked concerning Sir Andrew Aguecheek's dancing, "Why are these things hid?" Is literary comity so unknown in the Northwest that the University of Minnesota thinks to keep Cicero's poems all to itself? Where did the professor get them? At a repository of New York antiques? Or is he a member of some Society for Psychical Research? Mediums have sometimes offered as the work of authors in the spirit world poems they would have been heartily ashamed of while in the flesh; and this supposition would explain the horror of the footpads, who may have been university men themselves. But it may also be that the University of Minnesota has a bone to pick with the western newspaper.

Canadian Protestants are still halting between two opinions regarding jurisdiction over marriage, or, rather, they are leaping from one to the other with extraordinary agility. A few days ago the Methodists were settled, one would have thought, in the conviction that the validity of marriage depends entirely on the civil power. Now we have Dr. Carman, their general superintendent, "with his teeth shut on the Ne temere decree and his eyes wide open"—the former certainly is not favorable to articulation, but perhaps the unusual openness of the eyes makes up for the shutness of the teeth—telling “the Pope at Rome that a marriage by a Methodist minister is as valid as one performed by the Pope himself.” According to the Methodist opinion of a week ago, this depends upon whether the State deposes one, or other, or both, as its marriage officer. If it deposes the minister and doesn’t depose the Pope, the minister’s work is so much better than the Pope’s that the latter’s is no marriage at all. But this cannot be Dr. Carman’s meaning. The Methodist opinion of to-day must be that a minister, inasmuch as he is a minister, can marry a couple just as securely as the Pope inasmuch as he is Pope. This does not mean that neither can do so without the State’s intervention. It must mean, therefore, that the Conference, in ordaining him, confers on him power to marry just as validly as the Pope can by his jurisdiction. The Conference, then, must have plenary jurisdiction, State or no State. When will they make up their minds definitely?

IN MISSION FIELDS

AN AMERICAN SEMINARY FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

We learn from The Field Afar that the following resolution was passed at the meeting of the Archbishops of the United States, April 27:

“We heartily approve the establishment of an American Seminary for Foreign Missions, as outlined in the letter sent by His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, to the Archbishops.

“We warmly commend to the Holy Father the two priests mentioned as organizers of this Seminary, and we instruct them to proceed to Rome without delay, for the purpose of securing all necessary authorization and direction from the Propaganda for the proposed work.”

The priests alluded to in this resolution are the Rev. Thomas F. Price, of North Carolina, editor of Truth, and the Rev. James A. Walsh, editor of The Field Afar.

The letter of His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons in support of the project reads in part as follows:—

“That such a Seminary is needed, and urgently, seems daily more evident. The prestige of our country has become widespread, and Protestants, especially in the Far East, are profiting by it, to the positive hindrance of Catholic missionaries. I understand that even the educated classes in China, misled by the almost complete absence of American Catholic priests, believe that the Church of Rome has no standing in America. Conscious that we are still short of priests in many dioceses, I would cite the words of Cardinal Manning referring to the foundation of Mill Hill:

“It is quite true that we have need of men and means at home; and it is because we have need of more men and means, by a great deal, than we as yet possess, that I am convinced we ought to send both men and means abroad. . . . If we desire to find the surest way to multiply immensely our own material means for works at home, it is by not limiting the expansion of Charity and by not paralyzing the zeal of self-denial.’

“The experience of the Church certainly bears out His Eminence’s conclusion. To-day it is said that little Holland supplies the foreign missions most generously, and that, as a result, vocations are more than sufficient for the home-land. Many priests and nuns from Holland are attached to dioceses in England and America.

“The priests of the United States number more than 17,000, but I am informed that there are hardly sixteen on the foreign missions. This fact recalls a warning which the late Cardinal Vaughan gave in a kindly and brotherly letter addressed to me twenty-two years ago, urging us American Catholics not to delay participation in foreign missions, lest our own Faith should suffer.

“We have made some progress since then. The older religious orders have sent out a few men; and several European congregations, through branches in this country, are beginning to increase the number of apostolic workers. The two chief foreign-mission aid societies,—that of the Lyons Society for the Propagation of the Faith especially,—have also taken a stronger hold on the faithful. Substantial proof has been given at the centres of these organizations that there are many Catholics, priests and laics, throughout the country, who are anxious to cooperate in foreign mission effort.

“Yet we must confess that as a Catholic body we have only begun, while our Protestant fellow-countrymen, fewer and weaker than we, have passed the century mark in foreign mission work and are represented to-day in the heathen world by some thousands of missionaries, who are backed by yearly contributions running up into the millions. A Seminary, such as that contemplated, if established with the good will of the entire American Hierarchy, can hardly fail to draw, emphatically, the attention of American Catholics to the cry that comes from one thousand million souls, who as yet have not heard Christ’s message.

“‘It is time,’ to use the words of the Apostolic Delegate, ‘that the American Church should begin to move in this direction.’”

—•••—

There has again been introduced into the Congress a law prohibiting all public manifestations of religious worship in any place in the Republic of Cuba.

The harm that the present system of education is doing in Cuba is simply unbelievable. As the teaching of the catchism in public schools was stopped ten years ago, the children have grown up without even the elementary notions of religion and morality; and, although the religious Orders accomplish a great deal in their schools, there remain many children who learn nothing about their duties as Christians.

Just at present no great sociological problems agitate

Cuba as they are agitating other countries; but there are signs that socialistic and even anarchistic theories are gaining ground. There is little religious spirit in the common people, and the best proof of this is the frequency of murder in the rural districts. Two common and widespread causes of this moral degradation are the moving picture shows and the theatrical representations of the lowest class which find their way even to small villages. The authorities either make no account of these shameless exhibitions, or, if they impose a small fine, their action is an excuse for the proprietors or the performers to appeal to the people for a larger attendance to meet the extraordinary expense. Novels, also, of the vilest French type circulate widely. This is one way of explaining the daily increasing number of suicides, especially among women and girls.

THE PAROCHIAL SCHOOL

Across the area is the parochial school. In summer, when its windows are wide open, the medley of sounds from its classrooms forms a running accompaniment to one's morning occupations. Each group of sounds has its own characteristics if the ear pauses to discriminate; but generally the differences soften themselves into a singleness of effect, like a chorus of cicadas industriously breaking the stillness of a warm noon in the country.

But there is one time in the day when the occupants of the neighboring houses are urged to stop and pick out of the tangled sounds one clear, silvery thread of speech. It is during the opening moments of the school-day. A number of children are reciting in unison the prayers which the Sister has taught them. They are girls, if we can judge from the timbre of their voices, and apparently very little girls, who are thus being trained to memorize and to say their Catholic prayers. They go through them slowly and with no vocal reserves, in the sing-song childish treble which suggests a purely mechanical operation. One doubts whether they are remotely aware or heedful of the sublime significance of their act or of the words which glide so glibly from their infant lips. Perhaps a scoffer might sneer at the evident absence of reflection. We doubt it. Their innocent young prayers, so devoid of personal quality and feeling, come to us like the waves of light, which scientists say are all alike until they strike some object which sends them back to the eye, altered and colored. So these colorless voices of young children, raised in prayer, descend into the soul of the listener and are reflected warm-tinted from the red intimacies of his being. The purity of these children's voices speaking to God has a sweetness almost too painful in its poignancy. It comes to the selfishness and passion of the grown heart like the sad reproof of neglected ideals, forgotten dreams, holy, but maimed, ambitions,—a tender and lovely dispenser of delicious sorrow. It offers itself as a messenger of our faith and hope and penitence; and we bid it God-speed, no more an impersonal, sing-song recitation, but a voice, as of an angel, laden with our heavy burden of petition.

But the value of these childish prayers is not all to him who appropriates them to the uses of a wider and more beggared experience. What a priceless grace these little girls are so unconsciously receiving! They hardly know what they are saying. Their fidgety young minds are most likely wandering, free and restless, from one childish concern to another. We do not deny that their vague, sincere reverence may, in its whole-hearted surrender, be more pleasing to their Master, Who loved children, than the self-conscious reverence of older persons. But it is certain that the meaning and power of the words they are uttering can just now grip their attention very slightly. They have memorized formulas. They recite them several times a day for weeks and months and years. The formulas become a part of themselves, as firm a possession as their own names. But what magical, blessed formulas they are!

Anyone who has had the opportunity—it escapes few—of knowing the sadness of life, will not desire to follow in fancy the fortunes of the children whose voices come to him now so blithely from the kneeling-benches of their class-room. Some of them, it is natural to suppose, will be taken away before the tragedy of grief shall have time to touch them. But it is no dealing in false pathos to say that many of them will have to carry the heavy load of life along dark roads. Somewhere ahead lurks the black hour when the props of their serenity shall be removed and their happiness shall tumble down about their heads with cruel violence, leaving them bruised and bewildered, piteous and forlorn, mourning for the light that has been quenched in beloved eyes, the strength that has gone out of gentle supporting arms, the voice that shall not be heard again until the soul leaps to it in the bliss of the Presence of God. Blacker hours still may be waiting in the future (which God forbid!), of sorrow too deep for tears, that hides its face even from Christ and His Mother, and feels a frightful kinship with despair.

It is not well to go through the category of inevitable ills, some of which—few or many—must come to each one who sojourns any length of years in this vestibule of eternity. Why harrow ourselves with the thought? The "little things," the innocent children, are so fragile, so trustful, so confident, so obviously destined for happiness! Why need we picture them in the pitiless grip of mischance and suffering? And yet we know only too well that if they are to become noble men and women, saints, possessing the inner secrets of happiness, they will have to tread the wine-press of bitterness with unflinching trust in the love and goodness of Christ's Heart. We tremble when we say it, and prayer for them goes clinging to the saying: may they never take on the hardness, selfishness and unloveliness of those who have contrived, careless of the means, to elude successfully the pain and sorrow of the world!

But in this dreary forecast of the future for the little ones, praying so cheerfully in the class-room, it is a consolation to know that the formulas formed so thoughtlessly now on these lisping tongues will be there when the dark hour shall strike. How often, if their days shall be prolonged, will not broken fragments of these prayers be wrung from them with all the strength of their souls? The empty formulas will quiver with life; will become agonizing cries of the sore heart; the authentic, reassuring voice of Christ's great Church, the full and perfect expression of human need for our Creator, our Redeemer, our Consoler.

"Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death."

"I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting."

"May the Almighty God have mercy on me, and forgive me my sins, and bring me to everlasting life."

"O my God, I love Thee above all things, with my whole heart and soul, because Thou art all-good and worthy of all love."

"All ye angels and saints of God, pray for me."

"May the souls of the faithful departed, through the mercy of God, rest in peace."

"Remember, O most compassionate Virgin Mary, that no one ever had recourse to thy protection or sought thy mediation without obtaining relief."

How beautiful they are! The child, into whose memory these and similar phrases have been set and fastened forever, by endless repetition and recitation, goes forth strong with the strength of Christ, beautiful with the beauty of Christ's Mother, and guarded by the armies of the saints and angels. Who or what can supply the place of these early class-room prayers? God pardon the unthinking Catholic parents who send their children to class-rooms where these prayers are never heard! They are stripping their little ones of the armor of faith and preparing to lead them forth naked and defenceless into thorny roads and the buffetings of harsh circumstance. They may fancy that they are cushioning life for their young by isolating them in the exclusiveness and gentle airs of wealth and social eminence; but these things are no safe insurance against the bleeding of a heart without hope and the dying of a soul without faith, life's most acute pain and eternity's unutterable loss.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

LITERATURE

UNCLE SAM'S PERIODICALS—DAILIES.

Everybody knows about that great daily newspaper issued under the shadow, or rather the sunlight, of the Capitol, the sprightly, bristling, many-sided Congressional Record. Its columns are records of the debates and proceedings of both Houses of Congress, taken verbatim, and printed at night at the Government Printing Office, whether four or four hundred pages in length, and mailed as promptly as any other daily newspaper. From some of the farthest parts of the city, the green lights of the big Printing Office may be seen, telling the observer that the legislative oratory is being duly recorded for the enlightenment of the nation. It is a paper sure to suit your political bias, for it has the highly applauded orations advocating Free Trade, Protection, Reciprocity and all their variations. *It often has wild bursts of eloquence within the folds of its franked cover which were never applauded, because they were heard only by the ears of a spluttering fountain pen and the industrious proof-reader. Nevertheless, they are worth recording for your benefit and that of posterity.

Besides the Record, which contains information on all matters of human interest at one time or another, there is a very handy instructive little daily run off at the Government Printing Office which is of untold interest to the industrial and business world. It is called Daily Consular and Trade Reports, and gives a carefully edited gist of all the information sent in by the American consuls throughout the world bearing on the conditions of the various industries, from the shoe factories of England to the cocoa trade of the tropics. Condensed though it is, the information is given in a very readable, attractive form, and the business man can readily scan its contents with his morning mail.

The issue of Daily Consular and Trade Reports for April 29, 1911, contains fourteen pages of information from Consul-General Frank D. Hill on "Commerce and Industries of Frankfort," including information on building activity, liability companies, banks, railway and river traffic, chemical industry, methods to secure American trade, markets for American shoes, lumber, machine tools, motor cars, drugs, dental supplies, fountain pens, cash registers, optical goods, sewing machines, typewriters, leather, copper, glassware, hats, meat, flour, grain, and the disappearance of the American bicycle.

The article in the same issue from Consul Arnold at Amoy gives such information as the following:

"Along the great western highway which traverses Shansi, Shensi, and part of Szechwan, may be found thousands of eating stalls, where food is cooked and served to the myriads of coolies, muleteers, peasants, laborers, and others traveling along this important highway. . . . Thousands of coolies are to be seen along this route, each carrying loads ranging from 150 to 200 pounds over distances of 500 to 1,000 miles. . . . The eating stalls supply them with steamed wheat rolls, noodle soup, dough strips, and doughnuts cooked in vegetable oils, besides pea-jelly, pea and bean soups, and wheat and corn porridges.

"No wines or intoxicating beverages supplement this list. In fact, even tea made from genuine tea leaves is served in but few of these roadside restaurants. When a person calls for tea, he is usually understood to mean a decoction of wheat, peas or millet, or sometimes of the leaves of shrubs. But to the toiling masses of Honan, Shansi and Shensi Provinces, with an aggregate population of 56,000,000, rice is a luxury to be indulged in only when cash is more than ample for the necessities of life."

Many other interesting matters regarding the outside world are given, and no less interesting is the fact that these little pamphlets are issued and distributed free, upon application, by the Bureau of Manufactures, Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

M. PELLEN.

Science of Education. By T. P. KEATING, B.A., L.C.P. New York: Benziger Brothers.

Manual of Christian Pedagogy. By THE BROTHERS OF MARY. Dayton, O.

Education has taken its rightful place among the recognized sciences. The capacity to form and develop adequately the moral, mental and physical powers of one individual implies a versatility, complexity and accuracy of knowledge and a force of character that few arts or sciences demand. Extrinsic considerations also have brought the educator into prominence. The desire to control him and formulate his program and system directs the policies of not a few sects, parties and governments. The national policy and conduct of to-morrow largely depends on what and how the teacher has taught to-day; and this is true even where governments are not engaged in turning education to partisan or anti-religious purposes. Hence every university has now a chair of pedagogy, which it deems as important as medicine, law, or engineering. The professional teacher is required to show proof, like the lawyer and physician, that he has mastered his art; that he has studied the methods of mental, physical and moral discipline requisite for the student's threefold development, and acquired a scientific knowledge of the living subject whose formation is committed to him. The principles of logic, psychology and ethics are a necessary part of his equipment, and it is all important that these shall be derived from the sound philosophy of the schools and not from the vagaries of Hegel, Spencer and James. He must also be acquainted with physiology and the sciences of bodily as well as of mental functions.

For teachers who have neither time nor opportunity to study these courses at first hand, Mr. Keating's book will prove an excellent substitute. The author has a sound knowledge of both philosophy and pedagogy, and he knows how to apply metaphysical and physical laws to the science of education in a manner that is as interesting as it is scientific. Rev. T. A. Finlay, S.J., in a useful preface, commends the work as "an excellent practical guide for the teacher. It compresses into a comparatively small space a wide range of philosophical theory and a large mass of significant facts." Rev. T. Corcoran, S.J., Professor of Education in the National University of Ireland, pronounces it "accurate in statement, and in fulness of treatment and practical value up to the level of any work of its size yet published in English." An educational work could not receive more authoritative endorsement.

Though built on Catholic philosophy, "Science of Education" has no direct bearing on positive religion, probably because it was intended for use in the state systems of the British Isles, in which religion has to be handled gingerly. This lack is supplied by "The Manual of Christian Pedagogy," which is intended, we are told, "for the use of religious teachers." It would be of the greatest use to all teachers, and particularly to those who sterilize education by excluding religion from its scope. "We can instruct without educating; we cannot educate without instructing," is its keynote; and it goes on to explain in nine pithy chapters the object, principles and methods of true education in its moral, mental and physical aspects; the training of the will and formation of character; the qualities, duties and acquirements, and the natural and supernatural dispositions of the duly qualified teacher. An excellent synopsis is appended to each chapter. Both manuals are well printed and handy in form but unprovided with an index. M. K.

Essays. By Rev. HENRY IGNATIUS DUDLEY RYDER. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Father Ryder never fails to interest and instruct his readers. This volume of his essays begins with the story of a "Jesuit Reformer and Poet", Father Frederick Spee, S.J., whose glory it was to have put an end to the burning of witches, a madness which possessed all the nations of Europe in the seventeenth century, Catholic and Protestant alike; though it is consoling to hear that not one execution occurred in the city of Rome. It was Spee's fierce denunciation of the judges and accusers that brought the world to its senses. It will be a surprise to many to be told that Spee was a genuine poet; one of the few, says Father Ryder, that the Jesuits can boast of; for the life of a Jesuit is not conducive to poetry.

There is an excellent article also on "Auricular Confession," in the course of which Lea gets a trouncing. He is complimented for "his extraordinary industry," but his labor is described as "unilluminated by one constructive idea, nay, unrefreshed by the breath of even a passing theory. If convict labor is said to be always defective from the want of a heart to take care, it need not surprise us to find Mr. Lea singularly inaccurate."

The brief history of M. Emery, the Superior of St. Sulpice, is a valuable contribution to biographical literature; the article on "Ritualism, Roman Catholicism," etc., gives Father Ryder an opportunity to castigate Littledale, and the review of Purcell's "Life of Cardinal Manning" enables him to convey to the ears of the public some valuable information about the now famous editor and his illustrious victim. The book ought to receive a hearty welcome. * * *

California Under Spain and Mexico, 1535-1847. By IRVING BERDINE RICHMAN. With Maps, Charts and Plans. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.00 net.

Painful search through vast and ill-assorted literary treasures stored away in public archives and private collections has been rewarded by a well-digested mass of information on a subject which is replete with hardships, stirring adventures, and romance. Every page is a witness to the industry of the author; yet the work seems to lack that nameless something which it, doubtless, would have had if he had felt more sympathy for the lofty aspirations of some of his heroes.

The opinion of the earliest missionaries, as voiced by Fray Pedro de Córdoba, O.P., to the effect that the natives should be collected on reservations and there evangelized, was borne out by all that followed in the history of the missions, whether on the islands, or on the mainland; for the establishing of a feudal system, by which the unhappy natives were subjected to the whims or the viciousness of powerful laymen, made them slaves in all but name. The peonage system, still existing in Mexico though outlawed long ago, comes down by direct descent from the feudal system of encomiendas, against which the missionaries protested.

We think that it would have been fairer if the author (p. 61) had taken the pains to state why the Jesuits refused, in 1686, to attempt the "reduction" of California, the reason assigned by them being that they did not wish to take charge of the temporalities of the mission. This was precisely what the Spanish authorities wished them to do. If, later on, Father Salvatierra offered to give up the mission to secular priests (knowing well that no secular priests were available for the undertaking), it was because the viceregal authorities deliberately ignored the commands of Madrid to send provisions to the famine-stricken missions.

It is, perhaps, too much to expect that a non-Catholic layman should be familiar with canon law, but the learned author is in error when he states (p. 390) that before 1717 the Society of Jesus could not own temporalities. The question debated in 1717 was whether the Society could hold temporalities for mission work; about its colleges and novitiates there could be no question, for these had from the beginning held temporalities.

It is hard to see just how the "rights of man" were more clearly recognized or better protected by the secularization of the missions; for the result was the destruction of the mission property and the utter ruin of the Indians, who, taken at their best, were quite unable to care for themselves, much less protect themselves against the cupidity of the vicious whites.

The work is far ahead of what appeared over the name of the late unlamented Hubert Howe Bancroft, and, where religion does not come in very prominently, presents charming pictures of California life, political, civil and domestic, from the first Spanish invasions in the sixteenth century to the American overland invasions in the nineteenth. H. J. S.

History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages. Vol. I. By HARTMANN GRISAR, S.J. Authorized English Translation. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, $4.50.

Grisar's History is planned on a large scale. This long-expected translation appears at last copiously and even splendidly illustrated with views of the relics of old Rome, the crumbling edifices, the mutilated statues, the almost undecipherable inscriptions, etc., and to give a proper foil to his picture the author conducts us through the various sections of the old city, and discourses at length of the wonders that made them glorious when Rome was mistress of the world. All this is, as it were, incidental, and while Father Grisar hurries on to begin his task. But you feel that you are in the hands of a master, and that you are learning all the principal facts that archeologists have unearthed from the debris of the great empire.

The History proper begins about the time of Honorius, and possibly the impression of the average reader who turns over these pages will be one of amazement at the persistency of paganism in that centre of the world. It is not an uncommon delusion that when Constantine ascended the throne of the Caesars paganism fled in affright. On the contrary, far into the fifth century it was still vigorous and aggressive, and its effects on the Church in corrupting the lives of Christians were deplorable. Father Grisar notes also that the Arianism of the barbarians was paganistic in its character. Its denial of the divinity of Christ and of the Holy Ghost was in reality a presentation to the world of two new inferior divinities to swell the throng that the nations already adored. We await with pleasure the succeeding volumes of this monumental work. * * *

In a criticism of Webster's "New International Dictionary of the English Language", the Athenaeum says: "It is fairly certain that no people are more careless about accuracy in words and pronunciation than the English. All the reasonable standards of speaking and writing which education might be supposed to involve are disappearing; journalists, ignorant of good existing words, invent atrocities of their own and misuse foreign phrases; and even those who teach are uncertain of the sounds of their own language."

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution. By Hannis Taylor, LL.D. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. Net $4.
 California Under Spain and Mexico. By Irving Berdine Richman. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. Net $4.
 The End of the Irish Parliament. By Joseph R. Fisher. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $3.
 Essays. By the Rev. Henry Ignatius Dudley Ryder. Edited by Frances Bacchus. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.
 The Religious Experience of the Roman People. From the Earliest Times to the Age of Augustus. By W. Warde Fowler, M.A. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $4.
 Beginnings or Glimpses of Vanished Civilizations. By Marion McMurrugh Mulhall. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $1.
 Early Christian Hymns. Being Translations of the Most Notable Latin Hymns of the Early and Middle Ages. By Daniel J. Donahue. New York: The Grafton Press. Net $2.
 Saint Thomas Aquinas, of the Order of Preachers. A Biographical Study of the Angelic Doctor. By Father Placid Conway, O.P. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net 50 cents.
 Saint Bonaventure. The Seraphic Doctor Minister General of the Franciscan Order, Cardinal Bishop of Albano. By the Rev. Laurence Costelloe, O.F.M. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net 50 cents.
 The Training of Children and of Girls in Their Teens. By Madame Cecilia. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 75 cents.
 The General Federation of Women's Clubs. Tenth Biennial Convention, May 11th to May 18th, 1910, at Cincinnati. Official Report. Newark, N. J.: Federation of Women's Clubs.

EDUCATION

In his address to the graduates of Columbia University, on commencement day early this month, President Nicholas Murray Butler of that institution made some remarkably frank admissions. Premising that "it is the fashion of historians and students of history to fasten a particular century, or age, or epoch, both in the imagination and in the memory by giving it a name," he seems to be quite willing to characterize our own epoch as "the Age of Epithets." Mr. Butler refers to the fact that our age is accused of oversubtlety and of precocity, of impertinent self-confidence and of vulgar lack of respect for what has been, and he mentions as a reason for the accusation the other charge that we have departed, and are seeking to depart still farther, from the approved ways and from established standards, and that we have a feverish desire to find new things to say and new ways of saying them.

* * *

Columbia's distinguished executive concedes "there is a good measure of truth in all this, and it is well to be on the lookout for the temptations and dangers which our critics point out." It may well be, he adds, "that we have confounded novelty with originality and change with development. . . . Certain it is that we are curiously under the influence of phrases, and that argument by epithet has come to take a high place in our ratiocination." Mr. Butler's illustration of his meaning is an apt one. "To call," he says, "a man, a movement, a proposal, by either a flattering or an obnoxious name is to remove them at once from the serious and thoughtful criticism of a large part of the population. Most persons are for or against a proposal because of what it has been called. This, of course, is not intelligent, and it is not rational; but it is very common."

* * *

May one presume to call Mr. Butler's attention to a concrete case,—all the more interesting in that it shows how candidly a man may expose his own weaknesses when, unwitting of their broad application, he indulges in aphorisms which mean more than a happy turn of thought in a graceful address? For years there has been an ever-growing movement among the practical Christians of the United States looking to a radical change in, what they believe to be, our mutilated and defective system of public school education. The movement is based on their deliberate judgment that the usual, nay the necessary consequence of a separation of religious and secular education of our children is to paralyze the moral faculties and to foment a spirit of indifference to matters of faith. Such a consequence, it is urged, is intolerable, since we want our children to be not only polished members of society but also conscientious Christians.

* * *

The movement is one encouraged by no single section of our people. The Catholics of America are by no means alone in a wish for religion in our public schools. The Protestant Episcopalians have thousands of pupils who are being taught in their parochial schools; the Lutherans have other thousands who are being educated in their parochial schools. Prominent divines of the Episcopal, Presbyterian and other Churches have declared frequently during the last decade that they are not satisfied with the present system of public schools, because religion is not taught in them. And there is in the country a strong association, the Religious Education Association, made up of the most scholarly and able men interested in educational work, whose members are using every means to foster the growth of sentiment in favor of religious instruction in these schools. "Religion in our schools is an absolute necessity" has come to be the slogan, one would venture to affirm, of the vast majority of the conservative people of America.

* * *

Yet there are leading men among us, and, unless we are greatly mistaken, Mr. Butler has occupied no inconspicuous place in their number, who deem the movement fairly judged and set aside by fastening upon it the obnoxious term "sectarian," and by simply quoting against it the great principle of our Government: "No public moneys for sectarian purposes." And unfortunately the crowd follows the leader and condemns the movement because of what is foolishly said of it. To quote Mr.

Butler in his commencement address: "The course is not intelligent, and it is not rational, but it is very common."

* * *

It is not intelligent, since a serious and thoughtful criticism of the project is lacking, and the proposal has been rejected because of what it has been called or because of what is said of it. Surely Mr. Butler and those who agree with him or follow him in terming sectarian the movement to introduce explicit religious teaching into our schools do not expect to have us take seriously the charge of "sectarianism." That term, if it means anything, imports an undue favoring of one or of many religious bodies to the detriment of the influence exercised by others. And there is not a tittle of argument which can be advanced to show such to be the real purpose of men and women of the National Education Association, or of the Religious Education Association, or of the Catholics and Protestants who contend for the introduction of systematic religious training into the public school system. Rather may all of these argue the existing system to be sectarian. Is it not obvious that our present plan constitutes a cruelly privileged class, in that they who are without religion among us are allowed to enjoy educational opportunity in accord with their wishes whilst the thousands and thousands of Christian men and women, who recognize God's rights in the training of young people, are taxed to pay for that opportunity which they repudiate for themselves?

* * *

Nor is it rational to condemn our proposal because of the words: "No public moneys for sectarian purposes." It is entirely feasible to adopt a plan in this country which will satisfy those who contend for religious instruction in public schools without in any manner conflicting with the operation of those schools as now organized and without contributing a penny for so-called sectarian purposes. As long ago as the year 1906 a tentative scheme to this end was embodied in the resolution passed at the meeting of the Catholic Federation in Buffalo. The delegates meeting on that occasion represented 1,500,000 Catholic associates, and their resolutions, supported and approved by Archbishops and Bishops in attendance at the convention, are significant of the reasonable stand of Catholics in the matter. They proposed this solution of the school fund problem as satisfactory to the Catholic body:

"First, let no public moneys be paid out for religious instruction in any school; secondly, let the educational per capita tax be disbursed for results in purely secular studies only, in our Catholic schools, our teachers receiving their salaries as other teachers receive theirs; thirdly, to obtain these results, let our schools be submitted to State or city examinations." Certainly nothing in these suggestions imports the spending of public moneys for sectarian purposes, and yet their acceptance will assure what so many of us seek, explicit religious instruction in our schools. It will, too, effectually kill the injustice under which thousands and thousands among our Christian people have been suffering for more than half a century, the double tax imposed on them because of their conscientious stand in favor of such instruction.

* * *

It will do far more. One does not strain his argument when he claims that the prevalence of criminality in a community is very largely due to irreligious training of young people. The sad showing of the official statistics of France, recently quoted editorially in AMERICA, is reason enough for such a claim. At least, since education without religion surely does not make for what its early promoters contended it would bring us—a high order of civic virtue and integrity—would it not be well to try the other plan? So wise and prudent an observer as Cardinal Gibbons has recently affirmed:

"By the introduction of religion into our public schools I feel almost sure that the following ills would be partly ameliorated, if not cured—suicides, anarchistic plottings, dishonesty and corruption in finance, infidelity in marital relationships, divorces and the consequent wreck of homes and scandal and ruin of children, the unrest of the irreligious, who give bad example by squandering fortunes that would help to support hundreds of poor and needy families."

Our readers will recall the reference made in this department some weeks ago (March 18) to an important contest being waged among schoolmen in Prussia regarding the introduction of explicit religious instruction into the compulsory high schools of the kingdom. As was then predicted, the advocates of religious teaching have succeeded in their purpose, and definite instruction in religion will find its place in the program of studies now being prepared for these advanced schools of the empire. Early in May the special committee of the Prussian Landtag, to which the question had been referred, by a vote of 11-8, made the ruling that a course in religion was to be obligatory in the new secondary schools, as it is in the elementary grades.

The General Educational Board, administering the John D. Rockefeller endowment of $32,000,000, made public May 25, following its first meeting for the current year, a list of its latest appropriations for colleges and schools, amounting in all to $634,000. Of this total $400,000 will go, in various sums, to six colleges in the West and South on condition that the beneficiaries raise certain additional specified amounts, which, with the conditional gifts granted, will be applied to the endowment fund of the institutions. Appropriations aggregating $68,000 go to the education of Southern negroes; $130,000 is set aside for demonstration work in agriculture in Southern States, and $36,000 as an aid in the developing of secondary education in State universities of the South.

M. J. O'C.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

At the recent National Conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Richard C. Gannon, President of the Superior Council of Chicago, read a paper on "The Spiritual Advantages of Membership in the Society."

"Although the great work they projected would have much to do with the methodical keeping of detailed account in giving material aid to the needy," said Mr. Gannon, "yet they were convinced that, if their work would be effective, it should be done, not in response to natural impulse, but solely with the intention of pleasing God. Thus, that the original purpose may never be departed from, is imposed the obligation of pious reading, as well as the unvarying rule of opening and closing meetings with the recital of prayers. In this manner the founders impressed upon the Society the importance of the spiritual and supernatural; encouraged the cultivation and observance of Christian virtues; and sought to give practical effect to the maxim: 'Blessed is the man that understandeth concerning the needy and the poor.'

"The conference members who early imbibed this spirit of the Society soon learn that their membership should not cease because of a lack of the fundamental work, that of visiting the poor at their homes. Then, too, members who have a vocation for real charitable endeavor find ever-recurring opportunities of widening the scope of the Vincentian effort. They observe that a certain neglected charity should be undertaken. Such work might relate to the charity for the mind, as the circulating of wholesome reading matter, or schooling of poor children; or occasions might arise where efforts could be spent in the visitation of patients in hospitals or asylums, or persons confined in correctional and penal institutions, or perhaps members might act the part of another St. Camillus by visiting and consoling the sick and dying poor in their last illness.

"It is fitting to state that during the earliest years of its existence the Society received the unqualified approval of the Vicar of Christ, who, in his generosity, made it possible for the members to gain numerous spiritual favors. Each succeeding pontiff has confirmed and, in some instances, added to the decrees of his predecessor. Their solicitude extended in a special manner not only to the spiritual advancement of the members but also to their charitable endeavors. Once each year a report of the works of the Society is presented by its President-General to the Holy Father. On these and other occasions renewed words of encouragement have been spoken which served to infuse new zeal and fervor into the hearts of the members.

"To-day there are social problems the equitable solution of which requires the sympathy and spirit of Vincentians. Hence, in our country at least, there is an urgent need of an increase of the number of members—members who possess not alone the sturdy virtues of the early pioneers, but who are also more universally blessed with the advantages of a liberal education. Men of this type have an almost limitless field in which to work for God and neighbor. Here, in accordance with the spirit of the Society, a true means will be found to aid in solving many of the problems pressing for attention.

"Never before in our country have the times been more auspicious for the extension of our Society. Let us never slacken in zeal in promoting the objects of a Society that affords so wide a field for charitable endeavor. Let us ever keep in mind the high aims of our mission. Let us ever do our work solely for the love of God and neighbor."

ECONOMICS

It would be hard to imagine any expenditure less profitable directly to a nation than that for naval defence. Hundreds of millions of dollars go yearly to clothe and feed hardworking men whose labor is unproductive; in building ships which will run a swift career from "the most powerful engine of destruction in the world" to "the scrapper's yard"; in constructing guns to be reconstructed after the briefest service; in casting shot and shell for the depths of the sea, and in making powder to be diffused through the air as gas. One does not grudge the money. Those who know tell us that unless it be spent the nation must perish. Moreover, we are rich; and a new Dreadnought is hardly more expensive to the country than a new bonnet is to a lady of fashion. But for the wealthiest lady there must be a limit to the vanity of bonnets, and so for the wealthiest of nations a limit to the vanity of ships. Expenditure must be restrained within the bounds of necessity, when it is without return.

All know the cause of the demand for new ships is the struggle between armor and gun. No sooner has an armor of greater resistance in proportion to weight been invented, than the guns are improved so as to pierce it. The ideal in armor plate is the maximum of resistance and the minimum of weight. Each new invention in armor, therefore, means that weight may be taken off sides and turrets and shields and put into guns and machinery. Hence, every such invention means the making obsolete of fleets of what were first-class ships. Steel plates sent the old ironclads to be broken up. Steel-faced plates made steel plates useless, and themselves were driven out by Harveyized plates. These are made by a steel process which was in use for ages before Bessemer was heard of, namely, the absorption of carbon by mild steel heated for a long time in charcoal. The limit, however, of such absorption in the Harvey plate is about a single inch.

Steel-faced plate was made by welding a hard steel plate to a mild steel backing. Its weakness was that the weld was not absolutely continuous, and so the face stripped off under the impact of artillery fire. A new steel-faced plate has been invented in England by W. S. Simpson, who has discovered that when two steel plates with a sheet of copper between are heated to 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit, in a mixture of carbon, brown sugar and water, the copper melts and is incorporated into the steel, making a theoretically perfect weld and giving a plate as perfect as the Harvey, with no limit to its hard steel facing. The new plate is said to be, weight for weight, 75 per cent. more efficient than the original Harvey, and 20 per cent. better than the best Harvey-Krupp. If this be true, all the new Dreadnoughts and Super-Dreadnoughts will have to be rearmored or cast aside.

The taxpayer may ask, why, if such an important discovery has been made, has it been published to the world? If such armor could give England a fleet of twenty ships 20 per cent. better than those of any other nation, English building might be lessened considerably. He would be told, perhaps, that such secrets can not be kept. Secrets are kept in every trade, and there seems to be no reason why, with proper precautions, such as this could not be kept. Who would dream of sugar in connexion with armor plate?

The lack of sufficient ventilation is the great drawback of subways. The London subways are to be provided with not only pure air but equivalently with sea air. At each station a ventilating fan will draw air from outside through water, which will take up all impurities. As it leaves the purifying machine the air will be mixed with ozone from another machine. Eighty million cubic feet of this artificial sea air will pass through the tunnels daily. In the assumption that these always contain on an average between 4,000 and 5,000 passengers, this will give 900 cubic feet per hour to each passenger.

H. W.

SCIENCE

PEARY'S "NORTH POLE."

Nature of May 18 gives an editorial review of Peary's "The North Pole." A few quotations will show its drift. "In spite of the space available there are many omissions of the many things one would most like to know. . . . There is also little in this book to answer the criticism of those who have questioned Peary's actual attainment of the Pole. . . . Some adequate statement of the evidence that was laid before these distinguished authorities might have been given as one of the appendices, of which there are three. . . . The great increase in his pace after he parted from Captain Bartlett is not explained in the text. . . . It is not easy to follow the story of the last few days of the approach to the Pole. . . . A tabular statement of his marches would have been very useful. The numerous references to the observations taken and the fac-similes of some of the calculations are not convincing."

The St. Petersburg Academy of Science publishes some interesting facts regarding the microstructure of hailstones. The specimens examined were collected during a thunderstorm in Siberia. Those exhibited had, for the most part, a spheroidal shape with a mean diameter of from 7 to 10 millimeters (0.27-0.39 inch). Air-bubbles, frequently oblong in form, separated the concentric spherical layers, which were alternately opalescent and transparent. Many of the stones consisted of but a single layer, now transparent, now of a milky hue. Attention is called to a strange anomaly, viz., the eccentricity, in several instances, of the milky central grain. This occupied a lateral part of the hailstone and often formed but part of a sphere. Every indication of a correlation of the crystalline and physical structure of the stones was absent.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The speed of ocean-going liners is considerably reduced by the friction occasioned by the adherence of barnacles to the hull. Estimates go to show that a six months' deposit increases the coal consumption some sixty per cent. Solutions hitherto proposed have proved inadequate. Barnacles cannot attach themselves to glass, and so the experiment has been tried of covering the vessel's under-water parts with glass. However, as the coefficient of expansion of steel and glass differ considerably, a slight rise in temperature causes the glass to crack. A recent English patent claims to meet this emergency. Instead of fixing the glass directly to the steel plates of the hull, there is inserted between the glass and steel a layer of wood pulp and cement. The wood pulp serves as a cushion, thus preventing the heat effects.

* * *

Several Italian scientists, under the leadership of Signor Emmanuel Friedlander, have begun the establishment of an international volcanological institute at Mount Vesuvius, with a view to obtaining data from which impending seismic disturbances of volcanic origin may be reasonably predicted. Incidentally observations will be made on ore formations within the spheres of volcanic influence. The buildings and equipment will cost $300,000, and a foundation yielding a yearly income of $10,000 will be available.

* * *

Professor J. von Kowalski, from observations made in the snow-fields of Switzerland, finds that the ultra-violet rays of sunlight are reflected by the snow almost in their entirety. This reflection, he states, explains the trying effects experienced by the eye subjected to these rays, and he suggests the advisability of wearing, during a period of snow and sunshine, glasses opaque to these rays.

* * *

The low-tension metallic filament lamps, manufactured by the German General Electric Society, promise to revolutionize the running-cost of electric lighting. Under pressure of 14 volts these lamps furnish 10, 16 and 25 candle power. The price of installation is about one-half that of metallic filament lamps made for tensions of 110-220 volts and the low tension filament lamps are far more durable. The feeding is rendered possible by transformers.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

PERSONAL

Public bequests disposing of $4,000 were made in the will of John P. O'Connor, a teamster, of Boston. The bequests are as follows: One thousand dollars to the Pastor of St. Mary's, for the church; $1,000 to the Home for Destitute Catholic Children; $500 to St. Mary's School; $500 to the St. Vincent de Paul Society; $500 to St. Joseph's School, and $500 to St. Mary's Infant Asylum.

One of Rhode Island's best known business men is Michael F. Dooley, a Providence banker. The Sunday Tribune, June 4, of Providence, devotes a full page to a rehearsal of his virtues and a eulogy of his character. Mr. Dooley's training in a Catholic college does not seem to have been an obstacle in the struggle of life.

The Rev. Michael Moynihan, S.J., has been appointed Provincial of the New Orleans Province of the Society of Jesus, embracing the Southern States. Born in Kerry, 1858, he entered the Society in 1876, and studied in Europe and in the United States. He was President of Springhill College, Mobile, 1896-99, and Rector of the Novitiate at Macon, Ga., since 1899.

The golden jubilee of the ordination to the priesthood of Canon Quinn, of Killeavy, County Armagh, elicited a notable tribute from Cardinal Logue, who presided at the solemn Mass and the banquet, and from Mr. John Redmond, M.P. Born in Tyrone, 1834, and ordained at Maynooth, 1851, Canon Quinn had erected churches, convents, schools and homes for the teachers in the numerous parishes to which he had been assigned. In Killeavy he had collected and expended on religious and educational institutions $160,000 and established schools which his Eminence pronounced unparalleled throughout the country. He had worked and suffered for his country, and through his efforts "every man in Killeavy can sit secure under his own fig tree—if they grow figs in Killeavy." Mr. Redmond pronounced him "the most sterling of Irish Nationalists and one of his most trusted friends." Canon Quinn having expressed the hope that he would live to say the opening prayers at the Irish Parliament, the Cardinal prophesied that he would, and also be found directing the National leaders how to organize it. Mr. Dillon was on his way to attend the jubilee when he met with a motor accident at Dundalk.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

According to the reliable statistics of Die Katholischen Missionen, the number of Catholics in China in 1909 was 1,210,054. This represents an increase of 667,390 in the number of Chinese Catholics during twenty years. The missions in China are in charge of 2,010 priests, of whom 631 are natives. As the number of missionaries was 937 in 1889, both Christians and missionaries are more than twice as numerous as they were twenty years ago.

Japan had 65,741 Catholics in 1909, against 37,560 in 1889, while a still greater increase is shown for Korea, where the figures are 15,416 and 68,016 respectively, though Japan is credited with 195 priests, whereas Korea has but 56.

During 1910 there were 1,132 Sodalties of the Blessed Virgin affiliated to the chief Sodality in Rome, called the Prima-Primaria. Such affiliation is a necessary condition to enable sodalists to share in the privileges and indulgences accorded to membership. A list of these Sodalties, according to countries, is here given:

Germany and Switzerland, 294; Austria and Hungary, 190; United States (Philippines, 5), 178; France, 130; Spain, 69; Italy, 50; Belgium, 46; Mexico, 28; Galicia (Poland), 26; Central America, 23; England (East Indies, 2), 22; Portugal, 22; Canada, 19; Holland, 18; Ireland (Australia, 11), 17. Total, 1,132.

These Sodalties were made up of all classes of the faithful, as the following table shows:

Priests (5) and clerics (5), 10; married men, 45; young men and youths, 35; boys, 163; children, 39; men and women, 62; married women, 90; young women, 24; girls, 664. Total, 1,132.

Very Rev. Dr. Patrick Morrisroe, Dean of Maynooth College, has been appointed Bishop of Achonry, Ireland. The new prelate has a wide reputation as a writer on liturgical subjects, and contributed a number of articles in this department to "The Catholic Encyclopedia." He was born in Charlestown, County Mayo, in 1869, and has a fine record as an educationalist during his connection with Maynooth.

In an interesting account of the founding of New York's first parish school, in the Catholic World for June, Mr. Lucey, the author, quotes a document of much interest and importance as marking the mind of the Legislature of New York State in older days. On March 21, 1806, that body answered a petition presented to it by Catholics, that they might be allowed to share in the money grant made to free schools of the city, by the following law:

"Be it enacted by the People of the State of New York represented in Senate and Assembly, that it shall be lawful for the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the City of New York to pay to the trustees of the Roman Catholic Congregation in the City of New York the like sum as was paid to the other congregations respectively by virtue of an act entitled: 'An act directing certain moneys to be applied to the use of free schools in the City of New York,' and the money paid to be applied according to the directions of such act, and the treasurer of this state is hereby directed to pay to the said mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the City of New York, the sum so paid by them, out of the unappropriated money arising from the duties on sales at auction in said city."

OBITUARY

The Right Rev. William Gordon, D.D., Bishop of Leeds, England, departed this life on June 7, aged eighty years. In 1909

he kept the golden jubilee of his priesthood. For some years Vicar-General and Rector of the Seminary, then Bishop Auxiliary, he finally succeeded Bishop Cornthwaite, in 1890, as second Bishop of Leeds.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OBJECTIONABLE MOVING PICTURES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At a meeting of the Executive Board of the Brooklyn Federation, the article on objectionable moving pictures which appeared in your valuable paper of June 3d, 1911, was read to the delegates.

The Executive Board went on record expressing their condemnation of the Moving Picture News, and requested the Secretary to take steps to tell the representatives of this paper our disapproval of such a production.

Yours in the name of Federation,

JOSEPH R. GARVEY, Secretary.

Brooklyn Diocesan Branch, American Federation of Catholic Societies.

June 12, 1911.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In last week's issue I noticed an article about a moving picture called "The Nun". I regret to say this was exhibited in my city. My attention was called, by a non-Catholic friend, to the fact that it was on exhibition. As soon as possible I went to see the picture. It is needless to say that AMERICA has expressed my views on the same. After the performance was over I called upon the manager of the show and remonstrated with him about the character of the picture called "The Nun", and showed him how offensive it was to many of his patrons. He immediately withdrew the objectionable picture and promised me to refrain from showing it any more. I then learned that "The Nun" was going to be sent to Shreveport, La. I sent word to that city that this picture was coming, and to have it stopped before it was put on exhibition.

I found the manager reasonable, and when its objectionable character was pointed out to him, he was glad to stop same. This could be done in many cities, if the laymen would only look out for such pictures.

I think your warning a timely one and ought to be heeded by all.

JAMES A. GRAY.

Little Rock, Ark., June 10.

V. S. 'D.—A satisfactory explanation of the details of the election of a Pope by a conclave, and of the tradition of the "right of veto" will be found in "The Catholic Encyclopedia," Vol. IV, in the article "Conclave," and Vol. V, in the article "Exclusion, Right of."—[Ed. AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 12

(Price 10 Cents)

JULY 1, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 116

CHRONICLE

Wool Bill Passed—United States Recognizes Portugal—Seamen's Strike Ends—The Giant Olympic—Fall River Cotton Centennial—Architect La Farge Set Aside—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Portugal—Germany—Austria-Hungary—China265-268

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Supreme Court and the Tobacco Trust—The Belgian Collapse—Religious Training and Literature—Religious Statistics of England.269-275

CORRESPONDENCE

More Details of the Verdesi Case—Spain's Domestic and Foreign Relations.....275-277

EDITORIAL

Children of Israel—Despoilers of France—Charreux—Pittsburg Library Catalogue—Developments in Alsace-Lorraine.....278-281

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE: THE RECLUSE.281-283

LITERATURE

Little Cities of Italy—The Legacy. A Story of a Woman—A Conversion and a Vocation—Metcalf and Rafter's Language Series—Más Alegria—The Purple East—Un Newman Russe, Vladimir Soloviev—Beginning, or Glimpses of Vanished Civilizations—Books Received.....283-285

EDUCATION

The First North American College—Knights of Columbus to Publish Catholic School Books—Popular Fallacy in Regard to Laws on Distribution of Educational Funds—A Tribute to the Christian Brothers.....285-286

MUSIC

Movement to Promote the Study of Liturgical Music286

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

First Formal Catholic Celebration of the Fourth of July.....286-287

SOCIOLOGY

The Loan Shark Evil.....287

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Thirteenth Catholic Congress of Limburg, Holland—Golden Jubilee of Rev. J. P. M. Schleuter, S.J.—New Provincial for the Oblates of Mary Immaculate287-288

SCIENCE

First of Our Big Guns—Research Work in Magnetism at Ebro University—A Standard for Radium288

OBITUARY

Bruno Oscar Klein—Mother Scholastica Kerst.288

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Catalogues of Catholic Books.....288

CHRONICLE

Wool Bill Passed.—The Democratic bill revising the wool schedule of the Payne-Aldrich law passed the House by a vote of 221 to 100. Twenty-four Republicans, most of them insurgents, voted with the Democrats on the final passage of the bill, and one Democrat, Representative Francis, of Ohio, fearing the opposition of the wool growers of his state, voted against it. With few exceptions the Republicans stood together on the motion to recommit until scientific information regarding the wool industry could be obtained. Except for a minor change in the wording, the bill, as was predicted, went through exactly as it came from the Ways and Means Committee. Among the proposed amendments voted down by a thunder of Democratic "noes" were those placing raw wool on the free list, as advocated by Mr. Bryan. The bill as passed fixes an ad valorem of 20 per cent. on raw wool, and an average of 42.55 per cent. on manufactured wool.

United States Recognizes Portugal.—The United States has officially recognized the Republic of Portugal. This followed the opening of the new Constituent Assembly, at which the president of the chamber read a decree proclaiming the Republic of Portugal, the abolition of the monarchy and the banishment from Portugal of the family of Braganza, which was unanimously approved. The decree was also read by the president to the great throngs which gathered outside the assembly building, after which the chamber adjourned. George L. Lorillard, American Chargé d'Affaires, thereupon waited upon Señor Machada, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and delivered the following note to him:

"Whereas the National Constituent Assembly has this day settled upon and definitely proclaimed the form of government adopted by Portugal, I have the honor, acting according to the instructions received from my government, of hereby informing your excellency that the government of the United States of America has to-day officially recognized the government of the Portuguese Republic."

Seamen's Strike Ends.—Following the example of the ship-owners of England, the representatives of the coastwise steamship companies in New York made considerable concessions to the striking seamen, cooks, stewards and engineers, and as result the strike which had been started on the Morgan line and which threatened to tie up all other coastwise lines was declared off. No statement was issued by the representatives of the companies after the conference, but the labor leaders declared that the arrangement arrived at was entirely satisfactory to them. The concessions granted by the steamship owners affect 1,700 men, and include increase of wages, recognition of the unions, better food, bedding and quarters for the men. The firemen are to get from $30 to $40 a month, the sailors $30 to $40, according to grades, and the waiters, who wanted $25, will get $22.50. Chief cooks will get from $70 to $80 a month.

The Giant Olympic.—The new White Star liner Olympic, the largest steamer afloat, built in the Belfast dockyards, made her maiden voyage across the Atlantic without a mishap. This great steamship, almost nine hundred feet in length, is expected to make the transatlantic journey all the year round in six and a half or seven days, and to arrive at New York regularly every third Wednesday morning. Her principal dimensions are as follows: Length over all 882½ feet; breadth over boat deck, 94; height from bottom of keel to boat deck, 97; height of funnels above boat deck, 81½; distance from top of funnel to keel, 175; number of decks, 11; number of watertight bulkheads, 15. Comparisons as to her size are made in the official announcements. In length the Olympic overtops by 182½ feet the height of the Metropolitan tower, the highest office building in the world; by 132½ feet the new Woolworth building, now under construction, and by 327 feet the Washington Monument. And she does not fly the American flag.

Fall River Cotton Centennial.—Fall River, Mass., held a week's festivities in the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the building in that city of the first cotton mill in America. During the week President Taft honored the city with a visit and delivered an address. From the small beginnings of a century ago Fall River became and still remains the centre of the cotton industry in the United States. After a hundred years it has 104 mills, employing 37,000 operators and producing more than a billion yards of cloth annually. The city has increased 1,000 per cent. in population since 1850, or from 11,524 to 119,295. A phase of the centennial which has a sociological interest is the change in the character of the population of Massachusetts which has been effected by its mills. In 1903 ninety-one per cent. of the cotton operatives of the State were of foreign descent, in the main French-Canadian and Irish. In Fall River less than eight per cent. of the population is of native American stock.

Architect La Farge Set Aside.—C. Grant La Farge, who, in partnership with the late George L. Heins, drew the plans for the great Protestant Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine, on Morningside Heights, was superseded by Ralph Adams Cram, a designer of sacred edifices. Mr. La Farge is now in Europe. His contract with the trustees of the cathedral expired with the completion of the choir, dedicated a few weeks ago. It has been given out that the Heins and La Farge plans, made familiar for years to the public by reproductions of their sketch of the completed cathedral, will not be followed.

Mexico.—The attempt to establish a Socialistic republic in Lower California received its death blow when the government troops drove the Socialistic force at Tijuana across the border into United States territory, where they surrendered at discretion. Most of the "patriots" were American citizens. The Archbishop of Antequera (Oaxaca) has issued a circular warning all priests, both secular and regular, in the archdiocese to take no part in the present presidential campaign for a successor to General Diaz. Antonio Villavicencio, former commissary of police in the capital, is to be tried in Chihuahua for having tortured witnesses whom he put through the "third degree" while examining them in connection with the robbery of the Banco Minero of that place.—General Juan Navarro, who surrendered Ciudad Juárez to the Maderists, returned to the City of Mexico, where he was loud in his praises of Madero, who had risked his own life in saving Navarro from the wrath of some insurgents bent on the summary execution of the aged general.

Canada.—The crop reports are very encouraging from Albert and Saskatchewan. If all goes well, the yield will be 200 million bushels. In Manitoba signs of the exhaustion of the soil are appearing, and unless some steps be taken to ensure the proper use of fertilizers, the whole Northwest must, before many years are over, lose its productiveness.—The Niobe and Rainbow, pioneers of the Canadian navy, are temperance ships. Nevertheless, it is said that the conduct of the crew of the former during general leave at Quebec reminded old people of that of the men of the Royal Navy fifty years ago. It must be remembered, however, that most of the Niobe's men are very young, and that what would have only whetted the appetite of a tar of the old school would suffice to intoxicate half a dozen of them. The liquor question in even a temperance army and navy is very difficult to solve, as the abolition of the canteen has proved in this country.—The "Ne Temere" agitation still grows and threatens to cause much trouble. The English newspapers are taking it up.—A charter for a canal to connect the St. Lawrence by a canal to the Richelieu River and Lake Champlain, with the Hudson, has been applied for by Canadian and American capitalists.—Engineers report that it is quite possible to maintain ocean navigation throughout the year at least to Quebec, and steps are being taken to see what can be done in the matter, with the hope of making even Montreal a winter port.

Great Britain.—Mr. Masterman, Under-Secretary for Home Affairs, has been unseated at West Ham for violations of the election laws.—In the Ross and Cromarty by-election the Liberals retained the seat. The vote was comparatively light.—The striking Welsh miners asked the National Federation to proclaim a universal sympathetic strike on their behalf. The Federation refused by a majority of more than three-quarters of the votes cast, as it considers the proposals made in the conference of owners and men about a month ago satisfactory.—The seamen's strike, though far from universal, was more efficacious than owners expected it to be. Eight large ocean steamers which were to have carried spectators to the coronation review at Spithead could get no crews, and it was reported that they were to be withdrawn, to the great loss of their owners. Later advices, however, informed us that the companies had yielded to the men's demands.—Arthur Newton, an attorney of large practice in the criminal courts, who became famous for his management of the Crippen case, has been reported by the Law Society to the King's Bench division for unprofessional conduct, in causing to be published a letter purporting to have been written by Crippen in jail, and other false statements, for the purpose of influencing public opinion. This means that he is to be struck off the rolls.—Robert Ashe, Collector of the Maritime District, Tinnevely, Southern India, was shot dead in a train by a Brahmin, who then killed himself. The murder is a result of the prosecutions of last year.—The Imperial Conference drags on. Sir Wilfrid Laurier throws cold water on nearly every suggestion savoring of practical imperialism. The more moderate journals have taken up his defence against the more violently imperialistic, pointing out that he cannot be expected to sacrifice Canadian interests without compensation. He was the first to listen to Mr. Chamberlain, and took the first step towards a real unity of empire in his preferential tariff rates for England. The Unionists took what he offered; he has been waiting fifteen years for some return, and has not got it.

Ireland.—A very successful Industrial Exhibition called Ui Brassil, took place in Dublin during the first week of June. It consisted of object lessons in Irish industries and the economies of rural and civic life combined with social functions, in which the music and customs of Gaelic Ireland were illustrated. Besides stimulating self-help and industrial enterprise, it added substantially to the resources of the "National Health Association." It was notable for the fact that all classes and parties worked smoothly together to make it a success. It was followed by the seventh All-Ireland Industrial Conference, which opened June 14. The report for 1910-11 contained a long list of instances in which non-Irish firms in many lands were prevented from selling goods bearing misleading Irish titles and designs. Over 500 Irish firms bear the Irish trade-mark, which the Association has registered in France, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. There are 250 Irish Industrial Schools in operation, and Irish manufacturers have awakened to the necessity of adopting more enterprising methods in advertising their products. Irish shopkeepers, representative bodies and the general public are now buying, selling and patronizing by preference Irish-made goods, with the result that opportunities for employment were enlarged, more money was spent at home, and there was good hope of stemming the tide of emigration.—The Irish public bodies are practically unanimous that the Lloyd George Insurance Bill cannot be accepted in its present form, and that a practically new bill, conformable to Irish needs, will have to be introduced if the scheme is to apply to Ireland.—Three large Feisanna, consisting of competitions in Irish language, music, history, etc., were held in Dublin, Limerick and Dundalk. Dr. Douglas Hyde unfolded a plan for having Gaelic taught in every school in Ireland. Now that the University had adopted it, the National and Intermediate Boards must follow. Rev. W. Byrne, S. J., speaking at the Limerick Feis, said the remarkable progress of the movement and the moral and practical benefits derived from it indicated that it would live and spread and revive the olden spirit of the Gael.—Miss O'Connor-Eccles, a distinguished Catholic writer and social worker, has died in London. She belonged to the O'Connor Don family and was a direct descendant of Rory O'Connor, the last King of all Ireland.—There have been several defections among Mr. William O'Brien's leading supporters. Sir T. C. O'Brien in resigning the Vice-presidency of the All-for-Ireland League advised Mr. O'Brien, in view of the necessity of securing a strong Home Rule Bill, to settle the trivial differences between him and Mr. Redmond.

France.—The trouble in the champagne district continues. To the consternation of all France, the German flag was seen flying over the Government buildings at Baroville, and the red flag from the church steeple. At Couvignon and other villages there were inscriptions on the walls of public and private buildings: "Long live Prussia and her king." To you, William, we make a present of our vineyards. The dirty Republic does not want them," etc.—Thanks to a bungling speech by General Goiran, Minister of War, the Ministry of Monis collapsed and the resignation of the cabinet was offered to Fallières on Monday, June 26. The speech, however, was an occasion, not a cause; for the structure was rotten throughout. Several old political schemers like Clemenceau, Millerand, Poincaré, Delcassé, and others are looking forward to a return to power.

Portugal.—As the Government has suppressed all religious holidays, it must need look about for others to take their place. Hence, on June 10, it celebrated the 331st anniversary of the death of Camoens, the author of the "Lusiad." It is to be kept annually.—Anselmo Braamcamp-Freire, President of the Municipal Council of Lisbon, was elected President of the Republic of Portugal, by the Constituent Assembly, on June 21.

Germany.—According to the program agreed upon, the second division of the American Atlantic fleet arrived at Kiel early in the morning of June 21, and the vessels moored in the inner harbor, where they were surrounded by the array of battleships and yachts gathered for the Emperor's great annual naval festival. The welcome extended to the American fleet was a most cordial one; practically the entire German navy, including a full division of the new dreadnoughts, was assembled to greet the visitors. The American battleships, led by the Louisiana, Rear-Admiral Badger's flagship, slowly steamed through the narrowing fiord, passing long lines of German ships, and turned to their assigned places, between the flagships Deutschland and Kaiser Wilhelm II and the other vessels of the German fleets. Once moored, the guns of the battleships were kept hot with an almost uninterrupted exchange of salutes for several hours, as the admirals, commanders, diplomats and consular representatives came and went between the entertaining and visiting craft, exchanging official calls of courtesy.—Emperor William arrived in the afternoon and was saluted with thirty-three guns by every warship in the harbor. His yacht, the Hohenzollern, flew the German ensign and the Stars and Stripes as it steamed past the German and American lines. Admiral Badger and Ambassador Hill dined with the Emperor in the evening, and his Majesty is reported to have been most gracious to America's representatives.—Shortly after the adjournment of the Reichstag for the summer, Emperor William addressed to Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg a particularly cordial note of thanks for the efficient work of parliament during the recent session. He commended especially the results achieved in the matter of imperial insurance, and in the question of the new constitution for Alsace-Lorraine. The press accepts his majesty's note as an evident sign that he does not agree with the sharp criticism passed by leading Conservatives on the constitutional reforms embodied in these two measures. The Kölnische Volkszeitung remarks: "If Emperor William sees in the work done in the last parliament nothing detrimental to his own prerogatives or to the prestige of Prussia, surely it ill beseems any leader to criticize that work as a slap at the constitution of that country."

Austria-Hungary.—The result of the second balloting in the elections, announced on June 21, makes the Waterloo of the Christian-Socialists even more striking than had been foreshadowed in the primary balloting a week before. Every effort had been used to win the German-Nationalist party to common action with the Christian-Socialists, in order to defeat the aggressive Social-Democrats. The German-Nationalists were obdurate in their policy of opposition to the Christian-Socialists, and the final results mark a defeat of the latter that is overwhelming. In Vienna, itself, where in the last parliament they held twenty seats, they now retain four; the German-Nationalists have increased their representation from the three seats formerly held to ten. But it is with the Social Democrats that the real victory rests. Instead of the ten seats forming their contingent of the parliamentary representation from Vienna in the house lately dissolved, they will have nineteen seats in the parliament now chosen. Prominent leaders of the Christian-Socialist party have fallen, among them the President of the lower house in the last parliament, Dr. Pattai, Prince Aloys Lichtenstein, Chief-Burgomaster Neumayer, and

Dr. Weiskirchner, Minister of Commerce in the present cabinet. The defeated Minister at once resigned his portfolio, and a reorganization of the cabinet, it is said, will now be made.—Press despatches affirm that stormy and riotous scenes marked the balloting in many districts of the kingdom.—The summer home of Emperor Francis Joseph in Ischl has been put in readiness for his expected arrival there. The lengthy stay in the Villa Hermes, it is reported, has quite restored the venerable ruler's health, and the invigorating climate of Ischl has always proved a tonic for him. He will reach Ischl early in July, and remain there at least until after August 18, on which day, with the members of the imperial family, he will celebrate quietly his eighty-first birthday.

China.—Reviewing the recent outbreak, it must be said that it discloses a certain amount of discontent against the Manchu government and the officials who are considered its tools and pursue too exclusively their own interests. To satisfy the people, the rulers must seek the general welfare and carry out reforms effectively. Many Chinese are now educated abroad and see how foreign countries are governed. When they return, comparisons are made and the need of a better state of things is candidly admitted and urged by all.

In arranging the new "Four Nation Loan" the matter of supervision has been practically waived. Several Chinese consider that it has been altogether set aside. Sheng Kung-pao, President of the Ministry of Posts and Communications, has, however, promised Mr. Calhoun that an expert in finance will be appointed, but of a nationality other than that of the "Four Nations," possibly Dutch or Belgian. This must have seemed to the representatives of the Powers to be a sufficient guarantee that the money will be expended for the purposes for which it was intended. Still the door is open for complications, and these will arise, especially when the National Assembly will discuss the details of the loan. Already the Provincial Council of Chihli considers that the Board of Finance, in raising such a big loan, sacrificed China's rights and interests, and that it will lead to dismemberment of the country. It has, therefore, wired to the other Provincial Councils throughout the Empire, asking them to offer suggestions, with a view to taking joint action.

Despite eventual complications it must, however, be admitted that the loan is a great success. By securing the cooperation of the "Four Nations" it admirably thwarts Peking in her customary policy of playing off one nation against another. It is also, under another form, Mr. Knox's scheme for the neutralization of Manchuria, and signifies a distinct setback to Russia and Japan's absorption of the country. The currency reform, one of the most necessary for the welfare of the Empire, will likewise be carried out, at least in Chinese fashion.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Supreme Court and the Tobacco Trust

There is a story current in the tobacco trade that once, while on a train traveling through Pennsylvania with his father, James B. Duke, President of the American Tobacco Company, saw an immense plant of the Standard Oil Company, and being impressed by the sight remarked to his father, "I am going to build up a similar business in the tobacco trade." Whether or not this story is true there is hardly any doubt that the present domination of the American Tobacco Company in the tobacco industry was planned from the very beginning of its organization, and James B. Duke, its first president, twenty-one years ago, and still at the head of this powerful organization, has now been condemned, along with his undoubted model, the Standard Oil Company, by the highest court of the land, as a malefactor and violator of the laws of the United States.

The Tobacco Trust had its origin in January, 1890, and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law was enacted on July 2, 1890, so that the law under which the Trust has been condemned was simultaneous with it. One cannot help observing that twenty-one years seems to be a long time for a law to overtake a malefactor, whose evil deeds were simultaneous, but one must reflect that Trusts—modern American Trusts, their developments and methods and their numbers—are mainly a gradual product of the past twenty years, and that it is only now that many things are coming to be generally known about Trusts, and that their natural limitations about which the philosophers have theorized are beginning to be manifested, and now at last a beginning has been made in fixing their legal limitations. The interpretation of the Anti-Trust law made in the two recent Supreme Court Decisions promises to be an effective standard in curbing the lawless course of many American corporations which have grown into trusts.

The Supreme Court in deciding, on May 29, that the American Tobacco Company is a Trust, and its dissolution decreed, preceded by a similar decision against the Standard Oil Company on May 15, seems to have a side effect, probably not within the contemplation of the Court at the time, in jarring very rudely the dream of the Socialist that Trusts would grow and grow, until they grew into one grand Government Trust owned by all the people, but alas, they feel instinctively that the smooth progress of the Trusts is now stayed for many years to come. This is probably the sole reason why they have attacked the Supreme Court so severely, and thereby they are marking the decision as epoch making and confirming the confidence and loyalty which the rank and file of the country have had in the Supreme Court since the days of the Fathers of the Country. Had the Government Bill been dismissed upon clear legal errors made by the prosecution in the proceeding, these same cynical minds would have been gleeful in their dilations on the power of money. Before the decision was handed down there was but one prediction of materialistic minded persons, and that was "The Trust Will Win the Case." Now that this has not happened they are busy minimizing the effect of the decision, and Senator LaFollette has unwisely said, if he has not been incorrectly reported, that he never heard of a criminal treated before so leniently, in that his case was referred back to a lower court to take further evidence. Here it might be proper to state that the Government's prosecution was under the civil section of the statute, and the referring back to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the New York Circuit concerns only the remedy, and this original treatment is caused solely by the magnitude of the interests involved and the nature of the Trust. One striking reason for believing that the remedy will prove effective is to be found in this, that if after six months, or an additional two months, as may be allowed by the lower court, the Tobacco Trust, upon whom a great part of the burden is adroitly thrown, has not evolved a condition harmonious with the law, the Supreme Court will appoint a receiver for this immense industrial combination.

However, one shrewd newspaper man in New York observed recently that James B. Duke had anticipated pretty well what the decision of the Supreme Court was going to be, and that the future will indicate that he has his plans well in hand. Many persons in the tobacco trade have been remarking a change in the conduct of representatives of the American Tobacco Company since 1907, the year the suit was filed in the Federal Court in New York. Courtesy, fair dealing and energy have been the marks of the Trust's agents. The trade publications have carried no reports of intimidation of retail dealers and jobbers, no reports of cut rate wars carried on in certain markets by the Trust against the particular brand of an independent manufacturer, and the policy of the retail branch, known as the United Cigar Stores Company, was not offensively competitive, and retail prices were well maintained. As a final instance that the American Tobacco Company was on its good behavior during this period, it made a purchase of a pooled crop of tobacco of the Kentucky growers, and thereby made their hostile organization a success, at least for that particular season; this they did, although the growers aimed to show special favors to the independent tobacco manufacturer. In a word, the American Tobacco Company has been doing business during the past four years on its merits, and has made progress.

It would appear that now that the Tobacco Trust is willing to do business on its mere "bigness," the Supreme Court in its wisdom and directed by the Sherman Law does not appear willing that it should, and believes apparently that its bigness, which it has achieved by lawless acts, would be injurious to free and unrestrained trade in the tobacco industry. The Supreme Court has indicated in its decree the combination in and of itself, as well as each and all of the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately, be decreed to be in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize, and in view of this it does not seem probable that a new corporation to take over all the property as an entirety of the old combination will prove acceptable to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the New York Circuit, to whom the matter has been referred back for final adjustment. And especially so does this appear a rational expectation when one considers the monopoly now enjoyed by the American Tobacco Company in the licorice business. Independent manufacturers have been compelled to purchase their supplies of licorice from the Trust, and limitations were put upon their purchases, an arbitrary amount being fixed as their quota from month to month, and the prices increased on the manufactured licorice. This is a business that evidently must be separated from the new company or companies of the Trust.

Under Section 7 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Statute there is a provision that any person injured by the operation of the Trust, which the American Tobacco Company is now declared to be, can enter suit for treble damages. This is a factor in the situation which will prove troublesome.

From the conditions now prevailing in the tobacco trade and from the history of the Trust, a deduction can be made that in the industrial field in which a lawless Trust is operating it is not able to secure a complete monopoly, for the old ties in business of friendship, nationality, religion, unionism and local pride keep a certain number of manufacturers agoing, and then also it would appear that there is a certain advantage for the small manufacturer to be in the same field as a large corporation, for the large operator has a tendency to systematize conditions and paves the way for better prices—a lead which the small manufacturer has not been slow to follow.

The Tobacco Trust, beyond a doubt, has raised prices to the manifest injury of jobber, retail dealer and consumer. This has been a marked feature of its existence.

One great gain to the public and the tobacco trade by the success of the government suit will be the elimination of a large number of concerns masquerading as independents. There is no doubt that even to-day there are a number of concerns operating in the tobacco trade as independents which were not made parties defendant in the suit, and they prove deceptive even to men of experience in the tobacco world. This is manifestly unfair competition.

What guarantee have the people that the new company or companies to be formed under the decree will not also violate the law? Attorney-General Wickersham answers this in a press interview by stating that now that the statute means undue restraint of trade, juries will not be unwilling to convict in a criminal proceeding, which will surely check the lawless course of industrial magnates. Many practical men in the tobacco trade believe this threat will prove itself an effective check.

GERALD J. CONNOLLY.

The Belgian Collapse

The announcement of the fall of the Schollaert Ministry came like a clap of thunder. No one expected it, not even the Liberal-Socialist combination that was arrayed against it. As late as June 20, the Belgian papers left us completely in the dark as to what caused the crash, though unpleasant whispers were being heard about the venerable ex-Minister Woeste, and later advices revealed the fact that it was he who dealt the fatal blow, and that even the King, whose accession was hailed with such a delirium of joy by the Catholics, was thought to have had much to do with the disaster. On the other hand, the blame is put on Schollaert for having protracted the debate until June.

Schollaert came into power at the beginning of the year 1908, a few weeks after the sudden death of de Troos, who seemed to be just on the point of initiating a splendid political career. The moment was a very critical one for the fortunes of the Catholic party, but Schollaert proved equal to the emergency and has won the right to be regarded as Belgium's ablest statesman.

The first difficulty bequeathed to him by his distinguished predecessor was the Congo Question. England's attitude, or at least the attitude of a number of people in that country, who forced themselves into prominence in discussing the problem, is still fresh in the public mind. Schollaert's patience and tact induced the Legislature to take over King Leopold's African domain, and on September 15, 1908, the Belgian flag floated for the first time under the burning sun of the tropics. That was his first triumph in statecraft.

There had been bitter dissensions among his followers during the course of this fight, but apparently he had succeeded in getting them under control. They broke out again, however, when the Army Bill came up for consideration, and for a moment it was feared that the famous party that had withstood the storms of more than a quarter of a century was about to founder. Schollaert, however, guided the ship of state with a steady hand, and a few weeks after the bill had passed all traces of dissension had vanished.

It was the School Bill, which in so many countries has brought disaster to politicians and parties, that drove him on the rocks. The clamor in the country, however, about the unfairness in the school arrangements was so loud and persistent that an attempt at solving the question could not be shirked.

At first it was suggested to imitate Holland, Germany and England in paying out of the public funds for the support of every properly qualified primary school, but with the usual excessive consideration for their foes, which seems to haunt Catholics when in power, they left the settlement of the question to the communal authorities. The result was that where Catholics were in the majority there was no difficulty and no complaint of any account from the opposite side, but in those sections of the country where their political opponents were in power, public school education was pronouncedly hostile to Christianity; and the Catholic residents of such places were obliged, if they wanted a Christian education for their children, to build and support their own schools, and meantime pay the public tax for the school fund.

Such was the extraordinary condition that prevailed in Catholic Belgium ever since 1884. Naturally there was a great deal of ill-feeling engendered by this palpable injustice, and a change was imperative. Unfortunately, it was delayed until the present time, when the Catholic majority in Parliament has dwindled down to the vanishing point. But the attempt had to be made, and a bill was introduced signed by the King and countersigned by the Ministers.

As the Belgians are very tenacious of their privileges, the Government was face to face with the problem of how to wrest the control of education from the hands of the politicians of the various communes. A device was resorted to called the bon scolaire, or certificate, which the head of the family could present to any school of his choice, and which gave him the right to have his child educated in that particular institution. This bon scolaire entitled the school possessing it to be reimbursed by the Government for the cost of educating the child. Thus, the home and the parent were given control of education and not the political manipulators of the communes.

Against the bill the Liberals and the Socialists, who cordially detest each other, made a joint and bitter fight. They resorted to obstructionist and filibustering tactics in the House by holding up other measures, and succeeded also in alarming some timid souls by provoking street riots in which, however, beyond a few broken window panes, and some wild shouting before convents, no harm was done. Schollaert was perfectly sure of pressing his measure through, had it not been for one obstacle. Such measures are debated by the various sections of Parliament before being passed, but as in three of these sections the Catholics were in the minority, it was proposed by the Minister to refer the entire question to a Parliamentary Commission. To the amazement and disgust of the whole party, M. Woeste objected, so that the Catholics found the rock or the block upon which they had been standing split in the middle. That was bad enough, but just at this crisis His Majesty King Albert, without saying a word to his Prime Minister, summoned some of the inferior members of the Cabinet to a consultation. Woeste and Beernaert, as representatives of the Right, were also invited, and likewise a member of the Opposition. Such a proceeding was unprecedented, and according to the press, Woeste, when asked by the King what Schollaert should do, answered: "Let him resign as I did in 1884." Woeste himself in an interview denied that he used those words, but admitted his opposition to Schollaert.

Evidently the end had come. With a man of such authority as Woeste arrayed against him, and with the King himself resorting to such an unusual proceeding, although he had previously given his assent and signature to the Bill, there was nothing to do but to resign. So he presented himself before the House and declared the Cabinet dissolved. But the reception he received from his party was that of a conqueror in his hour of triumph, and not of a fallen and discredited Minister. Cheer after cheer saluted him as he entered the Chamber, and the entire Right crowded around him to grasp his hand and to assure him of their loyalty and affection. Even when he was retiring from the Assembly the acclamations continued, and he was followed to the door by his angry and devoted friends. There was one man, however, who took no part in this demonstration. It was Woeste. He sat silent in his seat, and his scandalized associates gazed at him with amazement. Finally a cry arose from the Opposition: "Hurrah for Woeste." "Do you hear that," said a furious Deputy of the Right, rushing up to him with indignation in his voice, "they are cheering for you?" But the old man was mute, and after a few moments withdrew by a private stairway. This was the second Minister whom Woeste had overthrown. He destroyed Beernaert in 1894. The whole country is shocked, but evidently Schollaert has not been eliminated from public life. Meantime the Liberals have to do the bidding of the Socialists.

When Schollaert resigned, M. Cooreman was summoned, but he pleaded the pressure of his private business; then Liebart was approached, and finally Baron de Broqueville accepted, and he has succeeded in having four members of the old Cabinet to assist him in forming a Ministry. They are M. Davignon, Minister of Foreign Affairs; M. Renken, Colonial Minister; M. Hubert, Minister of Labor; and General Hellebaut, Minister of War. Schollaert also promised them his loyal assistance. He is still considered chief of the party.

The incoming Minister, M. de Broqueville, is only 50 years old. He was born in the Chateau of Postel at Moll, on December 4, 1860. From 1886 to 1892 he represented his Canton in the Provincial Council of Antwerp, and from the year 1893 he has been a member of the Communal Council of Moll. He was elected Deputy on June 14, 1892, and has held that position until recently. As Minister of Railways he has inaugurated a number of valuable reforms, which have met with universal approval. His social position makes him a conspicuous figure in Brussels, and he exercises a wide influence. The world will watch with interest his future career, which is beset with difficulties.

Religious Training and Literature

If Catholic colleges cannot be the equals of other colleges in producing writers, the reason must be sought in two conditions which differentiate Catholic colleges, as a class, from all others. It is because they teach religion and its necessity, or because they lay down a comparatively inelastic course of study, which all students, regardless of their own peculiar wishes or those of their parents, are obliged to follow. These two conditions rise out of a single purpose on the part of Catholic faculties. They aim at a solid substructure and relegate special uses and developments of knowledge to a later period and to other auspices. A deep respect for intellectual and moral principles and for civilized ideas of refinement, as a starting point for the formation of life-long habits, is, in the eyes of Catholic educators, too important and fundamental an aim of education to be neglected in favor of premature accomplishments and precocious introductions into adult spheres. Catholic colleges act on the principle—a self-evident one, we should think—that the strain and stress on one part of a man's nature are distributed over the whole spiritual organism, and that the triumph which remains standing amid a general intellectual or moral collapse partakes more of the character of a curse than of a blessing. Acting on this theory, they confine their efforts to eliminate as much as possible that weakest part on which contingent pressures are sure to act indirectly and disastrously.

All this is, of course, contrary to the modern passion for success, rapid success, success of any kind and at any cost. Whether this passion of the multitude has been the cause or the effect of present-day tendencies in education—there have been, probably, mutual action and reaction—it seems to the philosophic observer that pedagogy places achievement above the man who achieves, regards public success as a pragmatic sanction of private failure, and, in its anxiety to make a student a business man, or a learned man, or an artistic man, fails to think of first making him simply a man. This scheme of academic functions falls in with the new idea pervading nearly all forms of modern thought, that the welfare of mankind in general is something quite distinct from and superior to individual goodness; and that personal worth is determined, not by personal virtue and ethical codes, but by public ability in influencing and affecting in a material way large groups of humanity.

The spirit of the times, as thus described, has coined a new word to express its novel theory. A "superman" is one whom some natural or carefully cultivated talent, in politics, statesmanship, literature, or any field of action, is supposed to elevate above and beyond those moral, material or artistic laws and standards by which common men are judged. Nothing can better illustrate the wide difference between Catholic and secular ideals. The "superman," with his transcendent scorn of laws, is the balanced antithesis of the supernatural man, the Catholic saint, with his transcendent reverence for laws. The world chooses its heroes for the very reasons which Catholic Christianity neglects; and the latter canonizes its saints for the very reasons which the world derides.

It need not be added, by way of parenthesis, that the glorification of the "superman" is a rather short-sighted policy even from a non-religious point of view. Leaning towers and ruined Colisæums have, we do not deny, a wondrousness and grandeur of their own; still, for all that, men do not deliberately ignore building laws or hasten the processes of decay. Shelley is, indeed, music to the ear and splendor to the inner vision; but a brood of Shelleys would be tiresome, as well as pernicious, to the most atheistic country in Europe. A "superman," as an accomplished fact and in the abstract, may be admired for the incidental romance of his rebellion; but, as a citizen and a member of one's family, he possesses very conspicuous drawbacks.

We come now to the question whether the staid, religious attitude of Catholic colleges injures their efficiency as training schools for writers. We fancy there can be no such question. Literature, either as an occupation or a pleasure, is in itself a morally indifferent thing, which religion, if it takes cognizance of it at all, wishes to elevate and inspire, rather than to discourage. The Catholic college, which should look askance at literature and literary development, would depart from the best and oldest traditions of Catholic education, and would pursue a suicidal course. For the literary frame of mind, that is, a wide outlook and a habit of balancing each new discovery of knowledge in the light of the ascertained facts of life and history, is a congenial condition for the religious spirit. It is violently opposed to that ultra-scientific concentration upon one square inch of the universe which forgets all the other square inches in magnifying its own, and so treats the flawless surface of truth's mirror as to take uncanny delight in every fresh distortion of unnatural elongation and compression reflected back from it. There is no surer way of destroying the religious faculty in man than in cultivating an unhealthy absorption in some small field of scientific inquiry. We have heard of literary men whose religious conscience had been allowed to sink into torpor returning at last after weary wandering, with sighs of peaceful and happy relief, to the warm embrace of truth; but of a scientist whose religious sense has once become dormant we have no similar recollection. There is something baleful and sinister in the way the modern scientist can ignore the vital experiences of his fellow men in his preoccupied and monomaniacal attention to a test-tube or a page of uncials. In saying this no disrespect for science is intended. It is the exaggeration of the scientific spirit which we have in view, the spirit which deliberately denies importance to all facts except the particular fact under examination, which is not satisfied to lay its own fact alongside others as a disinterested contribution to general knowledge, but must needs use that fact as the only key to all the mysteries in heaven and earth.

Catholic colleges have not attempted to moderate scientific ardor; but they have attempted to keep it tethered to central truth and to correlate it with other forms of intellectual activity at a time when it betrays a tendency to isolate itself in solitary dictatorship. No one who can rise above popular misconceptions will deny that this attitude, favorable as it is to the best spiritual interests of mankind and to the soundest scientific work, is no less favorable to the preservation of literary ideals and auxiliaries. Literature, the classic expression of nations and ages, is an organic entity animated by universally recognizable experiences. Theocritus, redivivus, should have no more difficulty in admiring a modern poet than the latter has in admiring Theocritus. This universal intelligibility is a test of literary genuineness. The bizarre, the unusual, the various aspects of hysteria and depression, peculiar to each age, and diverging, above or below, from the line of normal consciousness,—these are the popular fads of one age and the puzzle and ridicule of every other. The literary worker who busies himself with them is fated for quick extinction. He may enjoy his little "hour of glorious life" in the magazines or among the best sellers; but even here his success will not necessarily be more dazzling, as it certainly will not be more prolonged, than if it were the result of a truer instinct or a saner method. If popularity were to depend upon striking violations of the Greek commandment of moderation in manner and matter, we should advise those who aspire to be popular writers never to go to any school or college. Let them sedulously practice their pens and cherish their ignorance of the ancient laws of art and life: a maximum of self-made art and a minimum of intellectual discipline have been known to produce a kind of triumph which no art, shackled by conscience and education, can hope to equal.

It would be an altogether new phenomenon in the history of the world's art if moral and intellectual license were to be a more potent inspirer than the divine ideals of goodness, beauty and truth, which are pinnacled upon the Law and attained through Obedience, and find their most glorious revealment in Christian teaching. It may be said, indeed, that art has nothing to do with morality; and great art has been often reduced to base uses. But it still remains a fact of literary history that the art which has been reverential to religion has always enlisted in its cause the finest fiber, the more arduous service, and has scaled heights inaccessible to scorners of creeds and to despisers of the religious yearning natural to man.

It is hard to see how the presence of the crucifix in Catholic schools can injure their efficiency in the teaching of literature. The Man, Whose dead form hangs thereon, is God in all reality, and also to all appearances, so far as the flesh-veiled eyes of men can see the beauty and the love of God. He is literally the Incarnation of Beauty Itself and Goodness Itself, Truth Itself and Love Itself, of which the fair and true things of life are the creations and the reflections. With Him in our minds all fair and true things are joys; with Him absent, they are mere treacherous surfaces beguiling the hungry heart and pitching the restless soul into abysses of self-torment, bitter disillusion and despair. We have enough of the literature of pessimism and bewilderment and hopelessness. This is the only literature which Catholic colleges, so far as their religious side is concerned, can be said to discourage.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Religious Statistics of England

Though the census for England and Wales gives no religious statistics, such information can be gained from the reports issued before the annual May meetings by most of the larger religious sects and the diocesan statistics of the Established Church. By combining all, one can form a rough idea of the aggregate numbers of the non-Catholic population in actual touch with some organized form of worship.

The estimated population of England and Wales is, in round numbers, thirty-six millions. The Established Church claims to be the Church of England, including in its fold the majority of the population. But the diocesan figures do not support this claim. The basis of the statistics is an enumeration of "Communicants," that is, of those who receive the "Sacrament" at Easter, and a further enumeration of scholars attending the Sunday schools of the Established Church. These figures partly overlap, for in High Church and Ritualist congregations large numbers of Sunday school scholars have been confirmed and are "communicants." On the other hand, children not attending Sunday school are not counted in any way. Taking last year's figures, we have: Communicants, 2,283,044; Sunday scholars, 2,518,918. Total, 4,801,962. That is an active membership of about five millions, or about one-seventh of the total population, and the figures show a steady increase. Thus the total for 1908-9 was 4,725,980, so that the increase in the following twelve months was just over 75,000. This is, I believe, mostly, if not entirely, in those parishes where High Church clergymen, by teaching Catholic doctrines and imitating Catholic ritual and Catholic devotional practices, are winning the people from the current indifferentism.

What confirms this view is that, almost without exception, the Nonconformist bodies are steadily losing ground. The great bulk of these are Methodists (of various sub-denominations), Baptists, Presbyterians or Congregationalists. The official figures of these four denominations for the last two years show some remarkable decreases, and this has been a feature of the figures for some years back. For the sake of comparison I tabulate the results of two years in parallel columns:

DENOMINATION.	Church Members.
	1910	1909	Dec.	Inc.
Methodists, Primitive	211,691	212,168	477
" United	146,715	147,547	1,132
" Wesleyan	485,244	488,463	3,219
" Wesleyan Reform... ..	8,366	8,366	no change
" Calvinistic	184,588	185,289	701
" Independent	9,035	9,947	912
Presbyterians	86,808	86,421		387
Congregationalists	454,810	456,613	1,803
Baptists	418,680	422,455	3,775
Totals	2,005,937	2,017,569	11,622

Before commenting on these figures I note in the same way the statistics of the Sunday schools:

DENOMINATION.	Sunday School Scholars.
	1910	1909	Dec.	Inc.
Methodists Primitive	470,039	465,531		4,508
" United	309,649	314,957	5,308
" Wesleyan	980,165	987,953	7,788
" Wesleyan Reform... ..	21,754	21,754	no change
" Calvinistic	189,308	189,308	no change
" Independent	27,747	27,219		528
Presbyterians	86,015	87,087	1,072
Congregationalists	668,095	678,389	10,294
Baptists	576,448	579,242	2,794
Totals	3,329,220	3,351,440	22,220

Collecting the results of these two tables, we have the following totals:

	1910	1909	Decrease
Church members	2,005,937	2,017,569	11,622
Sunday School Scholars.....	3,329,157	3,351,442	22,222
Totals	5,335,157	5,369,009	33,844

It is remarkable that both with the Established Church and the Dissenting bodies the Sunday school scholars are more numerous than the adult church members. The excess in the former is not great. It is about 18 per cent. But among the latter the disproportion is enormous. In the above totals Sunday scholars exceed church members by 66 per cent. In particular sects the excess is still greater. Thus, the Primitive Methodists have for every hundred church members 223 Sunday scholars, an excess of 123 per cent. This is terribly significant. It can mean only that, having passed the Sunday school age, the young people drift away and do not take up church membership.

This explains the dwindling numbers of the Dissenters in the midst of an increasing population. Among the minor sects decreases are also the rule, though there are some exceptions. The Quakers (Society of Friends), with a total of 19,348, show an increase of 1,137, and the Moravians, 3,803 strong, claim an increase of 587.

It is remarkable that the decrease of numbers is accompanied by the opening of new chapels and meeting houses, although in every case the available sittings are far beyond the needs of the existing church membership. The Baptists, for only 418,000 members, have 1,462,646 sittings, and increased these during the year by 7,616, though they lost close upon 3,000 members. The Congregationalists, with a loss of over 1,000 in membership and over 10,000 in Sunday scholars, have actually added more than 18,000 sittings to the 1,700,000 of two years ago for a regular membership of less than 700,000. The Presbyterian and the Primitive Methodist sittings have decreased by nearly 3,000 for the former and 8,000 for the latter, a tale of chapels and meeting houses closed and abandoned.

Combining the Church of England figures and those of the nine chief sects of Dissenters, we have, including Sunday scholars, a total of (in round numbers) ten millions. It would be very liberal to estimate all other Protestant bodies a million. Many of them give no statistics. The permanent organization of the Salvation Army, for instance, is some thousands of officers (evangelists and social workers) and some thousand more "bandsmen." Its membership is a varying aggregate of small bodies of men and women drifting in and out of the relief centres and gospel halls and gathering at and disappearing from the open air preachings. The "Pleasant Sunday Afternoons" organization claims 500,000 adherents. But tens of thousands of these are Methodists, Congregationalists, etc. Others are merely the casual audience of its services, sacred concerts, punctuated with applause, opened and closed with a brief prayer and interrupted for a short address.

We may therefore take the effective membership of all forms of English Protestantism as between ten and eleven millions, out of a population of thirty-six millions. The Catholics number over a million and a half. And the remarkable fact is that we may take these million and a half Catholics to be the largest organized religious body in England holding a common doctrine and following one and the same code of religious practice. At first sight this claim may seem exaggerated, for there are the two million communicants and the two and a half million Sunday scholars of the established Church. But the Establishment is really an officially constituted aggregation of many religions. The Methodists, with about a million members and two million Sunday scholars, frankly acknowledge that they are not one body, and class their returns under the varieties of Primitive, United, Wesleyan, Wesleyan Reformed, Calvinistic and Independent. The differences in the Established Church are greater than any that these sectarian names indicate. They vary from the pseudo-Catholicity of extreme High Churchmen down to the open unbelief in some of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity characterizing the advanced members of the Broad Church. Take what standard one will, there is more dissent within the Established Church than outside of it.

Including the Catholics, we may say that about twelve out of thirty-six millions in England profess some form of Christianity. One must deduct from the remainder the large number of very young children of Christian parents not yet counted by any denomination. Even so, we have some twenty millions left. Here, again, we must remember that the careless and indifferent will account for many of these. But still there remains a huge total of the absolutely non-Christian or anti-Christian element. Numbers of these, though Christianity is not good enough for their "enlightened" and "scientific" minds, are the slaves of strange forms of credulity and superstition. Christian Science has three churches in London alone. "New Thought," another form of the same delusion, has two centres. There is a Buddhist congregation. There are several centres of Spiritism. The Mormons are carrying on an active propaganda, and will probably be before long the object of police measures. And Socialism is making headway, and possesses an organization of "Socialist Sunday Schools."

The one satisfactory element in the situation revealed by these facts and statistics is the steady progress of the Catholic Church. It is the one solid and advancing organization in the midst of general chaos and of the widespread decay of religious belief and practice.

A. H. A.

CORRESPONDENCE

More Details of the Verdesi Case

ROME, June 11, 1911.

The Verdesi case is closed for the present, but some of the pleas presented may interest American lawyers. Professor Scaduto, for instance, arguing for the defence, maintained that though Father Bricarelli was a private citizen he was also a Jesuit, and because he had asked leave of his superiors to come to court, he came as a Jesuit, and so should be treated as such with no rights before the court. He has denied receiving Verdesi's story in Confession: he is not to be believed, as canon law obliges him to deny the fact of Confession. He must have revealed it to the Pope, because he could not absolve such a case without special faculty from the Pope. The Proctor of the Crown here reminded Scaduto that, according to Verdesi's own statement, he had been absolved before he gave the Father the information conveyed to the Pope. Scaduto then took refuge in conditional absolution, as though it did not become effective until he delivered the denunciation to the Pope. As to the contention that Verdesi gave the information out of Confession, Scaduto urged that canon law makes matter spoken of after Confession come under the secret of Confession. Father Bricarelli may have thought that Verdesi was not communicating the matter under such confidence, but that does not change the fact. As for the Pope, in his communication through Cardinal Respighi, he had prejudged the case, and as this judgment was binding on all Catholics, it rendered justice to Verdesi impossible in the court. Finally, the ultimate opportunity of proof was denied to Verdesi, when the tribunal refused to call the Pope to court.

The weakness of Scaduto's argument suggests an inquiry as to his position as a canonist. This inquiry develops the fact that he is an ex-Franciscan friar, who has taken the chair of canon law in the government university at Turin, where his lectures call for such construction of canon law as will vindicate the present supremacy of the civil law and justify the action of the present government against the Church.

Signore Di Benedetto closed for the prosecution. In a three hours' speech he went over the whole ground of the evidence and called attention to the main fact that the publication of the charge against Father Bricarelli was admitted, and that when proof of the content had its opportunity it was not forthcoming; in fact, the defendant in his own affidavit admitted that the facts which Father Bricarelli communicated to the Holy Father were given to him outside of Confession. The defence had called for depositions from Cardinals Respighi and Martinelli in the matter, and when they turned out to be against the contention of the defence the latter called for their exclusion.

He then from the evidence presented in court in Verdesi's own statement, his correspondence and the testimony of his friends, drew a life-sketch of him, full of dishonesty, disloyalty, hypocrisy and self-seeking. His intent to defame he argued from the fact that, after leaving the Church, without any complaint of the sort and taking refuge with the Methodists, and after being domiciled there some time, he launched his charge against Confession in Holy Week, when Catholics were being urged to their Easter Confession. From the criminal psychology of the defamer, verified in detail in the character and conduct of Verdesi, he sought further confirmation of his deduction.

So far he proceeded more or less from antecedent probability, but coming down to the facts disclosed in evidence he showed that the matter concerned was no secret, but a question of common knowledge, and for a period of two years Verdesi himself had time and again spoken of it to several other friends, as well as to Father Bricarelli. It is true that Verdesi says that he told it to Bricarelli under sacred confidence connected with Confession; but the man is a liar, by the testimony of his friends called to testify in his favor, by the contradictions of his own statements in court, by the testimony of the ecclesiastical officials with whom he had had previous friendly relations.

Up to the time of his unfrocking, a period of two and a half years after the action of Father Bricarelli, he had continually spoken of him in the warmest terms of respect, gratitude and confidence; but two months before the denunciation he told his friends that he had an astounding revelation to make, and finally specified it to be the charge he was going to make against Father Bricarelli. As for Father Bricarelli himself it is clear that he wished to save Verdesi from the odium of having to make a formal denunciation over his own signature, and in point of fact there were no evil consequences forthcoming therefrom to the men denounced, as Verdesi himself had admitted with complaint.

The advocate Mazzolani, a journalistic lawyer connected with the Messaggero, the paper in which the libel was published, closed for the defence. While announcing himself as a heretic emancipated from all orthodoxy, he opened with a long defence of Modernism as the only orthodox form of Christianity, and claimed that as Julian the Apostate had launched his terrible persecution against the early Christians, so had the Holy Father inaugurated a martyrdom of the Modernists at the hands of his chosen legion, the Society of Jesus. The antecedent probabilities were all against Father Bricarelli, who, according to Gury, Escobar and Speroni, was justified in his violation of the secret entrusted to him. He confirmed this from a case of conscience printed for diocesan use, in which a clear case of such violation was closed with the query, "Was the seal of Confession thus violated?" indicating that the text-book did not condemn it.

Bricarelli, he went on to say, is a Jesuit, and the rules of the Society of Jesus in regard to manifestation of conscience show that the Jesuits had no respect for the secrecy of Confession. Verdesi was an innocent, simple, weak soul, seeking for peace of mind and an exalted ideal. His tastes were no more unpriestly than those of hundreds of priests in and out of the Church. The witnesses against him were not to be believed, because according to their doctrine of probabilism they could state what was false, and by their mental restriction could suppress what was true. These things the witnesses did so do in order to save the Society of Jesus. As for the depositions, the Cardinals, no more than other priests, could testify to the truth, and as a matter of fact had obviously prearranged their concordant testimony. The penalizing of the men denounced, the statements of the witnesses to the contrary notwithstanding, was in consequence of Verdesi's denunciation, and not through guile but a desire to repair wrong done to his friends had Verdesi issued his charge against Bricarelli.

The tribunal then withdrew, and after a conference of one hour and a half, at 8.20 p. m., on June 5th, 1911, returned the following verdict, which, as matter of record, is here given in full:

"The tribunal declares Gustavo Verdesi guilty of defamation through the press committed in Rome to the injury of Carlo Bricarelli on the 15th day of April, 1911, by the publication in the daily newspaper Il Messaggero of the signed letter inserted in column 5, page 4, of No. 105 of the said daily newspaper, with the qualification of extenuating circumstances of a general character. It sentences him to the penalty of imprisonment for ten months and a fine of 833 lire, to damages to the prosecuting party to an amount to be determined in another session of the court, and to the payment of the costs of the trial." This settles the matter for the present, though the defence, as was to be expected, have taken an appeal to the Court of Appeals.

On Sunday last the monument to Victor Emmanuel was dedicated. Owing to the closing of the approaches to the site, except to the invited guests, all the world and his wife, to say nothing of his multitudinous progeny, one of the glories of the Italian people, streamed through the Piazza di San Ignazio from 7.00 to 10.30 a. m. The ceremonies of the dedication were dignified and commendably brief, the speech of the occasion being in the masterly hands of the Prime Minister Giolitti. There was an official attempt to conceal all anti-Vatican utterances, but the anti-clerical papers could not miss their chance, and the Masonic manifesto signed with the name "Ferrari," with its maliciously mendacious reference to the Vatican ever lying in watchful ambush and as far as it can denying and cursing the liberty and unity of the Fatherland, compares the squalor of Rome and the misery of its inhabitants under the Popes to the splendor of the city and the happiness of its people under their present king. Unfortunately for the force of the antithesis it chose for its time of misery the years when the Popes were detained at Avignon and were not responsible for the condition of things at Rome. But in anti-religious literature it would seem that statement is all that is required; the readers never question nor ask for proof.

The monument, with its gilded bronze statue of Emmanuel and its architectural background of allegory is strikingly handsome, but nothing short of softening of the brain can explain the anti-clerical cry of enthusiasm that it eclipses St. Peter's. However, the same cephalous tumefaction is capable on some day of riot and disorder of calling for the destruction of St. Peter's. The only untoward incidents of the celebration proper were the appearance of a country syndic by name of Paolucci in clerical attire; he is only an ex-deacon of a remote village, but bound to make a stir: the other was the fiasco of the collation served "al fresco" on the the Palatine Hill to the five thousand visiting syndics; it turned out to be a box lunch, such as is sold in the railroad trains, distributed to them as to children on a charity picnic, to be eaten as best it might, wherever the recipient could find a corner in which to ensconce himself. The transportation companies reported the presence of two hundred thousand strangers in the city during the week; this may be true, for the city certainly held the largest crowds seen here since the Exposition year opened. However, not everybody is content, for the bulk of them had but little money to spend, coming as they did from the remoter parts of Italy, where money is not plentiful.

The Holy Father suspended public audiences during the week, so that it was impossible for the visitors to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. However, to-day he received the North American students, who are to return to the United States during the coming week, and with them some forty or fifty American Catholics. In the interim he received in private audience Mgr. Pitaval, the Archbishop of Santa Fé, New Mexico, and Mgr. Coccolo, the zealous patron of the Italian emigrants, who has established successful missions for their protection in Santos and Rio Janeiro, and proposes to establish similar stations in other parts of South America.

On Tuesday Cardinal Respighi solemnly consecrated the splendid church of St. Joachim in the Prati, erected in memory of the jubilee of Leo XIII, in which are a series of lovely national chapels, including one built by the contributions of the Catholics of the United States and adorned with the glorious Stars and Stripes.

It will interest your classical readers to learn that the government has begun near Licenza excavations to uncover the remains of the famous villa of Horace there. The work is in charge of Professor Angelo Pasqua.

C. M.

Spain's Domestic and Foreign Relations

MADRID, June 4, 1911.

One of the revolutionary war cries in Spain has always been, "Down with the excise!" This tax, levied on articles of food and drink, is the chief, if not the only source of income enjoyed by the municipalities. Since the revolution of 1868 there has not been a Republican meeting or any gathering of the "common people" in which there has not been a demand for the abolition of the hated excise, and street brawls and clashes with the authorities without number have taken place on account of it.

Such was the eagerness of Premier Canalejas to conciliate the Republicans and to make common cause with the radical elements in Spanish politics that he announced the suppression of the excise as one of the planks of his platform. In fulfilment of his party pledge he brought before the Cortes a project for laying a tax on the renting value of houses, on the use of electric lights, and other things, as a substitute for the tax on food and drink. His plan was unquestionably ill-advised and mischievous, for its greatest weight must necessarily fall on the tenant, while the proprietor and the rich in general reaped the profit. The tax was indeed to be taken off partridges, pheasants and fancy fish, but the price of bread and beef and milk and vegetables was not to be lowered. The municipalities, too, must share in the common misfortune, for without the excise they were left practically with no income for daily expenses and improvements. All this was duly demonstrated to Canalejas while his proposed measure was under discussion; but he was deaf to all representations. "Pass the bill or I shall retire from the council, and I will refuse my aid and counsel to any succeeding Liberal cabinet." He also threatened the Conservatives with his wrath, should they, as they had threatened, prevent the passage of the bill by abstaining from voting. According to Spanish law, a numerical majority of each House of the Cortes must be present and pass upon a measure before it can become a law. Thus, as the Spanish Senate is composed at the present time of three hundred and fifty members, the presence of one hundred and seventy-six constitutes a quorum, and eighty-nine votes could secure the success of a measure. Politically, one hundred and seventy-eight senators are ministerialists, one hundred and eighteen are Conservatives, twenty-seven are classified as Independents, five are Carlists, four are Republicans, and there are eighteen prelates.

After the measure had passed the lower House, or Congress, it was believed that it must surely fail in the Senate, for many ministerialists were opposed to it. Then came the threats of Canalejas and next came the voting. To the general amazement of the public, one hundred and seventy-eight senators voted in favor of the bill and only sixty-three against it. It actually had in its favor, therefore, a majority of the whole senate. The result has strengthened the hold of Canalejas upon the leadership of his party, for some of his dissatisfied followers had already begun to intrigue for his overthrow and rejection.

But why did the Conservatives vote for a measure which they denounced in debate as bound to do harm and bring disaster? They were prompted for several reasons, among them being their unwillingness to bring upon their party the odium of thwarting the popular will in such a burning question as the excise; they also wished to deprive Canalejas of all pretext for averring that his policy was spoiled by the hostility of the Conservatives; in the third place, they felt that those who clamored for the suppression of the excise would soon see their mistake and would clamor anew for a return to the old system. In this, be it said, they made no idle prediction, for the radical press is already accusing Canalejas of having misled the people by pretending to embody their demands in a law which does not better matters, if, indeed, it does not even make them worse. We may, therefore, look forward with certainty to public disturbances and riots on the day when the law is to go into effect.

Although Spain's home affairs are in a state so unsatisfactory and threatening, the Morocco problem casts an ominous shadow over our international relations. Though we are far from wishing to pose as alarmists, we feel, nevertheless, that the Morocco question in its present state bodes ill for our country. Some months ago, when the diplomatic action of the powers parties to the convention of Algeiras, and, among them, France especially, was a topic of public discussion, Pablo Iglesias, the leader of the Spanish Socialists, declared in the House that if the government attempted to mobilize troops for an African campaign, his followers would take violent means to prevent it. His threat, we must say, was ridiculous, yet it sufficed to take all the wind out of the sails of the Premier, whose timidity and excessive moderation have precipitated a state of affairs that is truly critical. While France has gone forward step by step until she has troops in Fez, where she exercises a protectorate over the Sultan, Spain, which has so many reasons for extending her influence in Morocco, has remained cooped up in her little African corner, without even venturing to advance as far as Tetuan, a place that she could occupy without discharging a gun. At this rate, Spain's activity will soon be effectually blocked by a France on the north and by another France on the south. The sultanate of Morocco has long been in a moribund condition. The sultan's authority is effective as far as the gates of his palace; but beyond them lawless tribes defy him even while they hail him as their ruler. The tricolor will soon replace the crossed simitars in their field of red.

Fear, let us avow it openly, downright fear, has pounced upon us and paralyzed our action just when we should have done something in the face of Europe; but a threat from Pablo Iglesias and a frown from France have made Canalejas fold his arms and do nothing more energetic. In a word, we have come to the pass where a petty, halting, personal policy absorbs everything, controls everything. The one desire of Canalejas is to keep on, and this he endeavors to do by retaining the favor of the radicals. In reality, he is the poor prisoner of the members of the Left.

The last place, it would seem, where the prime minister of King Alfonso XIII should look for aid and comfort would be among the Republicans of Portugal, yet he has placed these petty Robespierres under a complicity by his action towards the Portuguese exiles. Braga and Costa sleep not, rest not; with their eyes glued on the Spanish frontier, they see a royalist conspirator in every scarecrow, a royalist army in every flock of goats. Who is to save the republic from such enemies? Who but Canalejas? At the bar of the Minho, in front of the Jesuit college, there have been anchored for the last few days three gunboats and the cruiser Adamastor, in the fear that the college harbored a vast quantity of arms and ammunition for the use of the Portuguese royalists! A Spanish college besieged by the Portuguese navy!

Among the Portuguese refugees in Spain, three of the most distinguished were the Count of Bertiandos, Captain Paiva Couceiro, and the well-known journalist, Chagas. They had at first established themselves in Vigo, near the frontier, but, at the request of the Braga cabinet, they had been directed to "move on"; and they did, as far as Santiago de Compostela in Galicia. Another intimation from Lisbon, and these three victims of Braga & Co. were expelled by order of Canalejas. Now, while he is so obsequious towards the Portuguese dictators and ready to expel from Spanish soil those who have fled thither to escape their tyranny, Canalejas seems to close his eyes to the fact that Spanish revolutionists are busy hobnobbing with their associates across the border in a way that needs no explanation. Evidently, his motto is: Rule or Ruin. It seems destined to prove Rule and Ruin.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1911.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1911, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; SECRETARY, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR;
Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Children of Israel

The New York Normal College, whose purpose is to train women teachers for the public schools, conferred diplomas of graduation this year on one hundred and thirty-six of its pupils. The names of the recipients of this academic honor, which is also an open sesame for a position, appear in the New York Herald of June 22, and the peculiarity, or, rather, the homogeneity, of the list furnishes food for reflection. It begins with the name of a fair maid who claims Abraham as a forbear, and then follow in rapid succession the Sarahs, and Rachels and Rebeccas who are the progeny of Isaac and Jacob, and Levi, and even Judas. There are also Cohens, and Esbergs, and Goldbergs, and Sklambergs, and Hirschmans, and Schulhoffs, and Stoloffs, and Suchoffs, and many other representatives of the same ambitious, laborious, persistent and pervasive race; while, on the other hand, there is only an occasional gleam down what seems a genealogical table of the Old Law of a timorous and uncomfortable patronymic suggestive of Gentile blood.

As the buildings of the Normal College are being enlarged at the present time, it is not unlikely that it may soon demand more ample accommodations and ultimately rival the magnificent and multitudinous pile which the many millions of New York's municipal moneys have invested with a beauty and splendor that nothing in the metropolis can boast of, and which is known as the City College. Indeed, the need seems imperative already; for whereas one hundred and thirty-six young women received their diplomas on Wednesday, only sixty-two young men were made Bachelors of Arts on Thursday in the gray and white buildings on the bluff. No doubt if the demand is made the authorities will hasten to grant it, for the same atmosphere pervades both institutions. Thus the honor men of Thursday were Isidore Eisenberg, Morse Sable Hirsch, Stephen K. Rapp and Robert Rubinstein. Of the Pell medals the gold one went to Morris Hirsch and the silver one to Monroe Meyer. In Chemistry, Israel Katz was honored; in Natural History, Israel Ziegler; in Moral Philosophy, Julius Dreschler. Scarcely a Christian name is visible to the naked eye. It is Herskowitz, and Goldberg, and Jacobs, and Judelsohn, and Rosenberg, and Silverstein, and so on to the end. One readily believes, after glancing at this array of ancient and prolific families, that the Jewish element is, as commonly believed, 90 per cent. in the student population of the gorgeous college, and that on Jewish holidays classes are suspended to permit the devout youths of the institution to hie them away to the Synagogue, to which, of course, it is doubtful if they go. On the other hand, it is hard to understand why the Rev. John Campbell was invited to pronounce the benediction in the college chapel at the Commencement Exercises of 1911, and one is curious to know which half of the Holy Book he dwelt upon. But there is something in all this more than an isolated academic fact. As these two great institutions furnish the teachers for the schools of New York, the result seems inevitable that not only the Christmas celebrations which have been in use hitherto and were already objected to, will cease, but also that all reference to Christian doctrine, Christian ethics, and Christian history will be tabooed in the public schools of the city. How are the crowded-out Christians of New York to get an education?

Despoilers of France

To win the popular approval for their high-handed proceedings in taking over the property of the Church and of the suppressed religious congregations the French freebooters spread the tales of the millions and millions tied up in these properties. The cupidity of the populace was aroused by pledges freely made that these millions were to be utilized for the common good; old-age pensions and countless other schemes of social beneficence were to be inaugurated for the good of the people. But the edifice was built upon sand. Scarcely a year had passed when Briand made known to the expectant people that the millions he had hoped to wrest from the Church and to expend for the social welfare of France had been grossly exaggerated. His successor to-day is obliged to confess that Briand's corrected estimate is similarly far and wide of the mark.

Up to date eight-tenths of the sequestered Church properties have been sold and the total of cash proceeds in the hands of the civil authorities is conceded to be but 227 million francs. And of this total seven million francs must be safely invested to secure the pitiful pension the Church separation law binds the Government to pay to needy and invalid priests robbed of the rights the Concordat conceded to them. It is an overwhelming bankruptcy of the visionary schemes built upon the sacrilegious robbery of the Church, but it is one easily understood when we recall the manner in which the disposal of the proceeds of the sacrilege was effected.

Wonderful stories are told of the liquidation, despite the efforts of the Republican Government to hide the history of a criminality such as the world has rarely witnessed. One record makes known how, in Perpignan, a building which had been sold for 9,000 francs was found to have accumulated, during the various processes preceding the sale, an expense outlay footing up 18,000 francs. The Carthusian Monastery of the Grande-Chartreuse, with its real and personal belongings was declared to have a value of 13 million francs. When the final accounting of the trustee charged with its sale was presented to the Court sitting in Grenoble, the list of assets in that gentleman's hands totaled 750,000 francs, to offset which he submitted a schedule of liabilities of the astounding sum of 5,000,000 francs incurred in settling the estate. Of course, there has been mountainous fraud in the sales. And over and above the fraud, the agents entrusted with the liquidation, mostly Hebrew capitalists, were able to drive rare bargains in disposing of properties which no Catholic, however wealthy, might attempt to bid in because of the ecclesiastical censure attached to such an action. Deceit and fraud and selfish bartering grew to be so barefaced that even the anti-clerical chamber rebelled and ordered a commission of inquiry to look into the entire matter. Its report tells a fairly full story of the unspeakable scandals—and shows how in repeated instances well-known buyers had secured possession of estates for a pitiful third of their actual value.

But there is another element to be considered, one which is more overwhelming in the injury it imports to national life than are even the terrible losses this criminal conduct has brought about. A Catholic Senator of France, M. Piou, declared a few days ago in the Senate that, in the awful catastrophe which recent legislation has brought upon the Church, there is involved an industry representing an investment of 257 million francs, and in which 65,400 workmen were interested. He referred to the manufacture of church goods and religious articles. How true was the word he spoke statistics just to hand make known to us. In Lyons investments in gold and bronze industries have fallen from 4,500,000 francs to a bare 500,000 francs. In Paris workers in these same industries are mourning a loss in salaries amounting to 4,000,000 francs. Returns from one of the departments of the Loire tell of a decrease of 818,000 francs in the amount of business done in these same branches of trade, and a loss of 240,000 francs in salaries. A church builder in Lille computes his losses at half a million francs, and he confesses that he has been obliged to reduce his working force from 125 to 25 men. Naturally,—who can fail to recognize the reasonableness of their action—many corporations and firms long established in France are leaving the country to seek new opportunities in lands less hostile to their business interests.

Nor is this the sole loss which the vicious policy of the freebooters has caused to unhappy France. One needs but recall the immense sums which the National Treasury must pay out for the new school edifices, for the new teachers, the new hospital nurses and caretakers in national institutions. What Catholic charity once accomplished must now be made good by the State. And the expenses the State must meet in its effort to do so are enormous. Two examples will serve to make our contention clear. The Carthusians in the Grande-Chartreuse used, at their own cost, to care for thousands in a hospital built by themselves, with an annual outlay of 80,000 francs; since the liquidation the communal authorities have paid 40,000 francs for the care of fifteen patients. In Paris the personnel in charge of the charitable institutions, now the charge of the city, eat up sixty-five per cent. of the whole appropriation made for the upkeep of these establishments.

But, possibly, there is some way in which an alleviation comes to the people, perhaps taxes have been reduced and other civic burdens have been lightened. Nothing can be farther from the truth. The French people pay not a centime less in taxation than they were wont to pay before the Separation law, and, worse than this, there is not a country in the world in which the small property holder is so crushed by the weight of indirect tribute as is the French peasant. Statistics show that in little Belgium, a land in which tenfold more is achieved for the social betterment of the people, scarcely a third as high a tax rate exists as in France; they show, too, that neither Germany nor England imposes such burdens upon the people as does the Republican Government now guiding France's destiny. When will the wickedness of it all be recognized by men of other lands, who laud the efforts of the un-Christian horde in their evil campaign against Christ's Church? Even Combes, the arch-plotter in the opening of the struggle against religion in France, expressed his disgust over the present outcome. "What have these men done with the system I established?" he is said to have exclaimed. "They have made of it a hazard of bandits."

Chartreuse

We hail with pleasure the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which stretches its protecting hand over a set of homeless, impoverished and exiled monks, and prevents a rich corporation from robbing them of their means of livelihood.

When the French Government, seven or eight years ago, let loose its ravaging hordes of liquidators to loot the ecclesiastical properties it had stolen, the worthy to whom the vast possessions of the Grande Chartreuse were assigned, besides imitating his fellows in disposing of the property at auction, formed a company to sell the famous cordial of the monks in domestic and foreign markets. Although they had gone off with their secret, a certain chemist fancied he had made a decoction just as good, and accordingly launched it on the world, with the well-known trade-mark of the monastery.

A protest was immediately made in France, but the court ruled that it was a matter for the police and could not be discussed. Proceedings were also begun in England against the use of the trade-mark, and the English courts upheld the protest, and found that the company was infringing a vested right. Then an attempt was made to sell the spurious stuff in the United States, and Justice Hughes has just written the decision in favor of the plaintiffs, perpetually enjoining the company from using the label.

The learned Justice affirms (1) that the word "Chartreuse" is not a geographical or regional name in the ordinary sense of the word, and cannot, therefore, be employed by a rival firm; (2) that the liquidation proceedings in France did not annul the right of the monks to their trade-mark; (3) that the claim to it had not only not been given up but protested against by sending the original cordial to the markets and by instituting proceedings before the courts; and, finally, that the decree pronounced by the Circuit Court to that effect was just and proper.

He declared also that the company selling the cordial was compelled in justice to state clearly the difference between the two articles, but added that the permission given by the lower court to employ the word "Chartreuse" when that explanation was made, was inconsistent with its decree as to the ownership of the trade-mark, and should be amended. This also held even if the words "Carthusian Monks" or "Pères Chartreux" were employed instead of "Chartreuse," as such a label "served the purpose of dissimulation and drew to the defendant's liquor the reputation of the monks."

The French Government must be shocked to find English and American ideas of justice so radically different from those that prevail in France.

Pittsburg Library Catalogue

Two weeks ago we ventured to raise a doubt about the value to Catholics of the publication of such catalogues as the one just issued by the Pittsburg Public Library, in which a classified list of all the works of Catholic authors to be found in the library is published in a volume of 240 pages. Our remarks have drawn forth two letters from respected correspondents, which are printed in this issue of AMERICA. One writer thinks our criticism a "dash of cold water" "altogether unmerited"; the other deems us inconsistent as "urging the generous stocking of public libraries with Catholic works" and being "averse to letting Catholics themselves know by means of special lists just what books are in the library."

The chief point of our criticism seems to have been missed. That the names of some authors who are not Catholics should be found in the list is a matter of little moment, for the error may be remedied in subsequent editions. But why lay before Catholic readers all the works found in the library attributable to Catholics? Their appearance in the Catalogue is a recommendation to read them. We remarked there have been books written by Catholics which were better buried in oblivion. Unfortunately, some of these are to be found in the Catalogue we refer to. For over twenty years Dryden degraded his genius by pandering in his dramas to the coarse, the vulgar and the obscene. Yet these dramas are set forth for the Catholic youth and the Catholic maiden to read. The title of some of them should sound a note of warning, as "The Assigination; or, Love in a Nunnery." Then take our friend Chaucer. Some of his tales are far from being unobjectionable. Are Catholics, and especially the young, to read and find out for themselves? Several complete editions are set down in the printed list. A note to one edition says that the impurities have been expunged. There are some editions in this printed list in which the objectionable stories are reproduced in toto. Then, too, the works of Chaucer bristle with difficulties; there are the minor difficulties of the text and the greater ones in the understanding of Catholic usages and Catholic ritual. Is no word of warning to be addressed to the unsuspecting student or reader who takes up the standard Protestant commentaries? Skeat, for example, undoubtedly ranks high as an etymologist, but his religious bias and his ignorance of Catholic customs play havoc at times with the interpretation and illustration of the text.

So long, then, as the indiscriminate reading of these authors, and others we might mention, is recommended, we still are of the opinion that the circulation of this and similar catalogues will do great harm. They might easily be made to do an immense amount of good.

It is not, then, to the issuance of catalogues giving the lists of books of Catholic authorship found in public libraries that we object, but to the baneful inclusion of works which would be better ignored.

Developments in Alsace-Lorraine

During the debate on the bill which embodied the new constitution for Alsace-Lorraine, it seemed to be accepted, almost as a matter of course, that most of the members representing in future parliaments the proposed independent State would affiliate with the Centre party. A large majority of the population of the Reichsland was Catholic, and as long ago as the year 1906 representatives of the strongly organized "Centre Societies" in the province met in Strasburg and agreed unanimously on the foundation of a local Centre party. Statutes of incorporation were then drawn up and the working program for the immediate future decided on.

The union thus formed has a vigorous voting strength in all the centres of population.

Developments in Alsace-Lorraine, since the acceptance of the new constitution bill by the German Reichstag, seem to weaken the assurance with which politicians have predicted the preponderance there of Centre sentiment. Sunday, May 28, a meeting of the executive committee of the Alsace-Lorraine Centre party was held in Strasbourg. Two resolutions were presented for action. One expressed the dissatisfaction of the delegates with the provisions of the new constitution; the other, after speeches, in which much frank criticism of the policy of the Centrists during the consideration of the bill had been indulged in, asked that the Alsatian deputies hitherto acting with the Centre should be absolved from that allegiance. It appears that of the four members of the Reichstag then present, two had agreed with the resolution, and two opposed it.

The former resolution passed with an almost unanimous vote. No one expected any other outcome, as the people of Alsace-Lorraine had long since made known their lack of satisfaction with the measure of independence the new constitution concedes to them. The second resolution was laid upon the table, since its content was deemed of sufficient importance to be brought before the convention of the party soon to be assembled.

The evident mistrust implied in the resolution is, to be sure, not at all agreeable to the German Centre. A quasi-official utterance from their headquarters in Berlin bids the Alsations go slowly. It warns them that political bargaining and threatened secession from known friends will hardly help them to secure the amendments they hope to pass for the betterment of the new constitution. The best features of the bill, it is added, the privilege of three votes in the Federal Council (Bundesrath) and the insistence upon the equal suffrage right, were, after all, due to the efforts of the Centre in the Reichstag, and it will be only through the friendly aid of the Centre that the further privileges demanded by Alsace-Lorraine can be obtained. If the representatives of the new State adopt the policy the present action appears to portend, they will help neither their own cause nor that of the empire; they will rather advance the interests of the opposition, who are even yet clamoring that the province is unfitted for the rights of home rule and self-government. It may be, says the pronouncement published by representative Centrists, that considerable amendment ought to be made in the provisions of the new constitution, but, whatever change is to be effected, the best interests of Alsace-Lorraine, surely, will not be conserved by men like the Conservatives, whose sympathies lie in the direction of Prussian dominance, nor by those whose instincts are hostile to every movement that is not distinctly pro-German.

Press dispatches received June 21 make known that Pope Pius X has addressed a letter to the Apostolic Delegate at Washington, Mgr. Falconio, praising the efforts now being made so generously by Americans to further the cause of universal peace. His Holiness expresses his gratification at the noble initiative thus taken; he wishes every success to the great movement and gives voice to the hope that the Palace of Peace at the Hague will yet realize the fondest ambition of its founder. Even though the desired end be not attained completely, he writes, the action taken and the work done will not go without its reward. A noble effort, says the Pontiff, is always deserving of praise, and some measure of success and progress must inevitably result.

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE

THE RECLUSE.

As I was rounding the corner of Henry's store, he came out, bearing a brand new saw and saw-buck. After some bucolic comment suitable to the occasion, we fell into step. As is his custom, he proceeded directly to business.

"While reading my old friend, Balzac, last evening I saw a reference to a book entitled, 'The Imitation of Christ.' Have you such a book in your library? I am very anxious to read it." I assured him that I had several copies, and we turned to other matters.

When we had arrived at my house the Recluse deposited his saw and saw-buck carefully in my front hall, much as a dinner guest lays off his overcoat and hat, and we entered the library. He has a nose for books and goes straight for his quarry on the shelves. He placed his finger on a volume. "That is the best — did. I don't care for his later stuff; it's artificial. Nice chap, though. We were chums at —." The name of a famous woman writer caught his eye. "A remarkable woman. You read her book on —? She was one of my best friends years ago; not only a writer of talent, but a charming hostess." So he went on, patting the books as if their backs were the shoulders of old friends. Finally, I found the book I wanted and gave it to him.

"You are quite sure this will not incommode you?" "Quite," I replied. "Keep it as long as you wish." "Oh, no! I shall return it to-morrow." He took up his saw and saw-buck and bade me a cheery "Good evening."

The next day I met him at the car station. He came up immediately and began to talk. I have often read in stories of men who had a "crooked smile," a noiseless and inimitable manner of expressing pleasure and comradeship. The Recluse has such a smile, giving the beholder the impression of looking into deep wells of laughter. It is a delight to listen to him, no matter how odd are his remarks, for his voice holds a velvety softness and an intonation that is most winning.

"I shall have to ask you to let me take that book a few days longer. I read it for two hours last night. One might as well try to read the Bible through at one sitting. It is a deep book. Not that I agree with all the author says; in fact, I dissent from him in many points, but he does understand the human heart." He leaped on a car and was gone.

That is a cross-section of the Recluse, a lovable combination of flawless urbanity and vigorous combativeness. He argues with everybody, and some say that he takes a side in argument from pure contrariness. But I have remarked that his arguments are always solid and cogent. He sees both sides of a question instantly, and if one is urged unduly his spirit of fairness urges him to put forth what may be said for the other.

The Artist and he are good friends, but the Recluse irritates the Artist by criticism of his paintings. The latter said not long ago: "He came into my studio a few mornings since and found fault with every brush stroke I took. Finally, I told him: I have devoted a good many years to this painting business. I know what I am doing. You are an amateur. If you care to keep the high regard I have always had for you, you will allow me to work in peace. But that did not change him one iota."

I sounded the Recluse on the Artist. He seemed to take the case out of an invisible docket and was ready immediately: "— is a man of much ability; has an instinct for color, but he crowds his canvases. Then, again, he doesn't draw a design, but starts in with the brush, painting figures in and out until he hits on the right effect. That is the advantage of painting in oil. You can cover up your mistakes in line with color. Now, in 'black and white' it is different. The truth or falsity of the drawing stands out. When I look at an oil painting and see the fallacy of the treatment it irritates me. —thinks me an impertinent duffer, no doubt, but I think my theory of design is right, just the same."

The Golfer and I met the Recluse in the Square, and a discussion on the ancient and honorable game ensued. We tried to get him up to the links. "I don't like that plaguey old course," said he. "It's laid out badly. It has short holes where there should be long ones, and is absurdly easy. Play ought to begin at the ninth hole and go backward. Now, take the links across the river; every hole is a problem. It gives a man real golf, but that links of yours is a miserable croquet ground."

When he had gone on his way the Golfer said: "I think that chap is bluffing. He cannot begin to play the golf he claims. I would like to get him up there some day and put him to the test."

"Don't be too sure," said I. "The Recluse has a disconcerting way of backing up what he says. Now, as a matter of psychology, I wager that he plays an excellent game. If he doesn't, my measure of him is all wrong."

He came up one morning. He had not handled a club for two years, and the set offered to him was all that it should not have been. "I shall not play with you; I'll just go round." We would not hear it, so at last he consented.

The Recluse teed up his ball and took his position. Something indefinable showed him to be an expert. In a moment, with a long, steady swing, he drove the ball over the bunker to a spot two yards from the hole. As the game proceeded fortune varied, but the Recluse played a great game for a man long out of practice. He went down the river in his boat, and I turned to the Golfer. "Well?" "All I have to say is, that it will be a long while before I question again anything he says he can do. That man is a wonder."

Of course, a man who will let no fallacy go unpricked, who is so intensely individual in all he says and does, would never be content to live in a house built according to a design other than his own. He made up his mind to have a place of his own. With unerring insight he selected a spot on the beach near the mouth of the river, with a superb view of sea and woodland, and there built his bungalow. He has but to open his windows to have a sleeping porch. He can lift one side, where there is a small platform, and he has an opera box all his own, with a stage of Nature's setting. He prepares his own meals and does his own housekeeping. I think that even the Captain would admit that everything is spick and span. The interior reveals his taste in every picture and book. In solitary rambles he has worked out many mechanical contrivances surprising in their effectiveness and economy of room. There he lives, reads and writes in contentment. I asked him why he did not build a veranda around the bungalow. "You see, I don't own the land, couldn't buy it. I may have to move any day. If I put on ells and verandas, etc., it would make it difficult to move, but as it is all I have to do is to put a shawl strap around the whole thing and walk off with it."

It is quite a small adventure of a sunny afternoon to wend my way seaward toward the ferry slip, extract from its hiding place the horn of salute and give the signal. As the sound breaks the silence I see a head put forth from one of the windows and a welcoming hand held high in greeting. In a moment he is untying the boat. I always feel on such occasions like a traveler halting before the moat of a castle. The oars have hardly been dipped in the return journey before he launches forth on a stream of reminiscence or a spirited description of some book. He has read and traveled widely, and it is almost impossible to bring up the name of a notable person without drawing from him some sprightly story that is new. Once we are ensconced in the bungalow and, his cornucopia alight, an Ambrosian afternoon is in full swing.

On one of these occasions he asked in his quick way: "Have you ever made a collection of little-known books by well-known authors? It's worth while, I assure you." Then he rattled off a list that only a stenographer could have taken down, finally rounding up with another query: "I suppose you have read 'The Londoners,' by Robert Hichens?" I confessed my ignorance.

"A very brilliant and humorous story. He is one of the few Englishmen who can write true humor. You will find the book in the village library, on the left-hand side as you enter, top shelf, somewhere near the middle of the case. To think that a man who can write like that, who can do so much to give pleasure and teach by gentle satire, would stoop to that sacrilegious drool called 'The Garden of Allah'! It's a shame. They made a lot of talk about that book. There are just two things in it—descriptions of the desert, that hundreds of men can do better than Hichens, and a perfectly sickening story of sin, that the world would be much better without. It is revolting to see a man prostitute his talent in that fashion."

I visited the library, found the book in the exact spot indicated, took it home, and laughed that evening until the tears ran down my cheeks. Again the Recluse had vindicated himself as a man of keen and original perception. He cared not a whit what the world said about "The Garden of Allah." He did not like it, and did like the author's earlier and less successful book, and proved that his taste was keen and true.

"There are just three books worth while to me: Thoreau's 'Walden Pond,' Gilbert White's 'Selborne' and Walton's 'Angler.' I read them over and over, and always find something new. Living here alone, I get the right measure of things. What is the use racing about the country and carting in a lot of printed trash? The book of Nature is the great book, and is never tiresome. They talk about natural history not being interesting. A really wise man could write enthralling volumes on the turning of a worm."

The Recluse, alas! is an agnostic. The Christian religion is to him a myth and the Bible a collection of folk lore. He finds Christianity unreasonable, and in the honesty of his unbelief protests against it. In one breath he will ask: "Is it possible that you believe these things?" And in the next he will say: "I would give all I ever had, or expect to have, in this world if I could believe as you do, as many about me do. Faith gives a man such confidence and strength; it's a rock under him. I wish I had it, but it's no use, I do not believe all those beautiful things about Christ and the saints. I must be honest about it, at all odds."

There is an element of pathos in the incompleteness of such a life, all the more because the man's character is so sincere and truthful to itself. He has a passion for doing things rightly, and cannot suffer half measures, yet in the great matter of religion he is spiritually sightless. The tender devotion of the "Imitation" leaves him cold. The divine words of Our Saviour in the Gospels awaken in his soul no answering echo. His religious perceptions are paralyzed. Many others of my acquaintance are in this sorry state, but few are so conscientious in their devotion to duty for its own sake, in the practice of kindness with no prospect of reward, of such unflinching honesty of soul.

The ways of the Lord are "unsearchable." "The Spirit breatheth where He will." I hope that one day those eyes may be opened and the numb spiritual faculties take on new strength through God's grace. Of one thing I am sure: that the Recluse will follow the light as he sees it, and, in any event, if he were to be called out of this world and friends asked me what should be carved on the stone after his name, I would bid them cut just one word, "Gentleman."

C. W. COLLINS.

LITERATURE

Little Cities of Italy. By ANDRÉ MAUREL. Translated by HELEN GERARD. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The original of this book was crowned by the French Academy and was awarded the Marcelin Guérin prize. It may be an excellent piece of literature from a French point of view; but we cannot think that an English reader will see anything remarkable in it. It is so peculiarly French as to be tiresome. The author keeps himself keyed up to an apostrophic ecstasy from the first page to the last. The wind, blowing where it listeth, is a miracle of methodical routine compared to Monsieur Maurel. With artistic fervor, with disconcerting unexpectedness, with delirious activity, he hops hither and yon, up and down, backward and forward, cheeping brief bars of gush and cocking his head in the most cunning little way. His stories, similes and illustrations are nearly always peculiarly Gallic in the worst sense, and lead one to suppose that, when he is not touring Italy, his favorite abode is some low café chantant in the confines of Montmartre.

There is an effort at the end of the book to weave these disconnected ramblings into the appearance of a general plan with a single purpose in view. And here we have to admire the Latin ability to schematize and classify. Monsieur makes one graceful wave with his wand so beautiful, and presto! instead of the highly colored dissolving views of medieval Italy, which we thought we were being amused with, we discover that we have been more serious than we had believed and were in reality making a profound study of the modern risorgimento. It is of a marvelousness.

Probably the most important sentences in this book occur in the preface, furnished by Guglielmo Ferrero. The popular Italian historian says of his native land: "It is certain that Italy, by its geographical configuration, by its ethnological composition, and by its history, is less adapted than any other country of Europe to be a centralized and united form of government. Its elongated form, the chain of the Appenines that cuts it into two parts, do not lend themselves to the requirements of a great modern State, whose nerves are its railways. . . . Moreover, Italy's entire history shows that it never has been possible to make Northern Italy and Southern Italy march side by side on the road to progress. When the one prospers the other decays. They are the two scales of a balance; one rises and the other falls." It is a pleasant surprise to find an historian so singularly free from bias in favor of ecclesiastical Rome pretending to find some other cause for Italian political difficulties than the Catholic Church.

J. J. D.

The Legacy. A Story of a Woman. By MARY S. WATTS. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.50.

This is a well-told story. Whether because of its adherence to the Thackeray manner or in spite of it, we cannot determine; but it carries the reader along pleasantly through a succession of interesting and ingenious pictures of contemporary American life. The author has borrowed certain little tricks from the great

Victorian novelist of English society. We have the same laboriously compiled genealogies, made readable by humorous comment and by their intimate bearing upon the action of the main characters in the story; once more we are made to feel our own potential badness by ironical addresses to our superior virtue, asking it quizzically to go ahead and condemn outright the human failings which the story-teller chronicles. Instead of a hero, like Clive Newcome or Pendennis, we have a heroine, who is astonishingly commonplace in her life and adventures, when we consider how interesting the novelist has made her.

And yet one may question the commonplace character of the woman whose story is told here. She is represented as being naturally proof to any inroads of emotion. Her feelings are supposed hardly ever to be touched, and the ordinary social ambitions are a matter of indifference to her. This would be intelligible if she were not at the same time represented as being passionate and high-strung and indomitable in meeting difficulties. The admixture of oil and water does not make a satisfactory composition; a character that has to be studied in layers, courses and strata shows too many signs of tinkering to be convincing as a human figure.

The story is a clean story, as stories go nowadays, and the author deserves commendation for what have come to be rare things with female writers of fiction: reticence, namely, and decency. If we miss the religious quality in her story it is only to draw attention to the artistic deficiency arising from its absence. The author wished to describe the dramatic struggle between goodness and vice and the ultimate triumph of virtue. A naturally passionate character, common sense tells us, will not triumph over strong temptation by the aid of purely natural conditions and native force,—all these are supposed to be fully enlisted on the opposite side. But the character, to be interesting, must be passionate. How can it be made to rise victorious over evil? The supernatural life is the only protagonist of the natural. Introduce that and we have the proper mise en scène for the combat. Omit it, and we have what the sporting editor calls a "frame-up," an artificially prearranged process of events in which everything is make-believe and the issue predetermined, irrespective of the prowess of the principals. This accounts for the unnatural contradictions in the heroine of this book. The author has to be at her side in every chapter with a new mask for her as each new situation is evolved; so that at the end we are left wondering whether we have been watching a dozen heroines or only one. An accident finally saves her; and here the author is logical. Nothing else could save her. But even this introduces a hint of melodrama and weakens the story.

J. J. D.

A Conversion and a Vocation. Sister Mary of the Sacred Heart, Sophia Ryder. First Novice of the Order of the Good Shepherd in England. Second Edition. London: Burns and Oates.

We are glad to see this very edifying biography in a second edition. Sophia Ryder was the daughter of an Anglican bishop, a sister-in-law of Sir George Grey, three times Home Secretary, and a friend of Newman. Her brother, George Ryder, by his conversion and that of his family to the Catholic Church, helped considerably in the coming of the "new spring" in England. Mrs. George Ryder (Sophia Lucy Sargent) was one of the three sisters to whom reference is so often made in books about the Oxford Movement. This pious biography belongs to the class of books which may be said to give us a glance at the interior life of that movement.

Sister Mary of the Sacred Heart was converted when a young girl, and shortly afterward entered the Order of the Good Shepherd, in which she was distinguished by her religious fervor and active zeal for fifty-two years. The record of her long life is not so much a catalogue of achievements striking to the eye as of holy, humble and difficult service in behalf of unfortunate women.

The book is enriched by a letter of Cardinal Newman, in which he states the case for those who seem to die at odds with Catholic belief and practice. After declaring that the Catholic Church is the sole Communion in which there is salvation, he points out that the Church herself lays down invincible ignorance as an excusing exception to the indiscriminate application of this law. He then notes that no one can decide who is in invincible ignorance and who is not, and adds: "Habit, formation of mind, prejudice, reliance and faith in others may be as real walls of separation as mountains. Members of one and the same household may be more distant from each other in the intercommunion of mutual apprehension of ideas than they would be made by the interposition of an ocean." J. J. D.

Metcalf and Rafter's Language Series. New York State Edition. New York: American Book Company.

In nothing is the difference between old and new methods of education so marked as in the making of text-books for the teaching of English in the elementary schools. Twenty or more years ago the elements of grammar made up the sole text-book that did service in the teaching of English in grammar schools. To-day the class book in English is a combination text-book of grammar, memory, reading, lessons in observation and oral expression. In the old text-books the simple rules of grammar were set forth in strict order and in all their severity; in the text-books of to-day (especially for the lower grades) grammar rules are given without apparent order, and are rendered attractive by being surrounded with pictures, reading lessons, observation exercises on birds, flowers, etc.

"Metcalf and Rafter's Language Series," I, II, is an up-to-date English text-book, designed to meet the requirements of the New York State English syllabus for elementary schools. In Book I the dialogues between pupil and teacher are developed unnecessarily—most of them could have been left to the resourcefulness of the teacher. Book II is made up of Language and Literature Studies (Part I) and English Grammar proper (Part II). The complete separation of these two treatises in a text-book is to be commended. The treatise on English Grammar is very well done, the rules are clear and concise, the exercises useful, and each page is so spaced and printed that it is easy to take in at a glance the subject matter of a chapter.

In view of all the criticism that is being directed against modern methods of teaching English, the compilers of the book under review are rather sanguine when they assert in their preface (p. vii) that by the use of their book the pupil "will be prepared to analyze a subject logically, and by means of sound reasoning to draw fitting conclusions from known facts. He will be equipped also to express his thoughts correctly, and with an assurance which comes from a knowledge of the laws that govern correct speech." P. O'G.

Más Alegría. Por el Dr. PAUL W. VON KEPPLER, Obispo de Rottenburgo. Traducción del Alemán por FELIPE VILLAVARDE. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, 80 cents net.

Beginning with the right we have to joy, the learned prelate leads us through twenty-four chapters, in which he tells us of true joy and false,—the joy that really causes us to rejoice, and the spurious joy which excites us and unstrings the nerves, but brings no gladness to the heart. True joy, he tells us, is for all, both old and young, rich and poor; all ought to be able to rejoice. "Poor children of the poor! Their mothers have no time to make their children rejoice; for joy must come to the child from the mother. Poor children of the rich! Their mothers' social duties leave them no time to make their children rejoice." But what shall we do to increase the "visible supply" of joy? He answers, "Rejoice!" Spiritual sunshine beams on every page. The book is strongly recommended to those good souls who identify religion with hepatic torpidity, and are satisfied only when they have made others miserable by shutting the light of joy out of life. The German edition has reached its fiftieth thousand. Let us rejoice! * * *

The Purple East. By Rev. J. J. MALONE, P.P. Melbourne: W. P. Linehan.

Books of travels are wearisome things in these days when trips around the world are exploits preformed by any one who is burdened with money and time. But "The Purple East" is the journey of a gentleman and a scholar and a priest, who sets out, not from our part of the world but from Australia, to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. You see many a thing through his eyes that would never have attracted your attention; while the steamer is ploughing the waves you are discussing literature, and, as the Archbishop of Melbourne, who writes the Preface, tells you, "the most casual reader of Father Malone's volume cannot fail to observe how the supernatural manifests itself on every page, from the moment the boat has anchored at Jaffa till a month later, on the same water, he is lost in admiration at the simple faith of the Russian peasant prostrating himself on the deck in reverence to 'the land his Saviour trod.'" * * *

Un Newman Russe, Vladimir Soloviev. Par MICHEL D'HERBIGNY. Paris: Beauchesne.

The portrait of the remarkably handsome man which forms the frontispiece of this volume would almost compel one to read what the author has to say of this Russian Newman. He looks like a prophet of the Old Testament, or perhaps a softened copy of Michael Angelo's Moses. Soloviev was not a clergyman, like Newman, but he followed the Kindly Light till he came to the Church, and his conversion, like that of Newman, produced a startling sensation among those he left. He was a philologist, a poet, a man of vast learning, a philosopher, a theologian and a saint. The book that tells us all this is not, properly speaking, a biography, but a psychological study of the man and a compte rendu of the various doctrines which he evolved and expounded until he reached the Catholic Church. Possibly his conversion may do for Russia what Newman's did for England. One of his works, the "Justification du Bien," is a refutation of Tolstoism, though Tolstoi himself is not even named. The style of the writer is so serene, so limpid, so free from jealousy or bitterness, that Tolstoi advised his disciples to read it. Soloviev died only eleven years ago. Of course, he was in exile. * * *

Beginning, or Glimpses of Vanished Civilizations. By MARION McMORROUGH MULHALL. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

The writer protests that her purpose in this little book is to retell to youthful readers the story of the discoveries of learned men who have brought to light some of the vestiges of great empires that have vanished from the earth, and whose very names are forgotten. The older folk also will go over her pages with pleasure, as she tells us of Atlantis, of prehistoric Ireland, of Sumer and Akkad, where the cuneiform writing was probably invented, of the wonderful kingdoms of Central America, and other realms that once were. As Mrs. Mulhall is a member of the Roman Arcadia, author of the "Explorers in the New World, Before and After Columbus"; "The Story of the Jesuit Missions of Paraguay"; "Between the Amazon and the Andes"; "The Celtic Sources of the Divina Commedia," etc., we feel that we are being treated to very serious matter, and that her profession of writing only for "her young friends, boys and girls," is merely a modest way of presenting to the general public a very interesting book. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Great Texts of the Bible. Edited by the Rev. James Hastings, D.D. Acts and Romans, I-VIII, and Genesis to Numbers. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Two Volumes. Net $6.
 William Lloyd Garrison. By Lindsay Swift. Philadelphia: George W. Jacobs & Co. Net $1.25.
 William the Silent, Prince of Orange, 1533-1584, and the Revolt of the Netherlands. By Ruth Putnam. New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons. Net $1.35.

Lands of the Southern Cross. A Visit to South America by the Rev. Charles Warren Currier, Ph.D., Delegate of the United States to the International Congress of Americanists at Buenos Aires. Washington: Spanish-American Publication Society.

Chapters in Christian Doctrine. Reason the Witness of Faith. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 75 cents.

Come, Let Us Adore! A Eucharistic Manual. Compiled by the Rev. Bonaventure Hammer, O.F.M. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 75 cents.

Latin Publication:

De Superiore Communitatum Religiosarum. Manuale Asceticum, Canonicum, ac Regiminis. Juxta SS.R.R. Congr. Novissimas Leges Digestum. Auctore A. M. Micheletti. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

German Publication:

St. Michael. Roman. Von Felix Nabor. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 75 cents.

French Publication:

Bellarmin. Avant son Cardinalat 1542-1598. Correspondence et Documents. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne & Cie., 115 rue de Rennes. Net 12 francs.

EDUCATION

Editorial mention was made in a recent issue of AMERICA of the venerable University of Santo Tomás, in Manila. As it was founded in 1611, it antedates by twenty-five years Harvard University, which is commonly called our oldest university. There is an interesting sketch in Father Campbell's "Pioneer Priests of North America" (Vol. III) of another American school, whose opening preceded that of Harvard by one year. This was the Jesuit College founded by Father Le Jeune as soon as he reached Quebec, Canada. Its first home was a small wooden structure, erected in 1635, near Fort St. Louis, on a piece of land twelve acres in extent, which was granted in perpetuity for that purpose by the Company of the One Hundred Associates. Champlain, who died on Christmas Day, 1635, saw the first college opened. Fire destroyed the first building. Another was erected in 1648, which had the distinction of being, at that time, the only stone building in Quebec besides the fort. This was in turn replaced, somewhere between 1725 and 1730, by a beautiful edifice, which served its purpose as a college until the Society of Jesus was suppressed in 1773. Unfortunately the destruction of the Society was the end of the college as well,—for years thereafter the building, used as a barracks, was known as the Caserne des Jésuites.

* * *

The college, Father Campbell writes, was established through the generosity of Marquis de Gamache, whose eldest son, René Rohault, had entered the Society of Jesus and had been assigned to the Canadian missions. On bidding farewell to his father, in 1626, he asked that his patrimony should be devoted to the founding of a college at Quebec. His only stipulation was that the college should be established for the spiritual aid and education of Canadians. The school was successful from the start; in 1637 Le Jeune was able to write to the Father General: "The college, which began with one class and a few pupils, is growing every day on account of the arrival of new colonists from France." We are apt to imagine that the trend of sentiment towards practical courses of study in opposition to the liberal branches is a growth of our own times. Yet the history of the Quebec school tells us that the study of Latin was for a time in disfavor; the popular drift was in the direction of the positive sciences—physics, astronomy, geography and navigation—and some concessions had to be made to the common demand. In 1671 the faculty introduced a course of higher mathematics and hydrography. This branch was strongly encouraged by the officials of the colony, who saw in it a means of preparing a large contingent of navigators and handicraftsmen who would be extremely useful to the colonial government.

* * *

One may well doubt whether Harvard's record for general culture was as creditable in those early days as that of the Quebec college. The sketch in the "Pioneer Priests of North America" quotes a letter written as early as 1661, by the Bishop, Mgr. Laval. He affirms that the education given in the school was on the same footing as in Europe. Music was taught and public literary exhibitions were given. In 1658 the new Governor d'Argenson presided at a dramatic representation written for the occasion. Fifty years later Father Germain could report to his Superiors in France that everything went on in Quebec as in the colleges of Europe, and, perhaps, with more regularity and exactness. The students were industrious, eager and capable. In 1712 there was in the college a two years' course of philosophy, and another two of theology.

* * *

Father Campbell gives us, in this same volume, a bit of Harvard reminiscence which has its own piquancy in view of present-day conditions. He is telling the story of the life of Father Druillettes and describes a visit paid by this Father to Boston. Druillettes, as it appears, had been appointed by the Quebec Government to go down to New England on a very important political mission. He spent some time in Boston (1650-51), and as he naturally and by training was interested in educational projects, it is more than likely that while he was in that town he took a glance at Harvard. "Had he been present at one of the academic exhibitions," writes Father Campbell, "he would have been surprised and delighted if he found that the collegiate exercises corresponded with the theses defended by the graduates of 1642. These theses are given by Hutchison (History of Massachusetts Bay, Vol. I, p. 510). They are in Latin, and the subjects discussed reveal the fact that the much-derided scholasticism of the Middle Ages was in high honor in Harvard in its early days. Thus, among other pronouncements, we have: 'Materia secunda non potest existere sine forma; Unius rei non est nisi unica forma constitutiva; Quidquid movetur, ab alio movetur'; etc., etc."

During the Ontario (Canada) State Council meeting of the Knights of Columbus, last year, a most commendable resolution was unanimously adopted. The resolution, after a preamble setting forth that the time had arrived for the Knights to take action actively to promote some worthy objects which should have the approval of the hierarchy of the province, decrees: "that the State Deputy be authorized to appoint a committee to make full inquiry into and to give careful consideration to any such projects that might be suggested, the conclusions of the committee to be then reported to each subordinate council in the province, in order that definite action be taken at the next State Council meeting." The first result of this resolution is one which will have important bearing on Catholic Education in Ontario. The Knights propose to raise the sum of forty thousand dollars for an entirely new series of text-books for the Catholic schools of the province.

The St. Xavier's Calendar, a useful little monthly publication printed for the parishioners of St. Xavier's Church, Cincinnati, in its June issue quotes the following excellent comment on a fallacy too often urged by Americans, who fancy that the existing laws determining the distribution of educational funds in this country are not subject to amendment:

"In a letter to the New York Sun, on the use of public money for denominational purposes, a correspondent had this to say: 'Such schools (religious schools so called) must be supported by private subscriptions. Laws against the public moneys being used for denominational purposes have long obtained in the various States. These laws are irrevocable.' 'What is the authority for this statement?' asks another correspondent. 'Has not each State in the Union the right to deal with education as it thinks proper? And if the Constitution of any individual State forbids the use of public money for denominational purposes, cannot the Constitution be amended?' Let me remark incidentally that the phrase 'denominational purposes,' as used in the above context, is a mere begging of the question in so far as it has to do with the demand of certain Catholics for State aid to parochial schools. Such Catholics maintain that public money should be paid to these schools, not for denominational, but for educational purposes. If a parochial school imparts to its pupils as good a secular education as does the public school, the State could not justly be charged with religious partiality if it paid for such education."

M. J. O'C.

Manhattan College, New York, this year conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. on the Hon. Aram J. Pothier, Governor of Rhode Island. In his address at the commencement, the Governor paid tribute to the Christian Brothers, at whose schools he had received his early education.

MUSIC

The Catholic University of America has recently inaugurated a movement which should give new life and vigor to all lovers of liturgical music. Many efforts have been made toward reform since the appearance of the Holy Father's Encyclical on Sacred Music, but none which seems to promise such lasting results as the present one. About a year ago the services were secured of an able and experienced Director of Music, Rev. A. Gabert, who will devote himself to the teaching of liturgical music to the seminarians and students affiliated with the university. Father Gabert gives an interesting account of his first year's efforts in the last number of the new Revue Gregorienne. He tells of how he formed a choir of students and seminarians, of their progress, their interest in the work, and their successful rendering of several High Masses, notably one of his own composition written especially for the Feast of the Immaculate Conception. He concludes his letter with the encouraging phrase: "The 'belle Schola' is not only formed but is doing excellent work, and gives ground for hope of great things in the future."

The University is to be congratulated, for not only is it establishing a Schola Cantorum according to the desire of the Holy Father, but is establishing that Schola at precisely the place where its influence will be most direct and its efforts most effective in forming the elite of our clergy in the theory and practise of music as set forth in the Motu Proprio. As far as we know, there are but two other Universities that have taken action along these lines, that of Friburg and that of Strassburg, at each of which a Chair of Sacred Music has been established.

The whole trend in modern times toward reviving the study of music and treating it as a potent factor in both primary and higher education is but another and striking instance of the wisdom of the educational ideals of the Middle Ages. Music was then one of the four great requisites for a university degree, and was, moreover, taught systematically to the children in the monastic schools. Music lovers will therefore be glad to hear that the University at Washington is not confining its efforts to the training of its students, but is seeking to provide as well for the musical education of our school children. Doctors Shields and Pace of the University Faculty have in view the preparation of a series of text books on music for use in the parochial schools. The children are to be given a thorough grounding in sight reading and singing so as to be prepared at an early age to read at sight and sing correctly all music of ordinary difficulty. This is beginning at the right point. Each day it is becoming more apparent that the Second Council of Baltimore showed both wisdom and foresight in recommending, as early as 1866, that Gregorian Chant be taught in the parochial schools. To focus our efforts at reform upon individual choirs is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The scope of the movement is larger. By turning our attention to the schools and dealing adequately with the children we can not only turn out an immense quantity of material available for choirs, but in time produce that spontaneous congregational singing which the Holy Father so strongly advocates.

It is encouraging to see so high an authority as the University lending its support and prestige to this cause.

J. W.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The anniversary of the National holiday makes it of interest to recall the circumstance of the first formal Catholic celebration of the Fourth of July. On July 2, 1779, M. Gerard, the Minister Plenipotentiary of France to the United States, sent out an invitation to the President, the members of the Continental Congress, and the leading citizens of Philadelphia, in which city the seat of government was then located, "to attend the Te Deum which will be chanted on the 4th of this month, at noon, in the new Catholic chapel [St. Mary's], to celebrate the anniversary of the Independence of the United States of America." These officials of the Government accepted the invitation and with a number of distinguished citizens were present and listened to the following sermon, delivered by the Recollect, Father Seraphim Bandol, who was the chaplain to the French Minister:

"Gentlemen:—We are assembled to celebrate the anniversary of that day which Providence had marked in His Eternal Decrees to become the epoch of liberty and independence to thirteen United States of America. That Being, whose Almighty hand holds all existence beneath its dominion, undoubtedly produces in the depths of His wisdom those great events which astonish the universe, and of which the most presumptuous, though instrumental in accomplishing them, dare not attribute to themselves the merit. But the finger of God is still more peculiarly evident in that happy, that glorious revolution, which calls forth this day's festivity. He hath struck the oppressors of a people free and peaceable with the spirit of delusion which renders the wicked artificers of their own proper misfortunes. Permit me, my dear brethren, citizens of the United States, to address you on this occasion. It is that God, that all-powerful God who hath directed your steps, when you knew not where to apply for counsel; who, when you were without arms, fought for you with the sword of Justice; who, when you were in adversity, poured into your hearts the spirit of courage, of wisdom and of fortitude, and who hath at length raised up for your support a youthful sovereign, whose virtues bless and adorn a sensible, a faithful and a generous nation. This nation has blended her interests with your interests, and her sentiments with yours. She participates in all your joys, and this day unites her voice to yours, at the foot of the altars of the Eternal God, to celebrate that glorious revolution, which has placed the sons of America among the free and independent nations of the earth.

"We have nothing now to apprehend but the anger of Heaven, or that the measure of our guilt should exceed His mercy. Let us, then, prostrate ourselves at the feet of the immortal God who holds the fate of empires in His hands and raises them up at His pleasure, or breaks them down to dust. Let us conjure him to enlighten our enemies, and to dispose their hearts to enjoy that tranquillity and happiness which the revolution we now celebrate has established for a great part of the human race. Let us implore him to conduct us by that way which His Providence has marked out for a union with so desirable an end. Let us offer unto Him hearts imbued with sentiments of respect, consecrated by religion, by humanity, and by patriotism. Never is the august ministry of His altars more acceptable to His Divine Majesty than when it lays at His feet homages, offerings and vows so pure, so worthy the common parent of mankind. God will not reject our joy, for He is the author of it; nor will He reject our prayers, for they ask but the full accomplishment of the decrees He hath manifested. Filled with this spirit, let us, in concert with each other, raise our hearts to the Eternal. Let us implore His infinite mercy to be pleased to inspire the rulers of both nations with the wisdom and force necessary to perfect what it hath begun. Let us, in a word, unite our voices to beseech Him to dispense His blessings upon the councils and the arms of the allies, and that we may soon enjoy the sweets of a peace which will cement the union, and establish the prosperity of the two empires. It is with this view that we shall cause that canticle to be performed which the custom of the Catholic Church hath consecrated to be at once a testimonial of public joy, a thanksgiving for benefits received from Heaven, and a prayer for the continuance of its mercies."

SOCIOLOGY

The shark is a fish always hungry. The great white shark will take down a man, clothed, booted and armed, and be ready for another. Nevertheless, accidents excepted, one needs but ordinary prudence to avoid such a fate, for in its eagerness to catch whatever falls into the sea, the shark swims near the surface, with its great triangular fin sticking out to betray it.

"There be land rats and water rats," said Shylock; and there are land sharks as well as sea sharks. Some promote companies to acquire mines or oil fields which would make every stockholder a millionaire, did they only exist. Others sell furniture on the installment plan at a price that would be unprofitable but for the bill of sale, which enables them to sell the same furniture two or three times over. A good German told how, when he was a boy, every family in his village owned its cottage with its little plot of land, and lived happily in its simple life, for the father, like Longfellow's blacksmith, could look

"The whole world in the face,

For he owed not any man."

One day a poor peddler appeared, so poor that the good people, needing not his wares, bought them out of pity. They did so, the more readily as the grateful peddler insisted on leaving much of the payment to be settled when he should come round again. He returned after a month or two, gathered in what money was attainable, and sold his benefactors more goods on credit. After a few years a fine house overlooked the village. It was the peddler's, who owned every cottage in the place, and every cottager too. He was a land shark. He was not a Teuton.

Another species of this animal is the loan shark. He will lend you any sum, from $5 to $5,000, on your personal note, provided you are a permanency by reason of a profession or a salaried position. His interest is high, but you must consider the risk he runs in lending without security, through mere benevolence. You need $100 for four months. Sign a bill for $120 and it is yours. Four months are up, and you can pay only $50. Don't apologize. Just sign a bill for $84 and it is all right. By the end of the year, if you are lucky, you may have repaid the $100, but you will still have a bill outstanding for some $50 or so, sheer usury, which will become $80 before you are done with it. But you are fortunate if you escape so easily. Should you be able to pay only $20 every four months, the loan shark would be better pleased, as you might go on paying this sum forever, renewing each time the bill for $120.

Like his cousin of the sea, the land shark has his triangular fin. No man does business out of pure benevolence, the land shark least of all. He deals with me to make money out of me, not to let me make money out of him. When you get a circular offering to "let you in on the ground floor" of a mining speculation throw it into the waste paper basket, or you will be "let in" very unpleasantly indeed. When one urges you to buy on an extraordinarily generous installment plan, remember your Longfellow again, and "Trust him not, he's fooling thee."

As for the offer to lend any sum on your personal note, it is a portentous triangular fin, and underneath it is a man-eater of the largest size.

In the West Indies one may see expert natives managing sharks very easily. The monster has a snout protruding so far beyond its mouth that it must turn over to seize its prey, and in doing so it loses control of its movements and exposes its vulnerable belly. The native goes into the water with his knife, avoids cleverly the shark's rush, and before it can turn back to its swimming position, buries his knife in its heart. It is comforting to know that the loan shark cannot attack his victim without exposing himself similarly. It is still more comforting to know that steps are being taken to make things still harder for the shark. If you are in danger, go to an honest lawyer, make a clean breast of everything, and he will show you how to plant your knife as neatly as ever did a West Indian swimmer or a Spanish matador. When the loan shark says he lends without security, he lies. His security is your fear of exposure. Be fearless, and his security will vanish.

H. W.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The thirteenth Catholic Congress of Limburg (Holland) was held at Sittard, on Pentecost Monday, June 5, with an unusually large and enthusiastic attendance of delegates. In eleven sectional meetings the general theme of the need of active cooperation of the laity in the activities of the Church in the religious, social and political life of the Catholic people was discussed by the representatives of the various organizations present. Arrangements were made to found a People's Building in every district, in which the Catholic organizations may be centred and their purposes ordered and directed by a common administrative board. At the close of these sectional meetings, the delegates formed in procession, and, with banners flying, marched to the City Hall, where the Mayor welcomed them to the city. At the close of the day an enthusiastic general and public meeting was held in St. Peter's, under the presidency of the Bishop of Roermond. Carel Bayaert was the principal speaker, his theme being the Kingdom of Christ among men, and the duty of Catholics to solve the social problems of today by a close following of the principles of Christ, our Leader. The Bishop developed this same thought in his closing address, and exhorted all present to fidelity and loyalty to Christian principles in their political and social relations. In the course of his remarks the Bishop used as an illustration the career of Limburg's distinguished Catholic citizen, Dr. Regont. As Minister of Justice in Holland's present Cabinet, Dr. Regont has given splendid evidence of the good influence Christian principle exerts upon a leader in political life strong enough to heed its inspiration. The speaker referred in warmest praise to the Minister's recent success in inducing the Dutch Parliament to accept a law to check public immorality and vice.

The Rev. J. P. M. Schleuter, S.J., of Holy Trinity Church, Boston, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance into the Society of Jesus. "One of the striking characteristics of Father Schleuter's life-long labors," says the Sacred Heart Review, "has been his interest in Catholic literature. A firm believer in the power of the press, he has been unceasing in his use of it." As early as 1873 Father Schleuter published a helpful little pamphlet of 31 pages entitled "An Hour with a Sincere Protestant." He also translated two excellent works of the Rev. W. Cramer: "The Christian Father" and "The Christian Mother", which attained a wide circulation. Father

Schleuter ministered for many years to the prisoners and the inmates of the New York City institutions on Blackwell's Island. We join in the hope expressed by the Rev. Editor of the Sacred Heart Review, that Father Schleuter may be spared for many years to continue his labor for souls.

The new Provincial of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate for the Province of Manitoba is the Very Rev. Charles Cahill, O.M.I.

SCIENCE

The first of the largest guns ever constructed in the United States has just been removed from the workshops of the Washington Navy Yard, preparatory to being mounted on one of the Dreadnoughts. It measures 53 feet 6 inches in length and weighs 65 tons. It has cost $74,700, and an additional $53,000 will be expended for the mounting. The shell discharged by the gun weighs 1,400 pounds. Including the shell and powder, it costs $700 for each discharge. The initial velocity of the shell leaving the gun is 2,600 feet per second. The shell is effective at a distance of 12 miles.

The observatory of Ebro, situated near Tortosa, Spain, and founded by the Jesuit Fathers for research work in magnetism, meteorology, seismology, and astro-physics, has just published the first number of its monthly bulletin. This volume is devoted mainly to a description of the several buildings, their locations, their equipment, and to the determination of the constants of the instruments. The text is in Spanish and French, placed in parallel columns.

Acting on the suggestion of the special committee of the International Congress of Radiology and Electricity, recently in session at Brussels, Mme. Curie agreed to prepare a standard for radium, which will consist of 20 milligrams of the earth sealed in a suitable receptacle. Difficulties in accurately weighing small quantities of radium necessitated this rather large quantity. The resolution was passed to preserve the standards, along with the other standards, at Paris. As soon as the primary standard has been prepared various national laboratories may obtain duplicates to be used for standardization either for laboratory or commercial purposes. As a tribute to the memory of the late Prof. Curie, it was suggested that the name Curie be assigned the quantity or mass of radium emanation in equilibrium with one gram of the element radium. Other topics discussed were the nomenclature of radioactive products and ionization, with a view to preventing unnecessary confusion, due to the development of a rapidly growing theme.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

Mr. Bruno Oscar Klein, well known to the musical fraternity, died in New York, on June 21. Born in Osnabruck, Germany, in 1858, he studied piano and composition under his father, who was an organist, and for more than two years he continued his studies at the Munich Conservatory. Mr. Klein was only twenty when he came to America and settled in New York. Since 1884 he had been director of music at the convent of the Sacred Heart, Manhattanville. For ten years he was organist at the Church of St. Francis Xavier, and later at the Church of St. Ignatius Loyola, New York. In 1894 he returned to Germany, to appear on the concert platform. His opera "Kenilworth" was produced in Hamburg in 1895.

Mother Scholastica Kerst, for the past twenty years Superior of the Benedictine Sisters of Duluth, died in that city, in the sixty-fourth year of her age and the forty-eighth of her religious life. When the diocese of Duluth was established, in 1892, Mother Scholastica was invited to begin a Benedictine foundation in the new diocese, and she held the position of Superior of the new community ever since. At present five large hospitals, the Sacred Heart Institute, and her latest achievement, Villa Sancta Scholastica, mother-house and academy, stand as the fruit of her many labors. The growth of the Benedictine community in Duluth has been steady since the beginning; to-day it numbers 175 members. The work of Mother Scholastica in Duluth and elsewhere attests her good judgment, great business capacity, and an energy that stopped at no obstacle in the way of a righteous cause.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CATALOGUES OF CATHOLIC BOOKS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with interest your article in to-day's AMERICA regarding the Catalogue of Catholic authors in the Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh, and I wish to thank you for calling my attention to the erroneous inclusion of the four names you mention therein. Due correction will be made when another edition appears. It is refreshing that your acute reviewer has been able to find but four errors in the 243 pages of the Catalogue.

I beg to take exception, however, to the pessimistic attitude of your editorial, wherein you say:

"It is regrettable that so much time and effort should be wasted on the compilation of these catalogues, whose value to Catholics may be seriously questioned."

I think this dash of cold water on the enterprise is altogether unmerited, and my reasons for so saying are the following:

(1) The writer has received several hundred letters from almost every part of the English speaking world, from India, Australia, England, Porto Rico and Canada, as well as from practically every important library centre in the United States regarding the Catalogue, thus manifesting that Catholics in those places feel that the Catalogue has some value.

(2) Since the appearance of the Carnegie Catalogue, many Bishops in the United States have either begun actually, or have taken preliminary steps to insure the publication of similar lists in their own episcopal cities.

(3) Since the publication of the Catalogue the circulation of Catholic books in the Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh has immensely increased.

(4) The first edition of the Catalogue, consisting of 2,000 copies, is so nearly exhausted that the Library authorities have asked the writer to again collaborate with them in the immediate issuance of a second and enlarged edition.

THOMAS F. COAKLEY.

Pittsburgh, Pa., June 17.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I regret that the editors of AMERICA have taken such a discouraging attitude regarding the Catalogue of Catholic books of the Carnegie Library of Pittsburgh and elsewhere. Do you not think you are laying yourself open to the charge, not only of being inconsistent, but of opposing a good work? The impression I derived, after reading the article, was, that while you are urging the generous stocking of public libraries with Catholic works, you are adverse to letting Catholics themselves know, by means of special lists, just what books are in the library.

Furthermore, I am surprised to have you criticise the Catalogue as you do, because it seems to oppose what must be considered by all thoughtful men a very good and necessary work. At least we have found it necessary in this city, which has been proven by the practical exhaustion of the first edition and the large increase in the number of Catholic patrons of the library.

The only meritorious point in your criticism is the one that calls attention to the few errors, for which, I feel sure, the compilers of the Catalogue will be very grateful. The Catholic taste for literature is not the robust thing, as you well know, and instead of discouragement, it should be encouraged from every quarter.

JOHN T. COMES.

Pittsburgh, Pa., June 19.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. V, No. 13

(Price 10 Cents)

JULY 8, 1911

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 117

CHRONICLE

Root Amendment Fails in Senate—Alaska Coal Claims Rejected—Steel Companies Indicted—New Naturalization Rules—Montauk Ship Terminal Site—Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Portugal—Italy—Belgium—France—Germany—Austria-Hungary—Spain289-292

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The "Encyclopædia Britannica"—Universal Peace—The Japanese Parliament—An English View of the "Ne Temere" Agitation—The Prescribed Course and Literary Development.....293-300

CORRESPONDENCE

Spain's Eucharistic Congress—The Pope Encourages Diocesan Missionary Bands in France—Portugal's Reign of Terror—Interrupting the Pageants of Joan of Arc.....300-303

EDITORIAL

Intercollegiate Socialist Society—Belgian Socialists—Education in Louisiana—To Censure Moving Picture Films.....304-306

IN MISSION FIELDS

Note from "An Old Almanack".....306-307

LITERATURE

Pioneer Priests of North America—The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution—William the Silent—Note—Books Received.....307-309

EDUCATION

Decree on First Holy Communion Not Detrimental to Attendance at Parochial Schools...309

ECONOMICS

Warnings Against the Reckless and Extravagant Consumption of Coal.....309-310

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Archbishop Quigley's Tribute to the Teachers in Catholic Schools.....310

SCIENCE

Chile Building Submarines—The Possibilities of an Iron Famine—Converted Steel a Rival to Malleable Iron—The Best Alloy for Permanent Magnets310-311

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Archbishop Keane's Titular See—The Centenary of St. Hyacinthe's College—Anti-Catholic Tactics of Hungarian Socialists—United Italy's Jubilee Festivities—Special Course in Sociological Work at Mayence Catholic Congress—Golden Jubilee at Loreto Academy—Rev. Dr. John E. Gunn, S.M., Bishop-elect of Natchez....311-312

PERSONAL

Bishop O'Doherty—Bishop Tihen—Rev. Dr. D. J. Hickey—Archbishop Moeller.....312

OBITUARY

Archbishop Denis O'Connor—Rev. Dr. J. R. Teefy—George W. Young.....312

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Work for the Federation.....312

CHRONICLE

Root Amendment Fails in Senate.—Without even the formality of a roll call, the Root amendment to the Canadian reciprocity agreement was defeated in the Senate by an overwhelming vote. The proportion of strength seemed to be about four to one. The principal reason for omitting the roll call at what appeared to be an important crisis in the progress of the bill through the Senate seems to be that the advocates of the amendment found their numbers so small that they were not anxious to reveal their weakness. The elimination of the Root amendment, relating to the paper and pulp clause, leaves the agreement in precisely the shape in which it was received from the House. The way is now open for the presentation of such changes as are proposed by Senators. These will take precedence in the order of their presentation. Nearly thirty are already on the Vice-President's table, awaiting consideration.

Alaska Coal Claims Rejected.—The Cunningham coal land claims, through which it was alleged the Morgan-Guggenheim Syndicate planned to extend its vast interests in Alaska, were disallowed by the Department of the Interior. Fred Dennett, Commissioner of the Land Office, rendered the decision, which was approved by Secretary Walter L. Fisher, Mr. Ballinger's successor. As the law provides that the finding of the Department of the Interior shall be final as to the facts, there is no opportunity for appeal to the Supreme Court. The Cunningham claims brought about the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation by Congress, the removal of Chief Forester Gifford Pinchot by President Taft, and the dismissal of Louis R. Glavis, a chief of field division in the Land Office. Pinchot and Glavis were removed for insubordination in attacking Richard A. Ballinger, Secretary of the Interior, whom they charged with being favorably disposed to the claims. On hearing the present decision, Mr. Ballinger expressed the firm belief that "there is no evidence that a court of justice would hold sufficient to warrant the denial of the patents. In other words, the decision of the Commissioner is political, and not judicial." Mr. Pinchot hails the decision as a personal vindication and as foreshadowing the cancellation of other fraudulent claims in Alaska.

Steel Companies Indicted.—Indictments against nine steel corporations, two of them direct subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corporation, were returned by the Federal grand jury. There were eighty-three men named in the indictments, officers of the alleged illegal pools and combinations and of the various steel wire producing companies that entered the agreements. The defendants were charged with entering into an unlawful combination and conspiracy in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law. On this point the indictment said: "That all the times mentioned in this indictment the aforesaid corporations produced at their various factories in the aggregate 95 per cent. of the entire amount of . . . steel wire product . . . consumed in the United States" and "that because said corporations have been and in fact now are separate and distinct from each other, their said interstate business, trade and commerce should have been and should now be conducted by each of them on a competitive basis, and would have been and would be so conducted but for the unlawful combination and conspiracy by and among the aforesaid individuals."

New Naturalization Rules.—The Department of Commerce and Labor promulgated new rules, based on the naturalization law of June 29, 1906. Hereafter applicants for citizenship will be required to produce certificates of landing in this country before final papers shall be issued to them. These certificates, which must be furnished only by aliens who arrived here since 1906, require them to give the date, place and manner of their arrival in the United States. With the declarations of intention of such petitioners must be attached their petitions for naturalization. The blank, which each applicant for naturalization must fill out, insists on his saying where his wife was born and when, how many children, and name, date of birth of each, and where they now live, the applicant's height at the time of arrival and color of the eyes at the same time. The whole process looks like a premium on bachelorhood.

Montauk Ship Terminal Site.—J. Bruce Ismay, President of the International Mercantile Company, which controls five big steamship lines, including the White Star, owner of the steamships Olympic and Titanic, has been inspecting the Montauk water front, with a view to building piers there to accommodate giant vessels of the Olympic class. Less than four months ago Mr. Ismay declared himself in favor of Montauk Point as a transatlantic steamship terminal. At that time announcement was made by the Long Island Railroad that land necessary for the improvement had been acquired. "Since the Government has given us permission to dock the big ships in the Chelsea district, we are not in a hurry to complete any plans for Montauk," said an official of the White Star line. "The visit of Mr. Ismay was natural, since the subject of docking ships at Montauk has been widely discussed of late. What plans, if any, were formed will be made public later."

Mexico.—The first attempt of the government to parcel out large estates among small holders is to be made in the territory of Lower California, the most barren, treeless and waterless part of the country.—A servile war threatens in Yucatan, where the peons have attacked several plantations and destroyed buildings and crops.—There are loud complaints in the public press against some officials of the Diaz régime who remain in office and also against some of the provisional appointments.—After a careful investigation, the Chinese chargé d'affaires fixes at three hundred and three the number of inoffensive Chinamen who were butchered by the Maderist troops at Torreón. A large money indemnity will be demanded.—For the first time in over thirty years a religious procession was held in Mexico. Fifteen thousand people in the city of Zapotlán, where seismic disturbances have recently done great damage, organized a procession in which the statues of the Saints were publicly borne, while the faithful sung hymns and recited prayers. The outward and public manifestation of religion is "unconstitutional" in Mexico, but the terror inspired by the frequent shocks of the earthquake silenced for the time all political scruples.—Several presidential "booms" have been launched and many manifestoes have been issued.—It has been remarked that General Diaz entered French jurisdiction on June 19, the anniversary of the shooting of Maximilian, whom the French had tried to set up as Emperor of Mexico. Diaz granted an interview, in which he expressed grave doubts about the ability of Madero to master the situation.

Canada.—Mr. Borden's tour in the West is a great success from one point of view. All those opposed to reciprocity give him an enthusiastic hearing; but the farmers whom he set out to convert are not converted. Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux stated at a Liberal meeting that he thought the idea of a general election would be abandoned. Mr. Borden had brought out so clearly the sense of the country that it would be unnecessary. This is, probably, only a bit of political persiflage.—There is a persistent rumor that Sir Wilfrid Laurier will introduce clôture into parliament. One would suppose that so practical a politician would think twice or three times before doing such a thing.—A part of the wharf at King Edward's Park, near Montreal, gave way under the weight of a crowd. None was killed, but some fifty were injured more or less seriously.—A few months ago extraordinary gold discoveries were reported from Steamboat Mountain, near Hope, B. C. It now seems probable that the quartz ledge was salted, as a few inches below the surface it is almost worthless. The "discoverers," on the other hand, who made some profit out of the "discovery," have disappeared.—The parish church of St. Jean Baptiste, one of the finest in Montreal, was set on fire by lightning and utterly destroyed.

Great Britain.—The seamen's strike, far from being dead, is gathering force. The dockers have joined them to fight for the recognition of the unions. This paralyzes the shipping trade, as it prevents the discharge of cargoes, and so owners are not able to send out ships manned with landmen, as they have been doing. The reports of arrangements with the companies circulated in the last week of June were exaggerated. Such arrangements were either for the moment, as is the case of the coronation review, or for a round voyage. Rioting has occurred in Liverpool, London and Hull.—The Lords are debating the Parliament Bill and making many amendments which the Government will reject. Of these the chief excludes from its provisions any measure affecting the prerogatives of the Crown, the succession to the throne, or Home Rule in any part of the United Kingdom, and provides for a referendum in questions on which the country has not expressed its mind.—The failure of the Birkbeck Bank was taken advantage of by the Unionists to attack Lloyd George. The bank failed on account of the depreciation of its securities, of consols especially, and this the Unionists attributed to the financial measures of the Government. Lloyd George pointed out that the fall in consols came from the Boer War. The Unionists replied that they had begun to recover before the present Government came in, and that since its advent British securities have been falling, while all others have risen. This made Lloyd George angry, but it did not prove the Unionists' case. There are a number of causes at work besides the Lloyd George finance to depreciate British stock.—The plague has appeared again among the rats of the London docks, this time at Wapping, two miles higher up the river than it was before.—People are asking what has happened to the Poet Laureate's coronation ode. Mr. Austin, it seems, wrote one, but it has not appeared. Some say that the King and Queen did not think it up to the comparatively low standard of official laureate poetry, and ordered it to be suppressed.

Ireland.—The All-Red-Route, which is to connect Australia with Canada via Galway or Blacksod Bay, was approved by the Imperial Conference, but a motion that Great Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand should finance the scheme in equitable proportions was opposed by Mr. Fisher of Australia. No action was taken to select the Irish terminal or expedite the project.—Still further opposition has developed to the State Insurance Bill. The Irish railroad companies, several large business concerns and nearly all the friendly societies have insurance schemes of their own, and a tabulated list shows that the contributions are smaller and the benefits greater than those contemplated by Lloyd George, the administration of which would be much more costly. Moreover, as compared with the workings of similar societies in England, while the individual benefits are much alike the aggregate is much less in Ireland, where the population is seven-tenths agricultural, and less exposed to sickness than English workers, four-fifths of whom live in towns. The attention of the Irish Party had been called to these matters by representative bodies, but the resolution of the Irish Bishops, meeting at Maynooth, May 20, is the weightiest condemnation of the measure. Having shown that its provisions, "designed for the wounded members of a wealthy and powerful industrial system," would be a burden on the agriculture and struggling industries of Ireland, they request the Chancellor "not to extend the Bill to Ireland, and to set aside the State contribution necessary for financing this scheme to the credit of Ireland, either for an Insurance scheme specially designed for the needs of this country, or for some other purpose that may be deemed more beneficial to the general welfare of our population; and we ask the Irish Party to urge this policy in parliament." The Bishops sent their congratulations to the King and Queen on their coronation, and received an appreciative acknowledgement from the King.

Portugal.—The European governments having "national" churches in Portugal have protested to the Lisbon authorities against the application to them of the provisions of the detestable "Separation Law" imposed by the Braga cabinet, which became effective on July 1. The flags of the respective countries will be raised over the churches and admission will be denied to the Portuguese officials. Even the French and Russian representatives have joined in the protest. The Foreign Minister, Machado, has indicated that the Government will acquiesce in the position taken by these protesting nationalities.—Hints that Portugal is willing to dispose of its colony of Macao "for a consideration" have led Chinese merchants to subscribe a handsome amount to secure its return to China and to keep it from falling into the hands of any European power.

Italy.—Returns for the five days ending June 26 show 97 cases of cholera in Naples and its environs, 92 cases at Palermo, and 49 elsewhere.

Belgium.—The new Ministry represents Young Belgium. The Premier has just turned fifty, and five of his associates are under that age. One of them is a Louvain professor, an intimate friend of Schollaert, and had prepared the School Bill for presentation to the House.—After twenty-two sessions, lasting more than a month, the arguments for and against the Princess Louise's suit for her father's African estate were concluded. Some time is expected to elapse before the decision is given.

France.—On June 28 M. Caillaux formed a new Cabinet, the principal members of which are Cruppi, Department of Justice; de Selves, Foreign Affairs; Klotz, Finance; Messemey, War; Delcassé, Marine, and Steeg, Instruction. They are about equally divided on the question which may soon play havoc with French politics, namely, Proportional Representation in the method of voting.—The plan of decreeing what districts should be considered champagne districts has been abandoned. It is considered fortunate that the change of front should have been made when Monis was sick. It was professedly his policy. Of course, now that he is out of office it matters little.—On June 15 the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 262 to 150, expressed confidence in the Government to enforce the new Workmen's Pension Law, but added the words, "with prudence and firmness."

The Government has taken measures to repair the devastation committed by the Shereefian troops during the raid on Lemta, May 21. Stolen children have been restored to their families and orders given to repress in the future all such excesses.—One June 16 a debate took place in the Chambers relative to the French policy in Morocco. Jaurès, as usual, arraigned it and Deschanel defended, admitting that there was a secret treaty between France and Spain. The desire for permanent occupation was disclaimed. A vote of confidence was accorded of 434 votes to 77.—On June 29 the Bishop of Nîmes was fined one franc for flying the papal flag on the occasion of the Joan of Arc celebrations. Apparently the authorities did not hold it to be a great offense. A boy who shouted "Long live the Pope" while the court was in session was put in jail for a day—probably for contempt of court.

Germany.—The German press finds another evidence of developing sentiment in favor of Germany on the part of Englishmen in the cordial greetings showered upon the German Crown Prince during his visit to London for the coronation ceremonies. He was undoubtedly the most popular of all royal visitors, and the acclamations he received from the people everywhere must have convinced him, as his father was convinced when the Emperor recently visited London, that British aversion to Germany was not so black as was frequently painted.

—The American Chamber of Commerce's farewell dinner in honor of Ambassador Hill at the Hotel Adlon, on the eve of the Ambassador's departure for America, assumed proportions far beyond the organizers' expectations. It proved to be one of the most notable functions of the kind ever held in Germany. Two Imperial Cabinet Ministers, four Prussian Cabinet Ministers, the Chief Master of Ceremonies at the Emperor's Court were present, together with a distinguished company of men prominent in official, commercial and academic life.

—America overshadowed everything at Kiel during the regatta week. The Emperor's great war port to all intents and purposes had passed into American possession, since the Stars and Stripes dominated the perspective in all directions. Afloat, the four American battle-ships were the cynosure of all eyes, and American sailors held undisputed sway in the streets. The decisive victories of the American sonder class racing yachts over their German rivals made the transatlantic conquest of Kiel complete. From the Emperor down, every one was unremitting in his efforts to make the Americans thoroughly at home during the visit of the fleet to German waters.—The one marring note in the general welcome was found in the ill-natured criticism of the Americans which appeared in the Deutsche Tages-Zeitung, a newspaper noted for its anti-American spirit. Count von Reventlow, the incorrigible anti-American naval critic, was responsible for its hostile paragraphs.—The official program of the fifty-eighth general Congress of the Catholics of Germany has made its appearance. The sessions will be held this year in Mainz (Mayence) during the second week of August. There will be the usual reception tendered to the delegates on Saturday, August 5; on Sunday morning solemn services will be held in the different churches of the city, a grand parade of Catholic organizations takes place in the afternoon, and at night a mass meeting of the citizens of Mainz will welcome the Congress. Monday, after Solemn Mass in the Cathedral, the sectional and public meetings of the association will begin, to continue until Thursday, August 10, on which day, with a festive banquet and a final mass-meeting, open to all, the sessions of the Congress will come to an end.

Austria-Hungary.—The hope expressed before the recent parliamentary elections throughout Austria, that their outcome would be such as to insure a definite measure of quiet and of opportunity for needed legislative action in the kingdom, appears to have gone glimmering. The Christian-Socialists announce their purpose to play an independent rôle in the incoming parliament, and in all future debates to hold themselves not bound to stand by the Government. Such a policy will undoubtedly add to the harassment of Premier von Bienerth, who hitherto has been able to rely on the assistance of that party in difficulties he met with. Von Bienerth, in consequence of this determination of the Christian-Socialists, held a long conference with the Emperor concerning his future action before his Majesty left the Villa Hermes for his summer home in Ischl. It is openly affirmed by the well-informed that the Premier will present shortly his resignation and that of the entire cabinet.

—Count Franz von Thun and Hohenstein, in recognition of his signal success in the high offices he has filled, has been specially honored by the Emperor, who recently created him a Prince of the Empire. Count von Thun at present is Governor-General of Bohemia.

Spain.—The general assemblies of the International Eucharistic Congress were held in the Church of San Francisco el Grande, where there were four discourses daily, two by Spaniards and two by foreigners. Among the foreign speakers were Archbishop Riordan of San Francisco, Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal, Bishop Montes de Oca y Obregon of San Luis Potosí, Mexico, and Bishop Leite de Vasconcellos, the fugitive Bishop of Beja, Portugal. Conferences for ladies were delivered in the Church of Our Lady of Mount Carmel by three Spanish bishops, who spoke on "The Holy Eucharist and Christian Mothers," "The Holy Eucharist and Christian Maidens," and "The Holy Eucharist and Christian Girls." Conferences of a more general nature were also delivered daily in the cathedral church by other Spanish bishops. The procession of the Blessed Sacrament on June 29 was the most imposing manifestation ever witnessed in Madrid, and included picturesque features which could be found only in a country Catholic for ages. Only seventy-two bishops, however, took part in it, being about half the number of those who formed part of the procession in Montreal last year.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The "Encyclopædia Britannica"

After a long delay, the second half of the new "Encyclopædia Britannica" has at last reached us, and with a curiosity that will be easily understood we turned instinctively to the article "Jesuits";—the animus of which had been previously called to our attention.

It covers ten and half large, double-columned, closely-printed pages, and requires more than an hour in its perusal. After reading it two or three times we closed the book with amazement, not at the calumnies with which the article teems and to which custom has made us callous, but at the lack of good judgment, of accurate scholarship, of common information, and business tact which it reveals in those who are responsible for the publication.

It ought to be supposed that the subscribers to this costly Encyclopædia have a right to expect in the discussion of all the questions presented an absolute or quasi-absolute freedom from partisan bias, a sincere and genuine presentation of all the results of the most modern research, a positive exclusion of all second-hand and discredited matter, and a scrupulous adherence to historical truth. In the article now under consideration all these essential conditions are woefully lacking.

In the first place encyclopedias of any pretence take especial pride in the perfection and completeness of their bibliographies. It is a stamp of scholarship and a guarantee of the thoroughness and reliability of the article; which is supposed to be an extract and a digest of all that has been said or written on the subject. The bibliography annexed to the article on the "Jesuits," is not only deplorably meagre, but hopelessly antiquated. Thus, for instance, only three works of the present century are quoted; one of them apparently for no reason whatever, viz.: "The History of the Jesuits of North America," in three volumes, by Thomas Hughes, S.J., for, as far as we are able to see, the Encyclopædia article makes no mention of the founding of Lord Baltimore's colony in Maryland, or of the preceding troubles of the Jesuits in England, which were considered important enough for a monumental work, but evidently not for a compiler of the Encyclopædia. Again, the nine words, "laboring amongst the Hurons and Iroquois of North America" form the sum total of all the information vouchsafed us about the great missions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, though we are referred to the seventy-three volumes of Thwaites' edition of the "Jesuit Relations." Moreover, had the author or editor even glanced at these books he might have seen that besides the Huron and Iroquois missions, which were very brief in point of time and very restricted in their territorial limits, the Jesuit missions with the Algonquins extended from Newfoundland to Alaska, and are still continued; he would have found that most of the ethnological, religious, linguistic and geographical knowledge we have of aboriginal North America comes from those "Jesuit Relations"; and possibly without much research the sluggish reader would have met with a certain inconspicuous Marquette, but as Englishmen, up to the Civil War, are said to have imagined that the Mississippi was the dividing line between the North and South, the value of the epoch-making discovery of the great river never entered this slow foreigner's mind. In the same way there is no reference whatever to the gigantic labors of the Jesuits in Mexico; or is Mexico not considered to be in North America?

Nor is there in this bibliography any mention of the "Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu," nor of the "Monumenta Pædagogica," nor is there any reference to the great and learned works of Duhr, Tacchi-Venturi, Fouqueray and Kroes, which are mines of information on the history of the Society in Spain, Germany, Italy and France, and although we are told of the "Historia Societatis Jesu" by Orlandini, which bears the very remote imprint of 1620, is very difficult to obtain, and covers a very restricted period, there is apparently no knowledge of the classic work of Jouvençy, nor is Sacchini mentioned, nor Polanco. The "Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus," by De Backer, not "Backer," as the Encyclopædia has it, is mentioned, but it is simply shocking to find no reference to Sommervogel, who is the continuator of De Backer, and who has left us a most scholarly and splendid work which is brought down to our own times, and for which De Backer's, notable though it be, was only a preparation.

In brief, the bibliography is absolutely worthless, not only for a scholar, but even for the average reader. On the other hand it is quite in keeping with the character of the writers who were chosen for the article.

The editor who selected them must have been the Englishman who said:

"I know a Jesuit by his look,
Half cunning and half piety;
D'Israeli, Gladstone and our cook,
All belong to the Society."

Indeed, a wag, writing to the New York Evening Post, informs us that before 1880, when a search for a suitable scribe for the Jesuit article was instituted, someone started on a hunt for Cardinal Newman, but the great man had no time. Then he thought of Manning, who, of course, declined, and finally knowing no other "Jesuit" he gave the work to Littledale.

Littledale, as everyone knows, was an Anglican minister, notorious not only for his antagonism to the Jesuits, but also to the Catholic Church. He gladly addressed himself to the task, and forthwith informed the world that "the Jesuits controlled the policy of Spain"; that "it was a matter of common knowledge that they kindled the Franco-Prussian war of 1870"; that "Pope Julius II dispensed the Father General from his vow of poverty," though that warrior Pope expired eight years before Ignatius sought the solitude of Manresa, and had as yet no idea of a Society of Jesus; again, that "the Jesuits from the beginning never obeyed the Pope"; that "in their moral teaching they can attenuate and even defend any kind of sin"; and, finally, not to be too prolix in this list of absurdities, that, prior to the Vatican Council, "they had filled up all the sees of Latin Christendom with bishops of their own selection."

It is true that only the last mentioned charge appears in the present edition, and it is a fortunate concession for Littledale's suffering victims; for if "there are no great intellects among the Jesuits," and if they are only a set of "respectable mediocrities," they can point with pride to this feat which makes a dozen Franco-Prussian wars pale into insignificance alongside of it. We doubt, however, if the 1,000 prelates who sat in the Vatican Council would accept that explanation of their promotion in the prelacy; and we feel certain that Cardinal Manning, who was one of the great figures in that Assembly would resent it, at least if it is true, as the Encyclopædia assures us, that he considered the suppression of the Society in 1773 to be the work of God, and was sure that another 1773 was coming.

The wonder is that a writer who can be guilty of such absurdities should, after twenty years, be summoned from the dead as a witness to anything at all. But on the other hand it is not surprising when we see that the Rev. Ethelred Taunton, who is also dead and buried, should be made his yoke-fellow in ploughing over this old field, to sow again these poisonous weeds.

Had the careless editors of the Encyclopædia consulted Usher's "Reconstruction of the English Church," they would have found Taunton described as an author "who makes considerable parade of the amount of his research, but has not gone very far and has added little, if anything, to what we knew before. As a whole, his book on 'The History of the Jesuits in England' is uncritical and prejudiced."

This is the kind of an authority the Encyclopædia appeals to for information. That is bad enough, but in the list of authors Taunton is actually described as a "Jesuit." Possibly it is one of the punishments the Almighty has meted out to him for his misuse of the pen while on earth. But he never did half the harm to the Jesuits by his ill-natured assaults as he has to the Encyclopædia by being mistaken for an "S. J."; for although there are some people who will believe anything an encyclopedia tells them more firmly than a Catholic believes the Pope, there are others who are not so meek and who will be moved to inquire how, if the editor of this publication is so lamentably ignorant of the personality and antecedents of his contributors, he can vouch for the reliability of what newspaper men very properly call the stuff that comes into the office. The offense is aggravated when we are invited to listen to the voices of two discredited dead men, one of whom departed this life twenty, the other four years ago, joined with an unknown third person to whom the ultimate revision of the proofs was entrusted. Thus we must be satisfied with a posthumous and prejudiced and partly anonymous account of a great Order, about which many important books have been written since the demise of the original calumniators, and with which apparently the unknown reviser is unacquainted. The subscribers to the Encyclopædia assuredly deserve better treatment.

With regard to the labelling of Taunton as a Jesuit it is in order to remark that, not only is this a blunder of which the compilers of the Encyclopædia should be heartily ashamed, but that they have rendered themselves guilty—unconsciously, no doubt—of a grievous wrong done to a great organization and its friends. Even if this error is corrected in subsequent editions, tens of thousands will have read these calumnies and will have believed them, seeing that they are vouched for by one who is declared by his sponsors to be a member of the Order. Nor can they help asking themselves what kind of a Religious Order it is that will permit one of its own members to assail and revile it. We trust that the other articles of the Encyclopædia are not on such a low level as the one on the Jesuits. In the series just brought into us we see one—we have not had time to look at the others—which speaks of "the worship of Mary," "the superstitions connected with popular beliefs concerning relics and indulgences" which Leo XIII "did nothing to correct," etc. We pass all that by for the present. It will suffice to say that many of these errors were pointed out to the managers of the Encyclopædia at their New York office when the matter was still in page proof and could have been corrected. Evidently it was not thought worth while to pay any attention to the protest. On the other hand it was somewhat puzzling as a psychological problem that, in spite of all this, the managers had the courage—or was it a lack of appreciation of the proprieties—to ask for the privilege of advertising in the columns of AMERICA. They were twice refused and seemed surprised at the rebuff. Possibly we shall have something more to say later on with regard to other blunders of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

THE EDITOR.

Universal Peace

On the twentieth day of September, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy, Victor Emmanuel took violent possession of the City of Rome. He incorporated into his "Kingdom of Italy" what still remained of the Papal States. He was saluted "King of all Italy" by the anti-Christian conspiracy. He fixed his court in the Quirinal palace, which had just been renewed for the use of Pope Pius IX. Pius IX was told that he would be allowed, as a residence, the Vatican palace, adjoining the Church of St. Peter. It was all done without provocation, and Victor Emmanuel has gone into history with the title of the "Robber King."

Eleven years before, in 1859, Napoléon III had taken Lombardy from Austria and had handed it over to Victor Emmanuel in exchange for Nice and Savoy. Victor Emmanuel was Prince of the ancient house of Savoy and King of Sardinia. He wished to have the title of King of Italy. In the following year, 1860, he seized a great part of the Papal States. In 1860-61, by the aid of Garibaldi, he took possession of the Kingdom of Naples and Sicily. He assumed the title of King of Italy, at Turin, in February, 1861. In 1866 he joined with Prussia in the war against Austria, and Venetia was added to his kingdom. There remained for seizure only what was left of the Papal States, a small strip of territory along the Mediterranean.

Finally, in 1870, whilst France and Germany were at war, a message was sent to Victor Emmanuel by the anti-Christian conspiracy: "Order the troops to march on Rome, or we shall proclaim the republic." He ordered the march on Rome, annexed what remained of the Papal States, took up his abode in the dwelling of the Pope, and had himself proclaimed King of all Italy. And what has this to do with the question of universal peace? Let us see. There are eleven important facts in the case. To be brief and exact, we may number them as follows:

1. During this year of grace, 1911, the "Kingdom of Italy" has been celebrating the golden jubilee of the assumption of the title in 1861.

2. The title was founded on robbery of territory and of independence from the unoffending.

3. The security of this territory and independence had been guaranteed by the most solemn pledge of the great European Powers.

4. The "Kingdom of Italy" was possible only on the condition of the violation of this pledge by the Great Powers.

5. Whilst the robbery was being effected and when the title was assumed the Great Powers were silent.

6. In that silence they were all violators of their pledge.

7. Upon that violation, as the one indispensable basis, the "Kingdom of Italy" was founded, and in the continuance has had and has now its existence.

8. The celebration in Italy in 1911 is, therefore, at root and base the golden jubilee of the violation of the solemn pledge of the Great Powers.

9. The celebration is, therefore, an attempt at public rejoicing, after fifty years, over the public acknowledgment by the Great Powers that treaties are not binding.

10. The movement for universal peace is the outpouring of the heart's desire of the well intentioned to the cabinets to establish peace between the nations by means of treaties.

11. In the glare of realities cabinets can but grimly smile at the longings of war-ridden peoples who are begging them to make treaties of perpetual peace.

The political history of Europe for more than a century—from the advent of Bonaparte, First Consul—swings about two great treaties, their causes and making and keeping and breaking. They were more than mere treaties. They were international agreements between assembled Powers for the establishment and preservation of peace. They were the final parchments of international congresses: the Congress of Vienna, in 1814-1815; and the Congress of Paris, in 1856.

The Congress of Vienna re-established the Kingdom of Naples and the States of the Church, which had been seized by Napoleon Bonaparte. The Congress of Vienna was the most notable treaty-making assembly of modern history. It was not a makeshift patched up by under-secretaries. The issues were supreme. Kings, princes and emperors were on the spot, and the Pope's envoy was received by the Congress as the representative of the most ancient dynasty in Europe.

Forty years went by and another Congress was convened at Paris, in 1856, at the close of the Crimean war. The Congress of Paris, besides determining the military status of the Black Sea, ratified the provisions of the Congress of Vienna. Only five years later, as we have seen, in 1861, the Congress of Vienna and the Congress of Paris were thrown into the waste-basket. There was a silent chorus of acquiescence of all the Great Powers to all that had been done in Italy by Victor Emmanuel and the anti-Christian conspiracy. Then came 1870 and the seizure of Rome. By this time the Congress of Vienna and the Congress of Paris were in the rag-bag; the basket had been emptied to make room for other parchments. Not one voice of all those Powers was raised in protest or inquiry. It was a tacit expression of a common understanding that thenceforth might was to be considered right. Thenceforward no cabinet was to put implicit trust in the most solemn pledges of any other cabinet. Consequently all those nations began at once to arm for war, as being the one ultimate recognized solution for any difference; nay, as the sole protection upon which any one could rely against the rapacity of a better armed neighbor.

This is the quintessence of the political status of the Europe of to-day. The nations, with watchful and diligent rivalry, have been arming steadily for forty years. Each one of them has to-day, in the hour of profound peace, a standing army which, in size and equipment, would have been regarded as fabulous if mentioned for actual war operations forty years ago. And behind each of those peace armies is another reserve army twice as large, fully trained, always in exercise, waiting, ready to be called. And in the forty years—yes, in the ten years of this century—have been built those fleets of battle-ships, the annual cost of which would be enough to keep the civilized peoples of the earth in unarmed plenty.

The United States had nothing to do with the Congress of Vienna or with the Congress of Paris. Hence they had no part in the repudiation of the solemn pledges. Nevertheless, the United States have also had to arm. Of course, it is but a matter of precaution. But there is no comfort in the belief that such precaution is necessary. Once upon a time our national marine carried food abroad. Now it has to be advertised as carrying engines of destruction. Withal, let us hope that the Republic may be able to remain at peace with the Powers. But how can the conditions of universal peace between those Powers be secured by means of treaties, so long as they give their cooperative sanction to the perfidy of 1861 and 1870? The mutual distrust will remain so long as the cause remains. The opposing armies of three million will grow to be opposing armies of four million, and nations will hold themselves hourly clad for war.

There is a standing protest which intelligent promoters certainly cannot be ignorant of, if they know the real conditions of their favorite problem. It was on September 20 that Rome was seized. Pius IX died on February 7, 1878. During those eight years and six months he did not once venture beyond the precincts of the Vatican. He was succeeded by Leo XIII. Leo XIII was Pope from February 20, 1878, until July 20, 1903, a period of twenty-five years and five months. During that quarter of a century Leo XIII never left the Vatican. The present Pontiff, Pius X, has been Pope since August 4, 1903. In these eight years he has not been beyond the precincts of the Vatican. Even the dead body of Pius IX was mobbed in the streets of Rome when it was being borne by night to the Cemetery of Saint Lawrence, some years after his death.

For forty years, then, the Vicar of Christ, Prince of Peace, has been a captive in the Vatican. This is a fact unparalleled in history. The connivance of the Powers at the sacrilegious violation of his liberty has brought forty years of preparation for war. The total estimated European fighting strength is forty million men, and twenty million of them are already organized for the conflict. And this is another fact, a consequent fact, also unparalleled in history. And the splendor of the war that is projected is intended to eclipse the lurid light of all the wars of time.

Peace Commissions cannot be regarded as any more efficient than the Powers they represent. The commissioners at the peace-table line up, and change the alignment precisely as the cabinets in the capitals. The Commission at the Hague so put itself on record when it rejected the good offices of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, whose envoy had been received at Vienna as the representative of the most ancient dynasty in Europe. The philosophy of this fact is that the conference declared with the cabinets for the cause of the belligerent status,—for armaments, and greater armaments, and still greater armaments.

A universal treaty of peace is therefore a hopeless thing until the cause of the distrust be removed. There is no indication whatsoever of any disposition to remove the cause. And even if the cause of the present distrust be removed, universal peace will never be secured by means of mere treaties. A treaty is an instrument that is in the hands of a few. It can be broken, as it has been broken, at their discretion—or indiscretion. Permanent peace must come by something that is as permanent as the political structure of the nation that is looking for peace. There is still one crowning development due to the structure of modern governments. In the effort of a day, peace could be made the outcome of the natural working of the modern political organism. How? Well, there is no use talking about it. It is a blessing awaiting the modern governmental system. It may come after the catastrophe. Eyes may be opened. Blind are leading the blind, and they see not the signs of the times.

W. POLAND, S.J.

The Japanese Parliament

Every one knows of the astonishing progress that Japan has made in the last forty years. This progress, however, has not been equally rapid in all the branches of civilization. Nor would it be proper to compare this country with those of the West, but only with what Japan was forty years ago, at the time when the old régime came to an end. However, in the material order Japan might to-day stand comparison with the other nations in its army, navy, commerce, postal and police services. But in the material order itself and, of course, in the domain of the intellect and in the social and moral order there are many gaps and shortcomings. The poverty of Japan explains to some degree, at least, its failure in material civilization, and, naturally, where there is question of ideas or customs, progress cannot take place mechanically. A people which has such a long past as that of Japan cannot make the progress of fifty or one hundred years in a week.

Some of the debates of the last session of the Parliament may give the outside world a gleam of light on the actual state of the Japanese mind, and will reveal some peculiarities of the conditions in which we live. A review of the discussions on the Universal Suffrage Bill may be helpful in that respect, for since the promulgation of the Japanese Constitution on February 11th, 1889, Japan has been under a constitutional government, but by no means a parliamentary one. Still less can it be called democratic. For as this constitution was granted by the spontaneous and benevolent generosity of the emperor, a change in the constitution is reserved to His Imperial Highness, the chambers having nothing to say in the matter. The emperor is not only the chief executive, but is the source of all power. He is not compelled to consult Parliament either to declare war, or to conclude peace or to make treaties with any foreign State, or to determine the organization of the army, or the number of troops of which it may be composed. The ministers of state are responsible only to the emperor, and in no way whatever to the representatives; they are not obliged to submit to the majority of the Parliament, and may remain in office as long as they have the emperor's confidence. Parliament has the right to interpellate the Ministry; to place facts before it, to present addresses to the emperor; but the government is not obliged to pay any attention to votes of censure. From 1891 to 1903, that is to say within a space of twelve years, the government dissolved the lower chamber seven times, and since 1904 it has shown itself very docile, and has carried out whatever it has been told to do.

The regular annual session of Parliament lasts three months. The members are convoked for the 20th of December, and immediately begin by taking a month's vacation on account of the festival of the New Year. Thus they are in session only two months. Nearly all of the work is done in committee, so that during the session which has just finished the lower house held only twenty-six sessions. A single session was enough to vote the budget, while in the upper house this important proceeding required only an hour. In brief, both houses are merely, as you would say in America, rubber stamps to carry out the wishes of the government. The House of Peers is so arranged as to avoid both the inconvenience of a purely hereditary body, like the English Lords, and that of an elective upper chamber. It is composed as follows: (1) Princes of imperial blood, 14; (2) nobles who are hereditary members, 43; (3) nobles elected by the peers, 143; (4) members named by the emperor, 121; (5) members elected by the highest taxpayers, 43; total, 364.

(1) All princes of the blood are members by right as soon as they have reached their majority, which they reach at the age of twenty. All the dukes, who are also called princes, to the number of thirteen, and all the marquises to the number of thirty, are by right hereditary members when they reach the age of twenty-five.

(2) The three other orders of nobility, counts, viscounts, and barons, elect a certain number of their peers for a term of seven years. They are eligible at the age of twenty-five.

(3) Each of the three inferior orders of the nobility can be represented at the maximum by the fifth part of all the members of the upper chamber. Actually there are 17 counts, 70 viscounts, 56 barons, who are members.

(4) The emperor selects and names a certain number of members among his subjects, who are distinguished for their erudition, or who have rendered some notable service to the State. All of the above are members for life.

(5) In each of the Prefectures of the Empire the fifteen greatest direct taxpayers choose one of their number to represent them in the Upper Chamber. These forty-three members hold office for seven years.

The members belonging to the two classes just mentioned have to be at least thirty years old, and their total number can never exceed that of the three other classes. Thus every precaution is taken to have the influences of the Upper Chamber properly balanced, so that none can have preponderance over the others. Moreover, all the influences of this part of the government are conservative, as was plainly seen in the discussion of the Universal Suffrage Bill. Finally, there is another distinction in this part of the legislature, viz., the absence of political parties. Its members are divided into little groups, formed for the most part by members of the same order of nobility or of the same class. The Chamber of Representatives is entirely renewed every four years. It consists of 379 members, 75 of whom are for the city constituencies, and 304 for the country districts. One cannot be a member before the age of thirty. No other condition is required than that the member be in the enjoyment of all civil rights, but he is not allowed to be engaged in certain functions, which are determined by law.

The representatives, like the non-hereditary peers, receive an annual indemnity of one thousand dollars in gold. Moreover, they have free transportation on the railways.

According to the law of 1889, only those who paid at least $7.50 in direct taxes in the Prefecture to which they belonged could be candidates for office. But in 1900 this clause was suppressed. It happened that just then the number of representatives, which was originally 300, was advanced to 379 and, moreover, the revision of the electoral law enlarged the number of possible candidates by lowering the amount of $7.50 to $5.00. Hence, since 1900, it has been sufficient for a Japanese to be twenty-five years of age and to pay a tax of $5.00 in direct taxes to be an elector. Army men and ministers of religion are disfranchised.

But this second condition restricts considerably the right of suffrage, so that Japan is very far from having anything like universal suffrage. In fact, at the elections of 1908 there were only a million and a half who had the right to vote, viz.: a proportion of thirty-two electors for every thousand inhabitants, while if universal suffrage is accorded, even if it is restricted to the age of twenty-five, the number of voters will be no less than twelve million. For a long time there has been a demand and desire for universal suffrage. For this a bill has been presented eight times. In the last session it obtained a majority of votes in the lower house, but the peers rejected it in such a fashion that there is no hope whatever of seeing it become a law in the near future. Not a single peer voted for it. Indeed, every one knows that as long as power remains in the hands of the statesmen who rule Japan at the present time a bill of this description will not have the slightest chance of success. Nevertheless, the way it was received in the lower chamber is somewhat significant, because it really indicates that a party which had made up its mind to sustain the government on all important questions was won over. A study of the reasons advanced for and against the passage of the bill would give an excellent idea of the condition of the Japanese mind in the matter of democracy, and of the progress that has been made in a country which such a short time ago emerged from feudalism.

A. M. ROUSSEL, S.J.

An English View of the "Ne Temere" Agitation

Three ladies once were talking together. They were wives of clergymen of the Church of England, and they were complaining of the invasion of the diocese by men without university degrees, who are therefore called literates, on the lucus a non lucendo principle, as they usually are untainted with letters. "Do you know, my dears," said the chief of the three—she called her lord, Archdeacon—"whenever I read or hear the words: 'He that entereth not in by the door of the sheep, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber,' I feel that they must have been intended to express our present sad condition. 'The door of the sheep' is clearly the university, Oxford or Cambridge, through which your husbands and mine entered the ministry, as gentlemen should. But the literate climbs up some other way, through an obscure training college, for instance, and there is no doubt at all in my mind that they are 'thieves and robbers,' every one."

This conversation took place fifty years ago, and to-day even an archdeacon's wife judges the literate more kindly. Still the feeling is strong that his multiplication is a source of weakness. There is an equally strong feeling that, on account of the much larger proportion of literates among them, the Church of England clergy in the colonies are, as a class, quite inferior to their brethren at home. The universities do not make theologians (a matter of little importance, for a surprisingly small stock of theology enables a man to bear himself with credit in a most untheological denomination): they do give him savoir vivre and savoir faire, by which he views a question in a broad, practical way, so as to grasp its bearings on the status of the Church of England. Anglican clergy in Canada, therefore, would do well to consult the common sense of the clergy at home, and we call their attention to the following letter appearing in the Guardian:

"The manifesto issued by the Canadian House of Bishops is an attempt to deal with a very remarkable and painful situation, and perhaps should not be criticised without very great respect and sympathy; but it seems to me that their lordships have gone rather too far in their attempt to find a fundamental principle on which to base their protest. It is surely not true to say that the State should not permit marriage to be annulled for an ecclesiastical offence, or because it is contrary to the Canon law of the Church of Rome or contrary to the laws, rules, and regulations of any religious organization whatever.

"In the case referred to the State supports the Roman ecclesiastical law in forbidding such marriages and calling them null and void. In this country the State supports the ecclesiastical law in refusing to recognize certain marriages—for instance, if a man should marry his grandmother, even 'if he has been married by a duly competent officer authorized by the State for the solemnization of marriages.' If the Bishops merely intend to question the wisdom of the law as it stands, they have taken an unusually strong line in making it the subject of a Pastoral Letter. It looks very much as if they intended to question the right of the Church to forbid and annul any marriage whatever, provided it has been solemnized by a duly competent officer—a theory which would reduce our Table of Kindred and Affinity to a mere matter of ecclesiastical penalties. Many persons are in favor of treating illegal marriages on the principle 'Fieri non debuit, factum valet'; but this is not the view of our Church—'Such persons as are joined together otherwise than God's Word doth allow are not joined together by God, neither is their matrimony lawful.' The manifesto seems to take the popular but untenable view that it is a scandal that a marriage once solemnized should ever be null and void in law."

As we have pointed out several times, the clergymen who are stirring up the present agitation in Canada seem to have no adequate perception of the principle it involves. One day they make the State omnipotent, protesting that no marriage it has approved may be challenged, and professing themselves content with the status of its authorized agents for marriages; the next finds them asserting the rights of their denominations and their rights as ministers to solemnize marriages. One of them laid down in a sermon the amazing proposition that the State may interfere with no one's right to view marriage as a sacrament, but it must require all to recognize in it alone the power to determine conditions of validity. There is no contradiction in admitting the State's power to regulate the civil effects of valid marriages, but coordinate jurisdiction of Church and State over the essence of marriage is an utter impossibility. Yet this seems to be lurking in the minds of some of the agitators. The writer of the letter we have quoted sees very clearly that should the agitation be successful its logical result will be to give the civil law exclusive jurisdiction in matters matrimonial, to accept whatever it legalizes in the way of marriage, divorce, remarriage, etc., and to renounce for the Church of England, and every other Protestant denomination, the right to determine what marriages are in accordance with God's Word and what are not.

Perhaps, when sober second thought comes in, the agitators will acknowledge that, under existing circumstances, the Quebec civil code cannot be improved on.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The Prescribed Course and Literary Development

We have argued that the religious side of Catholic colleges should be favorable, rather than otherwise, to the continuation of the best literary traditions. In respect of the other distinctive feature of Catholic schools, namely, the "old-fashioned" course of Latin and Greek, we are convinced that it is not only no hindrance to literary cultivation, but, on the contrary, is the single source of any hopefulness concerning the future of English literature, as it has been the strength and backbone of our literature in the past.

This is a modern quarrel, which we do not care to revive here, with all its stereotyped pros and cons. No one can deny that the intense industrial times in which we have been living have had their effect on education. The increase of wealth, the huge salaries, the high cost of maintaining a respectable appearance, the standardization of money as a large determining factor in social relations, have made the best parents timid and nervous about the material welfare of their sons. Why keep boys in an environment which attaches secondary importance to commercial success, from which they are released on the threshold of manhood to find themselves in the race for wealth discouragingly in the rear of those who never went to college? The complaint received new force from the fact that many of their sons never took kindly to what seemed to their indolent tempers or limited talents to be a purposeless and useless line of effort; for them the college course was simply a lounging period, and a series of evasions, tolerated out of regard for the pet weakness of one's family. Like every other system, the classical college had defects; but its frank indifference to the short cuts to wealth was transformed from a crowning virtue into a serious blemish in the eyes of a generation which saw little value in any superiority not conditioned in affluence.

This dissatisfaction with the classical colleges was so sudden and emphatic as almost to resemble a panic. The officials of State-endowed colleges were naturally the first to yield to popular clamor, and in the ordinary course of competition few private institutions had the courage to preserve an inflexible fidelity to their old ideals. The college became trade-schools and the preparatory departments of this or that special profession. Their character became utilitarian instead of liberal, as it had been. If a youth was intended to be a physician, a lawyer or a civil engineer, he could not begin too soon; and whatever did not bear directly on the promotion of his particular vocation was deemed unnecessary.

We have no means of ascertaining just how far the utilitarian purpose of the new education has been justified in commerce; it seems to us that the majority of the "captains of capital" and of the successful industrialists are now, as they always have been, persons who never had the opportunity of profiting by education, whether liberal or utilitarian. The most eminent professional men still continue to be drawn; we fancy, from the number of those who followed the classical course in college. As for literature, Mark Twain and Walt Whitman and Bret Harte and William Dean Howells, who never went to college at all, have succeeded Longfellow and Holmes and Hawthorne and Poe. It is true the general average of our literary excellence has risen; but the advance has been democratic and due less to any academic training in the new schools than to the self-making qualities of energy and hard application in preparing material which will be a marketable commodity, rather than a thing of beauty. The aristocratic exclusiveness and lonely altitudes which American letters in so many instances reached at an earlier day seem now remote beyond attainment.

We have reason to trust, with much thankfulness, that the movement of frenzied educational methods is drawing to a close. We do not condemn it unreservedly. It has, doubtless, by its successes and its failures, done a great deal in calling attention to neglected fields of pedagogy and in helping us to survey the possibilities and limitations of academic education. Like all revolutions, it went too far in an opposite direction, sweeping away the heritage of the past, its treasures and its trifles, with a blind and angry intolerance. The inevitable reaction is setting in. The more conservative colleges are returning in a rather shame-faced way to their older system. The famous college president who lent the prestige of a great university and of personal renown to the educational experimentation of the last score of years, and characterized Jesuit colleges as persisting with Moslem inelasticity in trying to force infinite variety into a single and outworn mould, has signified the surrender of his position in the following words:

"At one time Harvard had a prescribed course, yet it did not produce a uniform scholar. The amount of time required to attain possible marks was not nearly as much as required now, yet such scholars as Emerson, Lowell and Norton were produced, for the reason that they gave one-tenth of their time to the prescribed course and nine-tenths to the study of what they liked. The prescribed course has no tendency to produce a uniform grist, and it is a mercy that it does not."

It is just that fact, which the speaker of these words took so long to discover, which explains the literary advantages of the classical course. The growing boy has been thumbing his Latin and Greek grammar and construing his Cæsar and Cicero, his Virgil and Ovid and Homer, with a certain apathetic interest in the puzzles with which they challenged his quickness and ingenuity. Then one evening in winter he may find himself turning the leaves of the Roman orator and stopping curiously to pry into the meaning of the words on those pages not yet begrimed by the drudgery of the classroom. He makes out one sentence, and another, and soon the current catches him, and "the grandeur that was Rome" sweeps into his vision for the first time. Or it may be a morning in spring, when time hangs heavy on his hands and he feels lonesome only because the world, for some unaccountable cause, is so delirious with joy. His lessons are dull things to con in such an hour; when suddenly some simple descriptive passage, fashioned centuries ago by a Roman poet,

"Regia Solis erat sublimibus alta columnis," or

"Et jam summa procul villarum culmina fumant Majoresque cadunt altis de montibus umbræ,"

or

"Aspirant auræ in noctem; nec candida cursum

Luna negat: splendet tremulo sub lumine pontus," stays his restless eye. It is the faintest of hints, the most fleeting of glimpses, the momentary flash and gleam of a mystical and alluring quarry; but the ancient hue and cry is raised in his young soul, never to die down into silence; and he enters upon a weary but restless pursuit, is caught up by the excitement of a chase that will last to his dying day. For he has seen the skirt of Beauty for an instant, and he must follow. May prayer enwrap him and angels guard him! For the Beauty which he seeks is found at the end of only one trail; all others, with seemingly redder roses and richer fragrances and stronger lures, cross his path, confuse his sight and beckon him always away to where disappointment and sorrow and ugliness lie ambushed amid the petals and the verdure.

We cannot explain why this awakening of the literary sense often comes sooner and more sharply in the obscurities and silences of a dead language than in the urgent clamor of splendid vernacular literatures. But so it seems ever to have been. We cannot explain, moreover, why it is that Catholic colleges have not reaped in some conspicuous way the fruit of their perseverance on the old lines, which were discarded by so many non-Catholic colleges and are now coming again into respect. Beyond peradventure of doubt, it was not their time-honored classical course which kept them from supplying happy auspices to distinguished careers in letters. If they have not been as successful as we might expect, the causes must be sought elsewhere than in the faithfulness to the old classical course. We do not hesitate to predict that if they keep themselves free from the influence of over-elaborate and pretentious college catalogues and the cramming and spirit-deadening machinery which many non-Catholic colleges make their proud boast, they will yet gather reward for their sane and steady protest against all the flutter and uncertain mutation of recent years.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

On the Feast of St. Aloysius, June 21, thirty-two young men were ordained to the priesthood in the Baltimore Cathedral by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. How many think of praying the Lord of the Harvest to vouchsafe to send laborers into His vineyard? The harvest is indeed great and the laborers are all too few.

CORRESPONDENCE

Spain's Eucharistic Congress

MADRID, June 12, 1911.

In the midst of the joy and enthusiasm that have preceded the opening of the Eucharistic Congress there has been a note of regret and sorrow because the Holy Father has declined to send to our Congress a Cardinal Legate from his court. This was a great disappointment to the organizers and to all Spanish Catholics in general. The strained relations, or rather, the almost rupture of relations between the Holy See and the Spanish government must be looked to for an explanation of the Pope's negative. So great was the general desire to have a cardinal from Rome to preside at the Congress that, when King Alfonso XIII learned of the appointment of Cardinal Aguirre, Archbishop of Toledo, he immediately wrote an autograph letter to His Holiness, begging him to accede to the pious desires of the faithful, and offering to place at the disposal of the legate the royal palace of la Plaza de Oriente, a thing that within the memory of man was never done in Spain in favor of the representative of any foreign sovereign. The king's request and offer however, reached the Vatican after the arrival of Cardinal Aguirre's letter of acceptance; it was, therefore, too late to undo what had been done.

A second disappointment was experienced by the Infanta Isabel, the king's aunt, and the Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá, presidents of the organization committee, for they had expected to have for the triumphal closing procession the magnificent monstrance of the cathedral of Toledo; but the Toledans, fearing that some mishap might befall what is one of the most beautiful of existing examples of the goldsmith's art, flatly refused to let it leave their city. The monstrance to be used, therefore, is that belonging to the municipal council of Madrid, which, though not so large and beautiful as that of Toledo, is, nevertheless, an artistic treasure, and of the weight of six hundred and sixty pounds.

In spite of these drawbacks, there is a vast deal of genuine enthusiasm for the Congress. Generous contributions have been received from members of the royal family, from grandees, and from the hierarchy, not to mention what the faithful in general have gladly given. The Spanish cabinet, notwithstanding its anticlericalism, has lent its aid and cooperation, and will assist in its official capacity, as representing a Catholic nation.

The topics proposed for study and discussion may be summed up under the following heads: (1) The Real Presence; (2) The Blessed Sacrament; (3) Historical Treatment of the Theme; (4) In Literature and Art; (5) Associations; (6) Sacerdotal Action; (7) Social Works. Papers to the number of two hundred and eighty-one have been handed in on the various subjects. Not the least interesting, we are sure, will be that of Rev. Father Boissaril, of Lourdes, the title of which is: "Eucharistic Miracles at Lourdes."

One of the most touching and poetical features of the Congress will undoubtedly be the administration of the Holy Communion to twenty thousand or more children in El Retiro, the great public park of Madrid. There will be erected three temporary altars, at which bishops will celebrate holy Mass and communicate the boys and girls. After the services a box lunch will be provided, for the children; they will then march in procession to the Church of San Pascual Baylon, patron of all eucharistic associations.

The route marked out for the procession is something over two and one-half miles in length. We have been informed that, from motives of prudence, the king will not take part in it. The pious workmen of the "Garden of Valencia," the most fertile part of Spain, have volunteered to carpet the whole distance with flowers and greeneries.

One of the typical features of ancient traditional Spain which will be seen at the Eucharistic Congress will be the seises, or choir boys from Seville, who will sing and dance before the Blessed Sacrament as the procession moves through the streets. The origin of the custom is to be looked for away back in medieval times, when, as our ancient annals tell us, children dressed as angels and crowned with roses used to dance before "the ark of the Blessed Sacrament." The garb in which the boys now appear consists of a jacket of damask silk elaborately ornamented with gold galloon, a silk scarf, knee breeches, stockings and low shoes, also all of white. The hats which they wear while dancing have a rather broad brim, turned up in front, and are adorned with plumes. In their hands they carry the seises, or castanets, with which they keep time for the music and the dancing. This feature of Seville's Catholic life has more than once been the theme of painters. The celebrated Spanish artist, Gonzalo Bilbao, has produced it twice, one canvas being now in the possession of Lord Rosebery, and the other in an Australian gallery.

The dancing of these little citizens of Seville is simple, graceful, and full of reverence. On the feast of the Immaculate Conception and during the solemnities of the whole octave of Corpus Christi, the canons and other dignitaries of the cathedral of Seville, after chanting vespers, go in stately procession from the choir to the high altar, and before them, opening the way, are the seises. It is dusk. The uncertain light strives to make its way through the lofty stained glass windows. Deep shadows fill the chapels replete with venerable tradition and ancient mystery. The vast nave is enveloped in a calm and restful half-darkness. The high altar is a blaze of light, which is fitfully reflected from the massive silver candelabra and the gilded rood-screen. The great organ is mute; a solemn silence broods over the sacred edifice. The huge bell of the giralda booms out over the city; its fellows take up the strain. And while the lofty bell-tower quivers and rocks in unison with the peal, in the midst of the solemn hush within the fane, the sweet, childish voices of the choir boys tell us that the seises are leaving the choir of the cathedral and leading the canons to the altar of adoration. Light and lithe, yet recollected and reverential, they go through the figures of the dance, the while they chant the praises of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. Golden thuribles are swinging and clouds of fragrant incense rise heavenward: "Blessed and praised be the Most Holy Sacrament." It is the last note of the hymn, and the seises glide away.

As the Congress is to be brought to a close on the feast of SS. Peter and Paul, the Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá wished to have rendered in the cathedral of the capital of Spain Reimondi's celebrated hymn in honor of the Apostles. The necessary permission was obtained, and thus, for the first time in history, that wonderful musical composition will be heard outside the walls of the Vatican.

Finally, one of the interesting features of the Congress is the contribution of poems in honor of the Holy Eucharist, and of biographies of Spaniards who have been distinguished for their devotion to the Sacrament of the Altar. Don Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo, the most illustrious representative of intellectual Spain today, will deliver a discourse on the occasion of the award of prizes to the successful competitors.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

The Pope Encourages Diocesan Missionary Bands in France

ROME, June 18th, 1911.

The Holy Father has just sent a letter to the archbishops and bishops of France about to assemble in council over the furtherance of Diocesan Missions. He gives them every encouragement in their enterprise, urging them to set up in every diocese an establishment for the training of Diocesan Missionaries. He bids them not to rest till every parish in the land will have the benefit in due time of these Missions, in which the trained missionary in the simple, direct language of the lowly shall put deep down in their hearts the eternal lessons and precepts of the Gospel, to become there a fountain of living water springing up into life everlasting.

There have been no public audiences during the week, though the Holy Father has received privately large groups of First Communion children, to whom he shows a special attachment; some of these children seem piccoli bambini, not tall enough to kneel at the altar rail, but must stand up to receive our Divine Lord, though, of course, they are older than their diminutive size would suggest.

The English converts, who have been studying all the year in the College of Noble Ecclesiastics, Messrs. Arthur Cocks, Henry Hinde, Oliver Henly, Henry Prince, Ernest Schebbeare and John Steele, have also received an audience. On Trinity Sunday, in the Pauline Chapel of the Vatican Palace, Cardinal Merry del Val conferred subdeaconship upon them, and after entertaining them at breakfast, presented them to His Holiness for a blessing and a word of encouragement. Finally, the Pontifical Mission to represent the Holy See at the English coronation were received in private audience on Tuesday, and on Thursday set out for London.

A European press agency has sent out the announcement that the Portuguese Government has replaced the Embassy to the Holy See, suppressed at the beginning of the revolution, with a Legation of the first class. The story is brutally false: the agency has either maliciously created the canard or has been imposed upon by the Portuguese Government. One hates to say the alternative which repeated offences of the kind force him to choose.

The Feast of Corpus Christi was celebrated with the customary processions of the Blessed Sacrament, drawing forth an exhibition of faith and devotion among great numbers of all classes of people. It is painful to have to record that the violence threatened last year in London to a similar procession has its counterpart in Italy. In the San Lorenzo district a score of half drunken young ruffians shouted the vilest insults at the young "Enfants de Marie" in the procession, until a plucky priest, Father Giulio Zecchin, caught the ring-leader by the scruff of the neck and shook at least some servile reverence into him, while a passing deputy by the name of Trent held the crowd at bay till the police appeared, when they took to their heels.

Out at Fabriano things were a little worse. There an organized mob of anti-clerical hoodlums rushed the procession and endeavored to break through the guard of honor about the baldachino, under which the bishop of the diocese was bearing the Blessed Sacrament. The military police turned out at once, and as the gang stopped to show fight there was considerable of a struggle; but the police succeeded in arresting a large number of them. At the other extreme the people of Brescia are indignant over the fact that the picket of the guard at the prison, by which the procession was passing, did not turn out and present arms, as has been customary on similar occasions. The incident has been made a matter of interpellation of the Government, which promptly promised an inquiry into the facts and a location of responsibility. It would seem a case of worrying over a penny and neglecting a pound.

An echo of the Verdesi case has been heard in Parliament, where a deputy interpellated the Government on the fact of the law of libel making no difference in penalty between the deliberate defamer and the incautious (sic) journalist who takes his story and prints it. The deputy went on to say that while ten months' imprisonment and a fine of 883 lire was all right for the former, it would seem too severe for the latter. As a consequence, to avoid such punishment, the press has taken to insinuation and suppression instead of direct statement, and so exposes men in political life to a stab in the back instead of a frontal attack, which they can squarely meet.

